Defendants, by a motion to quash under Rev. St. 1895, art. 1243, entered their appearance at the next term, and, as article 1241 declares that an appearance shall have the same force and effect as if citation had been duly issued and served, the motion did not bar them from filing a plea of privilege to be sued in another county, for that plea need not be filed until citation has been served.

2. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 84*)—CONTRACTS—CONSTRUCTION.

Where defendants employed plaintiff to sell nursery stock for them under a written contract providing that defendants would allow plaintiff 50 per cent. of the price quoted, but that he should bear all expenses in selling, delivering, and collecting, and should owe and pay defendants for all stock shipped to him whether delivered or not, defendants should not be charged with any amount for sales uncollected, whether the same be represented by notes or otherwise.

On Motion for Rehearing.

3. VENUE (§ 32*)—PRIVILEGE—WAIVER.

The filing of a cross-action and a trial on the merits waived the privilege of defendants to be sued in another county, being equivalent to the institution of a new suit by defendants invoking a jurisdiction of the court.

Appeal from Coleman County Court; T. J. White, Judge.

Action by G. T. Cook and another against F. T. Ramsey & Son, begun in justice court. There was a judgment for plaintiffs, and on defendants' appeal to the county court judgment was again rendered for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Reformed and rendered.

Weathered & McDaniel, of Coleman, for appellants. T. H. Strong and Woodward & Baker, all of Coleman, for appellees.

Findings of Fact.

JENKINS, J. This suit originated in a justice's court in Coleman county upon an account alleged to have been due T. W. Galloway for selling fruit trees for appellants, and transferred to appellee Cook, and payment thereof guaranteed by Galloway. Ramsey & Son are nurserymen, whose residences are in Travis county, Tex. They employed Galloway under a written contract to sell nursery stock for them. Said contract provided, among other things, that "they (Ramsey & Son) will allow party of the second part (Galloway) 50% of the price quoted in their catalogue for selling and delivering nursery stock; but said party of the second part is to bear all expenses in selling, delivering and collecting. * * * Party of the second part owes and will pay said Ramsey & Son for all stock shipped to him, whether it is delivered or not." Galloway made out an account against Ramsey & Son, showing a balance due him of $119.13. In this account he charged Ramsey & Son with certain notes taken in payment of stock sold, which notes have not been paid, but were in the hands of appellee Cook's attorney at the time of the trial hereof, having been delivered to him by said Galloway. In the justice's court appellants moved to quash the citation against them, which motion was sustained, and the case was continued. At the next term of said court appellants filed a plea of privilege to be sued in Travis county, alleging that the pretended transfer and guaranty of the account sued upon was fictitious, and made with the fraudulent purpose of attempting to confer jurisdiction in Coleman county. Appellee Cook moved to strike out said plea of privilege for the reason that appellants, by filing a motion to quash the citation served on them, had waived the right to file said plea of privilege. Said motion was sustained, and judgment was rendered for the amount sued for. Similar action was had on said plea in the county court, and a like judgment was rendered therein.

Opinion.

[1] The action of the court in striking out appellants' plea of privilege was error. Such plea was filed in due order of pleading. Railway Co. v. Lynch, 73 S. W. 87, and authorities there cited. Appellants were not required to file their plea of privilege until the next term of the justice's court after quashing said citation, for the reason that they were not in court until that time. By making said motion they entered their appearance at the next term of said court. Article 1243, R. S. What was the effect of such entry of appearance? Article 1241 declares that an appearance "shall have the same force and effect as if citation had been duly issued and served upon him, as provided by law." Had citation to the next term of said justice's court been duly issued and served upon appellants, it could not be doubted that they would have had the right to file their plea of privilege, which they did file at said term of said court.

Appellee Cook cites us to the case of York v. State, 73 Tex. 351, 11 S. W. 869, in support of the ruling of the trial court in this case. In that case the written contract of lease upon which the suit was brought provided that such suit should be brought in Travis county, Tex. It was brought in that county. York did not claim the privilege of being sued elsewhere, but his contention was that the process of the state of Texas could not run beyond its borders, and consequently the attempted service upon him in Missouri did not give the court jurisdiction to try the case which the state had brought against him. He made a motion to quash the service upon him. The Supreme Court held that this motion operated to enter his appearance, and had the same force as a citation legally served. Having thus brought himself into court, the court had power to render judgment in the case.

[2] 2. As we cannot know whether or not the evidence upon another trial will sustain appellants' plea of privilege, we deem it proper to indicate our construction of the contract between appellants and Galloway.

As we construe said contract, 50 per cent. of the value of all of the nursery stock shipped to Galloway was chargeable to him, and Ramsey & Son cannot be charged with any amount of said sales uncollected, whether the same be represented by notes or otherwise. Said notes should not be charged to Ramsey & Son, but to Galloway.

For the error of the court in striking out appellants' plea of privilege, and refusing to allow them to introduce evidence thereon, the judgment herein is reversed, and this case is remanded.

Reversed and remanded.

On Motion for Rehearing.

[3] Upon a former day of the present term, we reversed and remanded this case for the error of the trial court in striking out appellants' plea of privilege. The briefs of the parties did not call our attention to the fact that appellants filed a cross-action against appellee Galloway, asking judgment against him for $49.40, by reason of matters growing out of the contract sued on. Appellees have called our attention to this fact on motion for rehearing.

The filing of said cross-action and a trial thereon on its merits was equivalent to the institution and trial of a new suit brought by appellants against appellee Galloway, and by such action appellants invoked the jurisdiction of the trial court. Thorndale Mercantile Co. v. Evans & Lee, 146 S. W. 1053; Kolp v. Shrader, 131 S. W. 860.

The motion for rehearing is granted, and the judgment of the trial court is affirmed. Affirmed.

On Appellants' Motion for Rehearing.

As stated in the original opinion in this case, this court is called upon to construe the written contract sued on. In our judgment on appellees' motion for rehearing we overlooked this fact and affirmed the judgment of the trial court for the full amount. The uncollected sales, amounting to $86.95, as shown by the notes, and which in the judgment of the trial court were charged against Ramsey & Son, should be charged against Cook. This will reduce the judgment against Ramsey & Son by that amount.

Appellants' motion for a rehearing is granted, and the judgment of the trial court is here reformed so that the appellees recover of the appellants for the sum of $32.18, with interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum from January 1, 1911.

Reformed and rendered.

ALLEN v. ABERNETHY et al.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. San Antonio. Nov. 13, 1912.)

1. COUNTIES (§ 167*)—WARRANTS—NEGOTIABILITY.

Warrants issued by the commissioners' court to pay a contractor constructing a courthouse are mere orders on the treasurer to pay the amounts named, and are nonnegotiable, and the contract for the work may not make them negotiable so as to entitle a purchaser thereof to the rights of an innocent purchaser.

2. COUNTIES (§§ 113, 164*)—CONSTRUCTION OF COURTHOUSE—POWERS OF COMMISSIONERS' COURT.

Under the statute empowering the commissioners' courts to provide and keep in repair courthouses, jails, and public buildings, the commissioners' court of a county may contract for the construction of a courthouse and issue interest-bearing nonnegotiable warrants to pay therefor.

3. COUNTIES (§ 165*) — CONSTRUCTION OF COURTHOUSE—WARRANTS—VALIDITY.

Warrants issued by the commissioners' court to pay a contractor constructing a courthouse are not void because they are made payable at the county seat or outside the state, even if payment at the latter point may be enforced.

4. COUNTIES (§ 192*) — CONSTRUCTION OF COURTHOUSE—TAX LEVY.

A taxpayer may not complain of a tax levied by the commissioners' court of a county for the construction of a courthouse, where the levy is for so much of 15 cents on $100 as may be necessary.

Appeal from District Court, Atascosa County; E. A. Stevens, Judge.

Action by George Allen against W. M. Abernethy and others. From a judgment granting partial relief, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Frank H. Burmeister, of Christine, and J. F. Carl, of San Antonio, for appellant. C. C. Clamp, of San Antonio, for appellees.

FLY, C. J. Appellant obtained a temporary injunction from the judge of the Seventy-Third judicial district of Texas restraining W. M. Abernethy, county judge, and the county commissioners, treasurer, and assessor of Atascosa county from proceeding under and recognizing a certain contract made and entered into by the commissioners' court on June 10, 1912, with the Gordon-Jones Construction Company, to build a courthouse at Jourdanston to cost $65,000, to be paid for with county warrants secured by a lien on a 15-cent tax levy on each $100 of the valuation of the entire property of the county, as well as a lien on the contemplated courthouse; the warrants to bear 6 per cent. interest from June 10, 1912, and payable, principal and interest, on March 1, 1913, and on each successive year up to and including the year 1928. The papers were returned to the district court of Atascosa county, and a trial had on a motion to dissolve the injunction, in which it was decreed that the temporary writ of injunction "was properly granted," and in addition it was recited: "But, it appearing that W. M. Abernethy, acting in behalf of Atascosa county, and the Gordon-Jones Construction Company have subsequently entered into an agreement in writing, dated July 19, 1912, by the terms of which the objectionable features of the original contract between said Atascosa county and said Gordon-Jones Construction Company, with reference to the obligations to be issued by said county and to be delivered to said company, it is ordered that said temporary injunction be and is hereby modified so as not to restrain the defendants, nor any of them, from proceeding with the erection of a courthouse building in accordance with the terms of said original contract after the commissioners' court of said Atascosa county shall have fully ratified the said agreement in writing entered into by said W. M. Abernethy and said Gordon-Jones Construction Company amending said original contract."

It was admitted that the orders, contract, and other matters were as alleged in the petition; that the warrants described in the petition had been issued and signed by the county judge and county clerk and were in the hands of the county judge. Appellees introduced in evidence a supplemental contract made by the county judge with the construction company, in which the following language in the original contract was eliminated: "And the delivery of said warrants shall be a waiver by the county officials of all defense of whatever nature, which said county or any officer or other person may interpose to the payment of any of said warrants, or the county's right to levy said special tax of fifteen cents (15¢) on the one hundred dollars, or so much thereof as may be necessary, and make sufficient appropriations out of the same for the payment of the same, for the payment of said warrants, and of the amounts, both principal and interest, on the contract price represented by them from year to year." The following stipulation was also eliminated: "That they shall pass by delivery merely, and to the extent of cutting out equities and defenses in the hands of innocent purchasers for value, said warrants and interest warrants are, and shall be, negotiable instruments." It was also agreed in terms that the warrants should not be negotiable instruments, but merely be assignable. The warrants had written across their face "interest warrants" and "principal warrants." The warrants were orders on the county treasurer to pay the construction company, on a certain date, a certain sum "out of the special county courthouse building fund; being the amount allowed by the county commissioners' court of said county, at their June term, A. D. 1912, for labor and material furnished in the erection of a county courthouse."

[1,2] The warrants were not negotiable paper, but were simply evidence of the debt that the county owed. They are merely orders on the treasurer to pay the amounts named, on compliance with law. San Patricio County v. McClane, 44 Tex. 397. In the same case, in 58 Tex. 243, it was held that the statutory power "to provide courthouses, jails, and all necessary public buildings" gave authority to the county to contract to pay interest on its indebtedness incurred in the erection of a courthouse. The same proposition was reiterated in Davis v. Burney, 58 Tex. 364.

Under our present statute, the power is given commissioners' courts "to provide and keep in repair courthouses, jails, and all necessary public buildings"; being the same power lodged in the county court under the statute which the Supreme Court in the McClane Case, 58 Tex. 243, held authorized the issuance of interest-bearing warrants. They would not be negotiable paper, and could not prevent the county from setting up any defense it might have against the construction company, and any attempt upon the part of the commissioners' court to make them negotiable was futile and void. The commissioners' court had the authority to build the courthouse, and had the right to make the order it did, and had the authority to issue interest-bearing warrants to pay the indebtedness incurred in building the courthouse. A very similar state of facts prevailed in the case of Stratton v. Commissioners' Court, 137 S. W. 1170, and this court held that the contract for building the courthouse was valid and legal. A writ of error was refused in that case. To the same effect are Cowan v. Dupree, 139 S. W. 887, and Commissioners' Court v. Nichols, 142 S. W. 37. In the last-named case it was held that, if the instruments showing the indebtedness had been intended for bonds, they were illegal as such and could not pass into the hands of an innocent purchaser. If that be true, the injunction should have been dissolved by the district court. There could have been no error, of which appellant could reasonably complain, in the action taken by the district court. He obtained everything that he was entitled to, if not more. The warrants issued by the commissioners' court are not bonds in any sense, and the contract made with the construction company could not make them bonds. The warrants were not negotiable instruments, and the contract sought to be made by the county judge could not transform them into paper that would entitle a purchaser of them to the benefits of an innocent purchaser. The warrants do not provide for attorneys' fees.

[3] We do not think that the warrants would be void because of the provision making them payable in Jourdan or New York, even if payment at the latter point could be enforced.

[4] The tax levied by the commissioners' court was not positively for 15 cents on the $100, but was for "so much thereof as may be necessary." We do not think that appellant had any cause for complaint.

[5] The commissioners' court had the authority to appoint the county judge or any other agent to make the contract for it. That right is given by statute. Rev. St. art. 797; last revision, art. 1373.

The judgment is affirmed.

MASON v. MISSOURI, K. & T. RY. CO. OF TEXAS.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Dallas. Nov. 9, 1912.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 345*)—CARRIAGE OF PASSENGERS—INJURY TO PASSENGER—EVIDENCE—PRIOR OR HABITUAL DRUNKENNESS.

Though, in an action for injuries to a passenger on a railroad train, alleged to have been caused by the sudden starting of the train when he was preparing to leave it, the question of the plaintiff's sobriety at the time of the alleged injury was in issue, testimony of prior or habitual drunkenness was improperly admitted, as such testimony could in no manner prove or disprove that drunkenness did or did not contribute to the injury on the day in question.

2. WITNESSES (§ 414*)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY—CORROBORATION.

Where, in an action for injuries to a passenger, the testimony of the plaintiff as to how the accident was caused was impeached by evidence of statements made by him after the injury, tending to show that he himself was the cause of the accident, evidence of other statements after the injury, offered in behalf of the plaintiff, should have been admitted in corroboration of the impeached testimony.

3. WITNESSES (§ 287*)—REBUTTAL TESTIMONY—EXPLAINING INCONSISTENCIES.

Where the testimony of plaintiff had been impeached by the witnesses for the defendant, a refusal to permit him, on rebuttal, to testify to any fact tending to explain any conflicts in the testimony was improper.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 980, 1000-1002; Dec. Dig. § 287.*]

Appeal from District Court, Hunt County; T. D. Montrose, Judge.

Action by G. W. Mason against the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company of Texas. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Evans & Carpenter, of Greenville, for appellant. Alex. S. Coke, of Dallas, and Dinsmore, McMahan & Dinsmore, of Greenville, for appellee.

RASBURY, J. Appellant instituted this suit against appellee to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been inflicted upon him while a passenger upon appellant's train at Celeste, in Hunt county, Tex. The claim is made that when the train stopped at Celeste appellant arose, with baggage in hand, preparatory to leaving the cars; that as appellant arose the train made an unnecessary and unusual jerk; or that just as it stopped, and as appellant arose, the appellee's employes negligently stopped its train with a sudden and unusually quick stop, or started same after stopping and made a second stop jerking appellant forward and throwing him down with great force and violence, rendering him temporarily unconscious, and inflicting upon him serious and permanent injuries.

Appellee answered by exceptions, general denial, and that appellant was guilty of contributory negligence in arising from his seat and attempting to stand or walk before the train stopped, and in that at said time he was voluntarily intoxicated to the extent that his power to control his muscles, balance himself, and stand or walk was destroyed.

Trial was had before a jury and a verdict returned for appellee, upon which judgment was accordingly entered, and from which this appeal is taken.

[1] Appellant, by his first, eighth, ninth, tenth, and eleventh assignments of error, complains of the admission of testimony, over his objection, tending to prove habitual drunkenness and the use of intoxicants by appellant on other occasions. On cross-examination of Dr. Pierson, witness for appellant, who had testified he had known appellant for a number of years, appellee asked: "You have seen him when he was in a state of intoxication before this? Well, I have seen him under the influence of whisky. Never saw him drunk. Have seen him under the influence of whisky, not often—not more than three or four times in 12 years." While Steve L. Green, witness for appellee, was testifying, appellee asked: "Had you seen Mr. Mason before when he was drinking?" to which witness responded, "Yes, sir." Lowery Glascoe, witness for appellee, who had known appellant a number of years, was asked by appellee: "Had you ever seen plaintiff intoxicated before this time?" He responded, "I had seen plaintiff intoxicated three or four times in Celeste since I had known him." Jim Landers, witness for appellee, on direct examination, after testifying that he was living with appellant when the alleged injury occurred, and had been three or four months, was asked by appellee: "During the time you lived there, did you ever see Mr. Mason [plaintiff] intoxicated?" He answered: "Yes; I believe twice." George Gooch, witness for appellee, after testifying he had known appellant 7 or 8 years, was asked by appellee, "Had you ever seen the plaintiff intoxicated before the time you saw him the day he was hurt?" and answered, "I had seen him intoxicated two or three times before." Appellant objected to this testimony as immaterial, irrelevant, and calculated to prejudice him before the jury. The trial court, in each instance, overruled the objection, and appellant saved his exceptions, and has presented same here by proper bill and assignment. Appellee, in reference to the admission of the testimony, asserts that proof of former habitual drunkenness was admissible in rebuttal to impeach plaintiff's statement that he did not get drunk, was harmless, and was admissible in any event to corroborate the statements of the witnesses that he was, in fact, intoxicated on the day of the accident. Under the pleading appellant's condition of sobriety at the time of the alleged injury was unquestionably a legitimate inquiry, since it may or may not have contributed to his injury. But we think it equally clear that prior or habitual drunkenness could in no manner prove or disprove that drunkenness did or did not contribute to his injury on the day alleged. Browne v. Bachman, 81 Tex. Civ. App. 490, 72 S. W. 622; Railway Co. v. Davis, 92 Tex. 372, 48 S. W. 570; Railway Co. v. Evanish, 61 Tex. 6; Railway Co. v. Rowland, 82 Tex. 166, 18 S. W. 96.

The cases we have cited state the correct and settled rule, and render a discussion of the matter unnecessary, and make it clear that the testimony complained of was not only inadmissible, but presumably harmful. To permit the introduction of the testimony for the purpose of impeaching appellant's statement that he had never been drunk would be to try the case on collateral issues—the identical thing which the cases cited hold may not be done. The fact that appellant had been drunk or intoxicated on former occasions could have no legitimate bearing upon the question of his negligence on the day of the alleged injury.

[2] Appellant's fifth assignment of error complains of the exclusion of certain testimony offered by him in rebuttal. It appears from the record that appellee proved by the witness Neub Stephens, who, in the absence of a physician, washed and bathed appellant's wounds, that appellant stated, while the witness was so engaged, that "he had a bottle too much of beer, he guessed, and said he got up a little too quick to get off the train, and when the train stopped he fell." It further appears from the record that defendant proved by its witness Lowery Glascoe, who was constable of the Celeste precinct, that when appellant got out of his son's buggy "the plaintiff [appellant] was talking about getting hurt when they drove up. He [appellant] said it was not their [meaning appellee's] fault. 'It was my own fault.'" After these witnesses had testified, Dock Mason, son of appellant, was placed upon the witness stand by appellant in rebuttal. This witness testified that he met his father (appellant) at the train and walked with him from the depot to where his horse and buggy were hitched; that he then drove to a gin or lumber yard with one Joe Andrews and delivered him a bottle of whisky; that afterwards he rejoined his father at the drug store, where his wounds were being dressed. At this point in the examination the witness was asked: "Did you on that occasion, either at the train or on the way up town, have any conversation with your father as to how he came to fall, or hear him relate how he came to fall?" Counsel for appellee objected to this question, and the objection was sustained and the witness not permitted to answer. The bill of exception shows that the witness would have testified "that on said occasion plaintiff [appellant] did relate to him, and in his presence and hearing, how he came to fall and hurt himself in the train, and in that connection stated that he arose as the train stopped, turned and reached for his grip, and that just as, or just after, the train stopped it started suddenly forward with a jerk and immediately stopped with a jerk, and the jolt threw him down, and he struck his face against some part of a chair or seat." We think the court erred in excluding the testimony. It is well settled that, the plaintiff's testimony having been impeached by proof of contradictory statements made by him in relation to his injuries, he is entitled to corroborate his own testimony by statements made to others corroborative of what he has testified to. To permit the witnesses to contradict him by proof of what he told them and refuse to permit other witnesses to corroborate him by the same process, it seems to us, would be palpably unjust. We do not mean to say that the trial court might not exercise its discretion about the scope and extent of such testimony; but that question is not raised by the record in this case. The admission by him that it was his fault that he suffered the claimed injury was important and conceivably vital to his cause of action, and for that reason we cannot conclude the error was unimportant or harmless. Railway Co. v. Hawk, 30 Tex. Civ. App. 142, 69 S. W. 1040; Railway Co. v. Sizemore, 53 Tex. Civ. App. 491, 116 S. W. 403.

[3] We are also of opinion that the court erred in refusing to permit appellant to testify in rebuttal to any fact tending to explain any apparent or real conflicts in his testimony concerning the contents of his "grip" or valise. His testimony on direct examination as to how much beer and whisky the grip contained had been impeached by the witnesses for the appellee, and he should have been given the opportunity to make such explanation as he could. Dooley v. Bolders, 128 S. W. 690.

We do not think the charge of the court, submitting the question of appellant's intoxication as the proximate cause of the alleged injury, is subject to the criticisms directed against it. We think the testimony was sufficient to warrant the court in submitting to the jury whether or not the accident was the result of the fact that appellant was in such state of intoxication as to destroy his power to control his muscles and balance himself and stand or walk steadily.

Holding the views expressed, we conclude that the several errors of the court in the trial of the case were harmful to appellant, and it becomes our duty to reverse and remand the case, which is accordingly directed.

Reversed and remanded.

Appeal from District Court, Dallas County; J. C. Roberts, Judge.

Action by Herman Kruegel against Cockrell & Gray and others. From a judgment dismissing the petition, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Herman Kruegel, of Dallas, for appellant. Cockrell, Gray, Thomas & McBride, of Dallas, for appellees.

RAINEY, C. J. This is an action for slander and libel brought by Herman Kruegel, plaintiff, against J. E. Cockrell and Edward Gray, and Curtis Hancock, as attorneys at law, and E. B. Muse, as district judge, to recover damages for malicious utterances of Curtis Hancock made by said Hancock during the trial of a cause in the Forty-Fourth judicial district court in Dallas county, before E. B. Muse, judge presiding. Collusion and conspiracy between all the defendants was alleged. Defendants pleaded absolute privilege in making such utterance, the same being in the process of a judicial trial, and interposed a general demurrer to plaintiff's petition, which demurrer was sustained by the court, and, the plaintiff refusing to amend, the cause was dismissed. From this action of the court Kruegel appeals.

The libelous matter alleged is: That while he was on the stand as a witness in his own behalf he was asked by Curtis Hancock, attorney, and required by the court to answer, questions as follows: "(1) 'Is it not a fact you (meaning plaintiff) are an anarchist?' (meaning to say that plaintiff is an anarchist). To which plaintiff answered, 'No.' (2) 'What is your politics?' (still meaning plaintiff is an anarchist). Plaintiff answered: 'I am a Republican.' (3) 'Is it not a fact that you (meaning plaintiff) have no respect for law, nor for the courts of the country, nor for their judgments (meaning thereby that plaintiff is an anarchist, an outlaw, and undesirable citizen of low degree)?' To which plaintiff answered, 'No; it is not the fact' (4) 'Is it not a fact you would rather go to jail than to obey the law and the judgments of the courts of the country (still meaning plaintiff is an anarchist, an undesirable citizen of low degree with no respect for law nor fear for the jail)?' To which plaintiff answered, 'No; it is not the fact' (5) 'Is it not a fact you have brought many damage suits in the district courts of Dallas county against nearly all the officers of Dallas county past and present?' To which plaintiff answered, 'Yes; for the willful wrongs done him in an official capacity.' (6) 'Is it not a fact, if you recovered judgment on all your suits, you would be richer than Rockefeller (meaning to ridicule plaintiff)?' To which plaintiff answered he did not know how much all the damages sued for amounted to, and did not know how rich Rockefeller was. (7) 'Is it not a fact, you also intend to sue Judge Muse, the judge of this court?' To which plaintiff in substance answered, 'Perhaps so, or he ought to be sued.' That said questions were predesigned, malicious, immaterial, irrelevant, and impertinent to the matters in controversy, and made to injure the reputation of plaintiff and to so impress the jury. That Cockrell & Gray were parties defendant to the cause then on trial.

[1] Without determining whether or not under any conditions the language charged would be actionable we are of the opinion that, under the circumstances charged in plaintiff's petition, it was absolutely privileged, and the defendants are not liable in damages therefor. Runge v. Franklin, 72 Tex. 585, 10 S. W. 721, 3 L. R. A. 417, 13 Am. St. Rep. 833. In the case cited it is held that charges made in a judicial proceeding, whether true or false, are privileged, as it constitutes no basis for an action in damages. We rest our holding in affirming this case upon the principle announced in the case cited.

[2] The plaintiff attacks the constitutionality of the court in trying this case on the ground that there cannot exist more than one district court with concurrent jurisdiction for Dallas county. We do not concur in this contention. Act Leg. 1909, p. 4, creating the Fourteenth, Forty-Fourth and Sixty-Eighth District Courts, violates no provision of the Constitution, and is valid. Lytle v. Hall, 75 Tex. 128, 12 S. W. 610; Wheeler v. Wheeler, 76 Tex. 489, 13 S. W. 305; Kruegel v. Daniels, 50 Tex. Civ. App. 215, 109 S. W. 1108.

The judgment is affirmed.

WILSON v. WARD.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Dec. 13, 1912.)

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1022*)—REVIEW—FINDINGS OF FACT.

Findings on conflicting evidence by a special commissioner, concurred in by the lower court, will not be disturbed; it being impossible to say from the record that there is a clear preponderance against them.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Bell County. Action by H. L. Ward against E. M. Wilson. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

N. J. Weller, of Pineville, for appellant. Jas. H. Jeffries and N. R. Patterson, both of Pineville, for appellee.

TURNER, J. This is an action instituted by the appellee against appellant for a balance claimed to be due on an account current between them, growing principally out of a partnership or joint venture in logging. The defendant answered, and by way of counterclaim and set-off asserted certain claims against the plaintiff. By agreement between the parties the action was transferred to the equity docket, and A. G. Patterson, a prominent lawyer of the Bell county bar, was selected as special commissioner, and the cause was referred to him for an adjustment of the accounts between the parties. The transactions in dispute cover a period of some five or six years, and there are numerous contested items on each side. The special commissioner, after taking the evidence, prepared with great care and skill an unusually intelligent and comprehensive report. He even went so far as to give in his report a statement of the evidence on each contested item. To this report each party excepted, and the lower court overruled all the exceptions, and approved the report in full.

It would be unprofitable for us to enter into a discussion of the various items and the evidence relied upon to sustain or reject them. It is sufficient to say that there is a sharp conflict of evidence as to a number of the items; but these matters have been carefully considered and passed upon, both by the special commissioner and the lower court, and we are unable to say from the record that there is such a preponderance as to any one of the items as to justify us in differing from them on the facts. Those gentlemen were on the ground, and not only familiar with the evidence in the record, but with the persons who gave it; and, as there is nothing presented to us here for review, except a question of fact, the judgment is affirmed.

FIDELITY & DEPOSIT CO. OF MARYLAND v. SOUSLEY et al.

1. SUBROGATION (§ 31*)—RIGHTS OF SURETY AS AGAINST PRINCIPAL—SATISFACTION OF JUDGMENT.

Where a creditor obtains judgment against the principal in F. county, and by a suit thereon in J. county recovers the amount of the first judgment from the surety, it is only necessary that the surety, as a condition precedent to the action against the principal after satisfaction of the J. county judgment, should take from the creditor an assignment of the F. county judgment, and its taking of an assignment of the J. county judgment is immaterial.

2. SUBROGATION (§ 31*)—RIGHTS OF SURETY AS AGAINST PRINCIPAL.

A surety who pays a judgment against his principal, without taking an assignment of the judgment against the principal, can only recover from the principal upon the implied promise that the law raises in his behalf.

3. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 28*)—REIMBURSEMENT OF SURETY.

A surety who pays a debt against his principal without taking an assignment of the creditor's judgment, and who seeks relief against the principal upon the promise raised by law in his behalf, must proceed within five years from the time of paying such judgment.

4. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 28*)—SUBROGATION (§ 31*)—REIMBURSEMENT OF SURETY—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Under Ky. St. § 4686, which entitles a surety, who pays the whole or part of a judgment, to an assignment in whole or part from the judgment creditor or his attorney, and provides that, when satisfied, such judgment shall give him the right to control the judgment for his own benefit, so far as to obtain satisfaction from the principal for the amount paid, does not require that the assignment of the judgment shall be in writing or be made a matter of record, or that it shall be entered in the record book in which a judgment is entered; and an assignment within five years gives the surety all the rights against the principal that he could acquire by an assignment of record, and extends the time in which he may proceed against his principal for reimbursement, so that his right to recover against his principal is not limited to an action on an implied promise, barred within five years, but extends for the same time that the right of the judgment creditor extends.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. §§ 134, 135; Dec. Dig. § 28; Subrogation, Cent. Dig. §§ 70-91; Dec. Dig. § 31.*]

5. SUBROGATION (§ 31*)—RIGHTS OF SURETY AS AGAINST PRINCIPAL—NOTICE TO PRINCIPAL.

After a surety's right of action against his principal is barred, he should not be permitted, by an order of court, to restore it to life without notice to the principal; but, when his action is not barred, it is not necessary that he should give notice to his principal of his intention to obtain an assignment of the creditor's judgment, since, if the principal has a defense, such as that the party obtaining a statutory assignment of the judgment was not in fact a surety, that his right to the assignment was barred by limitation, or that his claim against the principal had been satisfied, the fact that the surety obtained an assignment without notice would not prevent the principal from making such defenses.

6. PRINCIPAL AND SURETY (§ 182*)—RIGHTS OF SURETY AS AGAINST PRINCIPALS INDIVIDUALLY.

Where a surety for two persons as assignees satisfies a judgment against them, growing out of their failure to faithfully discharge their duties as assignees, he may, after satisfying such judgment, proceed against them individually.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Surety, Dec. Dig. § 182.*]

7. SUBROGATION (§ 31*)—RIGHTS OF SURETY AS TO PRINCIPAL — EXTINGUISHMENT OF PRINCIPAL'S LIABILITY.

Where a creditor, obtaining judgment against a principal in F. county, recovered thereon against the surety in J. county, the surety's payment of the J. county judgment and taking the creditor's assignment of the F. county judgment did not extinguish the liability of the principal under the F. county judgment.

8. SUBROGATION (§ 31*)—RIGHTS OF SURETY AS TO PRINCIPAL—PRESUMPTION.

The legal presumption is and should be that the surety's payment of a judgment against the principal does not extinguish it, so as to deprive the surety of the right to an assignment of the judgment for his benefit against the principal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Subrogation, Cent. Dig. §§ 70-91; Dec. Dig. § 31.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Fleming County.

Action by the Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland against R. H. Sousley and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions.

R. J. Babbitt and J. H. Power, both of Flemingsburg, for appellant. B. S. Grannis and John P. McCartney, both of Flemingsburg, for appellees.

CARROLL, J. In 1896 R. H. Sousley and R. K. Hart qualified as assignees of David Wilson, under a general deed of assignment, with the appellant company as surety. In May, 1902, the Louisville National Banking Company obtained a judgment in the Fleming circuit court against Hart & Sousley, as assignee of Wilson, for $1,850, with interest from the date of the judgment until paid. Upon this judgment an execution, issued in July, 1902, and in September, 1902, was returned "no property found." After this the Louisville National Banking Company and Henry L. Stone, who it appears had some interest in the judgment, brought suit in the Jefferson circuit court against the appellant company to recover from it, as surety of Hart & Sousley, the amount of the Fleming county judgment against them, and in March, 1903, they obtained judgment against the appellant company for the same amount that judgment had been rendered against Hart & Sousley. In January, 1904, the appellant company satisfied this judgment, and also the judgment in the Fleming circuit court, in favor of the Louisville National Banking Company, by paying the amount of the judgments, with interest and costs. Upon its payment of the Fleming county judgment, the Louisville Banking Company in 1904 assigned in writing to the appellant company the Fleming county judgment. The assignment, after setting out some preliminary facts, recites that "whereas, by virtue of the bond executed by said Hart & Sousley, as principals, and the Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland, as surety, to secure the faithful performance of their duties by said Hart & Sousley, as assignees of David Wilson, said Fidelity & Deposit Company became liable to said banking company for the amounts recovered by said judgment, and whereas said Fidelity & Deposit Company has paid the whole of said judgment, and said banking company has been fully satisfied with respect to all its rights under such judgment, now, therefore, said Louisville National Banking Company, in consideration of said payment of said judgment as aforesaid, hereby assigns to said Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland said judgment and all said bank's rights in, to, and under said judgment, without recourse against said bank in any event." Afterwards, and in December, 1911, the Louisville National Banking Company and Henry L. Stone each made written assignments of the Jefferson county judgment to the appellant company, and Stone also assigned to it his interest in the Fleming county judgment. In December, 1911, this suit was brought by the appellant against Hart & Sousley to recover from them the amount it had been compelled to pay as their surety in satisfaction of the judgment rendered against them as assignees in the Fleming circuit court.

To this suit an answer was filed by Hart & Sousley, consisting of several paragraphs, but the substance of the defense was: (1) That the judgment relied on by appellant as the basis of its action were extinguished and satisfied in January, 1904, and, as the assignments of these judgments to it were of no effect, its right to a recovery rested entirely on the implied promise of Hart & Sousley, its principals, to repay to it the amount it had paid for them as surety, and was barred by the five-year statute of limitation; (2) that the assignments of the judgments were void because no notice was given to Hart & Sousley that the judgment plaintiff would be requested to make the assignments, or that they had made the assignments; (3) that, as the Fleming county judgment was rendered against Hart & Sousley as assignees, the appellant acquired no right against them as individuals by virtue of the assignment of that judgment; (4) that the assignment of the Fleming county judgment by the Louisville Banking Company was only operative as to one-half of the judgment, as Henry L. Stone was the owner of the remaining one-half; (5) that, as the Jefferson county judgment was based on the Fleming county judgment, the latter judgment was merged in the former, and the assignment of it passed nothing to appellant; (6) that the assignment of the Jefferson county judgment, which was made in 1911, more than five years after the judgment had been satisfied by the appellant, was of no effect, because the right of the appellant, if it had any, to recover on the judgment against Hart & Sousley was then barred by the five-year statute of limitation. In disposing of the case we will consider only in a general way these defenses, as it does not appear to be necessary that each of them should be taken up separately.

[1] The record shows that the Fleming county judgment was rendered in behalf of the Louisville Banking Company against Hart & Sousley as assignees. It was therefore only necessary that the appellant, when it satisfied this judgment, should procure from the banking company an assignment of it. If, however, Stone, by reason of some private arrangement between himself and the banking company, had an interest in the judgment, the assignment of the judgment by the banking company only passed to the assignee the interest that the banking company owned; and, as the surety only obtained within five years from the date of the Fleming county judgment an assignment from the banking company, and not from Stone, it is only substituted to the rights of the banking company in the Fleming county judgment. This Fleming county judgment was not satisfied by appellant until some two years after its rendition, when it satisfied the judgment rendered against it in the Jefferson circuit court; but this circumstance is of no material importance. The appellant did not suffer any loss by reason of its suretyship until it satisfied the judgment against its principals, and it was not entitled to an assignment of the judgment until it had satisfied it. It was not necessary that it should have obtained in 1904, or indeed at any time, an assignment of the Jefferson county judgment. There was no reason why it should take an assignment of a judgment against itself, and so the assignment of the Jefferson county judgment to it by the banking company and Stone do not add anything to the strength of appellant's case or take anything from it.

The rights of the parties are to be judged by the effect of the judgment in the Fleming circuit court, and the assignment of this judgment to appellant. If appellant is entitled to recover, its right to do so must rest on the effectiveness of the assignment of the Fleming county judgment, because if this assignment did not enlarge its rights as a surety, and they must rest on the implied promise of the principals to repay the amount it was compelled as surety to pay for them, its claim is barred by the five-year statute of limitation.

[2, 3] A surety, who pays a judgment for his principal without taking an assignment of the judgment against the principal that he paid, can only recover from his principal upon the implied promise that the law raises in his behalf, and he must proceed to obtain relief upon this implied promise within five years from the date of the payment. Bowman v. Wright, 7 Bush, 375; Robinson v. Jennings, 7 Bush, 630; Duke v. Pigman, 110 Ky. 756, 62 S. W. 867, 23 Ky. Law Rep. 209.

[4] But the rights of a surety, who satisfies a judgment, have been enlarged by the statute, and, when a surety takes a statutory assignment of a judgment against his principal within five years from its rendition, he steps into the shoes of the judgment plaintiff, and has all the rights against his principal that the judgment plaintiff would have. Joyce v. Joyce, 1 Bush, 474. Among other rights that the surety acquires by obtaining within the five years a statutory assignment is the one extending the time in which he may proceed against his principal for reimbursement. His right to recover against his principal is not limited to an action on the implied promise and barred within five years if no action be taken, but extends for the same period of time that the right of the judgment plaintiff would extend. Therefore, if the assignment of the Fleming county judgment was made in the manner provided in the statute, the five-year statute of limitation relied on by appellee constitutes no defense. This statute, which is section 4686 of the Kentucky Statutes, reads as follows: "If the surety pays the whole or part of a judgment he shall have a right to an assignment thereof from the plaintiff or the plaintiff's attorney, in whole or in part; and when the plaintiff has been fully satisfied, such assignment shall give him the right to sue out or use any existing execution, or otherwise control the judgment for his own benefit against other defendants, so far as to obtain satisfaction from the principal for the whole amount so paid by the surety with interest, or from any cosurety his proper part of such payment according to the principles of the last section. Such assignment shall also transfer to the sureties so paying the benefit of any lien existing under or by virtue of such judgment; and the right to the assignment shall exist, though the money was made or secured by sale of the property of the surety under execution." Under this statute the appellant, when it satisfied the judgment, had a right to an assignment thereof, and this assignment it obtained. The statute does not require that the assignment of a judgment shall be in writing or be made a matter of record, or that the assignment shall be entered on the record book in which the judgment is entered. An assignment within five years will give to the surety all the rights against his principal that he could acquire by an assignment of record. Patton v. Smith, 130 Ky. 819, 114 S. W. 315, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1124; Brown & Bro. v. Lapp, 89 S. W. 304, 28 Ky. Law Rep. 409; Freeman on Judgments, vol. 2, § 422.

[5] It is, however, earnestly insisted by counsel for appellee that the assignment of a judgment, to be effective, must be made after notice to the principal debtor, and that, unless the principal debtor is given notice of the fact that an assignment will be requested or that an assignment has been made, so that he may, if he desires, contest the right of the surety to the assignment, he will not be affected by it. In support of this proposition, our attention is called to Veach v. Wickersham, 11 Bush, 261. In that case it appears from the opinion that in April, 1855, McDowell and Young recovered judgments against Veach, Cornish, and Wickersham; the latter two being the sureties of Veach, and as such sureties they were compelled to and did satisfy the judgment in 1855. In 1869, 14 years after the satisfaction of the judgment by the sureties, Wickersham, without notice to Veach, procured an order from the court in which the judgment was rendered, indorsing one-half of the judgment for his benefit, and empowering him to sue out execution thereon. Execution having been issued in favor of Wickersham, Veach contested his right to collect the execution, and his contention was sustained by the court. It will be observed that in that case the surety did not seek to secure an assignment of the judgment until after the expiration of five years from its rendition, or until after his right of action upon the implied promise of Veach had been barred by limitation. At the time Wickersham obtained the assignment, he had no enforceable demand against Veach, and the court, under this state of facts, said that it was necessary to the validity of the order of the court making the assignment that Veach should have had notice of the application for the order and opportunity to defend and show cause against it. That case does not hold that, within five years after the rendition of the judgment, the surety may not obtain, without notice to his principal, an assignment of the judgment from the judgment plaintiff. Of course when the surety's right of action is barred by limitation, and he undertakes to revive his cause of action by obtaining, through an order of court, an assignment of the judgment, he must give notice to his principal, so that the principal, if he desires, may defeat his right to the assignment upon the ground that his claim is barred by limitation.

It can readily be seen that, after the surety's right of action is barred, he should not be permitted, through an order of court, to restore it to life without notice to the principal; but, when his right of action is not barred, it is not necessary that he should give notice to his principal of his intention to obtain an assignment of the judgment. A surety who satisfied a judgment is entitled, as a matter of right, to an assignment of it within the five years, and this right the principal debtor cannot obstruct or defeat if the judgment was in fact paid by the surety.

The case of Plummer v. Talbott, 50 S. W. 1097, 21 Ky. Law Rep. 30, is also relied on by appellee. In that case it appears that in 1894 Plummer, who was a member of a partnership, bought out the other members and executed his note for the purchase price of the partnership stock. Failing to meet these notes, Plummer in 1895 returned what he had bought to his partners, and a contract was then entered into by which his partners agreed to pay off the firm debts and save Plummer harmless therefrom. After this contract was made, a creditor of the old firm obtained judgment against Plummer in the quarterly court; the other partners defeating in that court a recovery against them. From the judgment refusing him relief against the other members of the firm, the creditor appealed to the circuit court, and in that court obtained a judgment against the other members of the firm. The result of this was that the creditor had a judgment in the quarterly court against Plummer and a judgment for the same debt in the circuit court against the other members of the firm. After this the other members of the firm obtained from the creditor, without notice to Plummer, an assignment of the quarterly court judgment against Plummer, and sought to collect it. Plummer, after setting up the facts before stated, sought to enjoin the collection of the execution, but the lower court dismissed his petition. In reversing the case this court said that under the facts stated in the petition of Plummer seeking to enjoin the collection of the execution, he did not owe any part of the debt, and therefore the other members of the firm were not entitled to an assignment of the quarterly court judgment without notice to him. The court further said: "If the debt is the debt of Plummer alone, he is not hurt by the assignment; but if it is a firm debt, and he owes only a part of it, or if it is a debt against which he is to be saved harmless under the contract, then the injunction is to be perpetuated." The difference between that case and this is apparent. In that case, according to the averments of Plummer's petition, he did not owe the judgment, and the other members of the firm had no right to an assignment, or to collect it from him. In this case it is not denied, and we take it could not be, that Hart & Sounsley, as assignees, should have paid the Fleming county judgment against them; but, failing to pay it, the appellant, as their surety, was compelled to satisfy it, and the only defenses they make to the right of the surety to recover against them the part of that judgment owned by the banking company are purely technical. They have no meritorious defense as Plummer had or as Veach had.

If Hart & Souseley had a defense, the fact that the appellant obtained an assignment without notice to them would not prevent them from making the defense in this action. For example, if a person who obtains an assignment of a judgment under the statute was not in fact a surety, or if his right to the assignment was barred by limitation, or if his claim against his principal had been satisfied, or for any other reason should not be paid, the principal can make his defenses when it is sought to collect the judgment debt under the assignment, unless the assignment was made by an order of court after due notice to the principal and opportunity to resist in court the assignment.

[6] There is no merit in the contention that, as the Fleming county judgment was against Hart & Souseley as assignees, the appellant, who as surety satisfied that judgment, cannot proceed against them as individuals. The judgment against them in the Fleming circuit court was caused by their failure to faithfully discharge their duties as assignees, as may be seen by an examination of Stone v. Hart, 66 S. W. 191, 23 Ky. Law Rep. 1777, and Wilson v. Louisville Nat. Banking Co., 76 S. W. 1065, 25 Ky. Law Rep. 1065.

When a fiduciary, by his wrongdoing or faithless performance of his trust, causes his surety to suffer a loss, the surety may proceed against him individually to recover what he has been compelled to pay. If this were not so, a faithless fiduciary could put the burden of his wrongdoing upon his surety and escape liability for loss occasioned by his breach of duty.

[7] Nor did the payment of the Jefferson county judgment by the surety have the effect of extinguishing the liability of Hart & Souseley under the Fleming county judgment. When the surety paid off the Jefferson county judgment against it and took an assignment of the Fleming county judgment, this act plainly showed that it was not intended, in satisfying this judgment, to extinguish its right to reimbursement against the principal. Roberts v. Bruce, 91 Ky. 379, 15 S. W. 872, 12 Ky. Law Rep. 932.

[8] Aside from this, the legal presumption is, and should be, that the payment of a judgment by a surety does not extinguish it so as to deprive the surety of the right to an assignment of the judgment for his benefit against the principal. The judgment creditor had a right to bring this suit against the surety alone in Jefferson county, and, when the surety satisfied the judgment against it, it was entitled to be substituted to all the rights the judgment plaintiff had against Hart & Souseley, and among these was the right to have an assignment of the Fleming county judgment, and by virtue of this assignment it acquired all rights against Hart & Souseley that the Louisville Banking Company had, but was not substituted by the assignment to any interest that Stone may have had in the Fleming county judgment, because it did not obtain, within five years from the rendition of this judgment, an assignment by Stone of his interest in it.

Wherefore the judgment is reversed, with directions to enter a judgment in favor of appellant for the sum the record, in this case and the cases out of which this litigation grows, shows the Louisville Banking Company was entitled to in the Fleming county judgment, with interest thereon from the date of that judgment, and a proportionate part of the cost of that judgment.

SHIRLEY v. RENICK.

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1046*)—RIGHT TO OPEN AND CLOSE—REVERSIBLE ERROR.

Under Civ. Code Prac. § 317, subsec. 6, providing that the party having the burden of proof shall have the conclusion of the argument, the denial of that right to the party having the burden is reversible error.

2. PLEADING (§§ 2, 133*)—CODE PLEADING—"COLOR"—"SON ASSAULT DEMESNE."

A plea of "son assault demesne," which is in the nature of a confession of the assault charged, and an avoidance thereof, by showing that the plaintiff first assaulted the defendant, and that the injuries grew out of his assault, must, even under the Code, give "color," which, as a term of pleading, signifies an apparent or prima facie right in the plaintiff; the Code, while having abolished forms, not having changed the substance of various pleas.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 2, p. 1262; vol. 7, p. 6552.]

3. PLEADING (§ 133*)—ANSWER—CONFESSION AND AVOIDANCE—COLOR.

In an action for damages for willful and malicious assault, the first paragraph of the answer traversed the allegations of malice, and the second paragraph alleged that defendant attempted to assist the constable in making an arrest, whereupon plaintiff attempted to restrain defendant, who to protect himself struck plaintiff. Held that, while not expressly admitting the assault on plaintiff, defendant's answer, taken as a whole, was a good plea in confession and avoidance, impliedly confessing the assault.

4. TRIAL (§ 25*)—RIGHT TO OPEN AND CLOSE.

Under Civ. Code Prac. § 526, providing that the burden of proof in the whole action lies on the party who would be defeated if no evidence were given, a defendant in an action for malicious assault who pleaded in confession and avoidance that he struck plaintiff in repelling plaintiff's assault, though traversing the allegations of malicious and willful injury, has the burden of proof, the gist of the plea being one of son assault demesne in confession and avoidance; and hence, under the direct provisions of section 317, subsec. 6, is entitled to the conclusion in argument.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 44-75; Dec. Dig. § 25.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Warren County. Action by James Garland Shirley against Tom Renick. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Rodes & Wallace, of Bowling Green, for appellant. T. W. & R. C. P. Thomas, of Bowling Green, for appellee.

MILLER, J. Shirley sued Renick for $5,100 damages for a willful and malicious assault, committed on the ——— day of August, 1911. The first paragraph of the answer is a traverse, but in such a way as to deny only that the assault upon plaintiff was willful or malicious. In effect, it admits the assault. The second paragraph alleged affirmatively that, while attending a tent meeting in Warren county some time in August 1911, the plaintiff and his brother, Porter Shirley, became drunk and disorderly; that Smith, a constable, while attempting to arrest Porter Shirley, who resisted arrest, called defendant to his assistance to effect the arrest, whereupon the plaintiff assaulted, took hold of, and attempted to restrain, the defendant from making said arrest; and, in order to make said arrest and protect himself, the defendant struck plaintiff with his fist. In a third paragraph defendant alleges that he was justified in striking the plaintiff under the circumstances above set forth; and that he used no more force than was necessary to repel the assault and force used by the plaintiff.

The case was twice tried. Upon the first trial plaintiff obtained a verdict for $100, but this judgment was set aside; and upon a second trial the verdict was for the defendant. Plaintiff appeals.

No bill of exceptions containing the evidence or the instructions is presented. The appellant seeks a reversal upon the single ground that the trial court refused him the burden of proof and the closing argument to the jury.

[1] Under subsection 6 of section 317 of the Civil Code of Practice, the party having the burden of proof shall have the conclusion in the argument; and section 526 further provides that "the burden of proof in the whole action lies on the party who would be defeated if no evidence were given on either side." If, therefore, the burden of proof was upon the appellant, he was entitled to the closing argument; and a denial of that right by the circuit judge was a reversible error. Royal Ins. Co. v. Schwing, 87 Ky. 410, 9 S. W. 242, 10 Ky. Law Rep. 380; Lucas v. Hunt, 91 Ky. 279, 15 S. W. 781, 12 Ky. Law Rep. 871; Crabtree v. Atchison, 93 Ky. 338, 20 S. W. 260, 14 Ky. Law Rep. 313; Ashland & Catlettsburg Street Railway Co. v. Hoffman, 82 S. W. 566, 26 Ky. Law Rep. 778. The trial court evidently took the view that the defendant had pleaded son assault demesne; and the burden of proof was therefore upon the defendant, and not upon the plaintiff.

[2] It is contended, however, that the answer nowhere alleges that the assault by plaintiff upon defendant is the same assault committed by the defendant upon the plaintiff, which is the subject of this action, and that the answer therefore does not plead son assault demesne. A plea of son assault demesne is in the nature of a confession of the assault charged, and an avoidance thereof, by showing that the plaintiff first assaulted the defendant, and that the injuries complained of grew out of the assault by the plaintiff upon the defendant. In speaking of pleas in confession and avoidance, Perry's Common-Law Pleading, at page 273, says: "With respect to the quality of these pleadings, it is a rule that every pleading by way of confession and avoidance must give color. This is a rule which it is very essential to understand, in order to have a correct apprehension of the nature of these pleadings; yet it appears to have been not hitherto adequately explained or developed in the books of the science. Color is a term of the ancient rhetoricians, and was adopted at an early period into the language of pleading. As a term of pleading, it signifies an apparent or prima facie right; and the meaning of the rule, that every pleading in confession and avoidance must give color, is that it must admit an apparent right in the opposite party, and rely, therefore, on some new matter by which that apparent right is defeated."

The reason for the rule exists as well under our system of code pleading as it did under the common-law system of pleading. And, although forms have been abolished by the Code of Practice, the substance of the common-law rules of legal procedure remains, except where they conflict with the spirit of our statutory regulations upon the subject of pleading and pactice. R. & L. T. Co. v. Rogers, 7 Bush, 535.

Strictly speaking, therefore, a plea of son assault demesne, being by way of confession and avoidance, should admit the assault complained of, and rely upon the first assault by the plaintiff, to defeat plaintiff's case. But must such an admission be expressly made, or is it sufficient if it be distinctly implied from the matters set forth in the pleadings?

In Stephen on Pleading, star page 200, the rule as to the nature and properties of pleas in confession and avoidance is laid down as follows: "It was formerly the practice in many cases to frame such pleas with a formal confession or admission in terms, using the introductory phrase of 'True it is that,' etc., and then proceeding to plead in answer to the matter thus explicitly admitted. But this method is not required by the rules of pleading, and, with a view to brevity, is now generally abandoned. It is essential that the confession, though not express, should be distinctly implied in or inferable from the matter of the pleading. If a pleading, therefore, purporting to be by way of confession and avoidance, or, in other words, not pleaded by way of traverse, does not import a confession of the traversed allegations, it is defective and insufficient." See, also, star page 163 for the form of the plea of son assault demesne.

[3] It will be seen, therefore, that, while the second paragraph of the answer might well have been more specific in confessing the assault, and in alleging that the assault and the counterassault were one and the same, it nevertheless substantially shows that state of fact, and sufficiently complies with Stephen's rule. The seeming confusion between counsel arises from the fact that the first paragraph of the answer traverses the allegations of the petition, while the second paragraph is in confession and avoidance; and appellant, relying on the issue made by the first paragraph, claims the burden of proof, while appellee claims it under the second paragraph. Taking the two paragraphs together, or disregarding the first paragraph because of its insufficiency as a traverse, the answer is equivalent to a plea of son assault demesne.

[4] Where there is a plea of son assault demesne, the burden of proof is upon the defendant. Walls v. Robb, 15 Ky. Law Rep. 159; Phillips v. Mann, 44 S. W. 379, 19 Ky. Law Rep. 1705; Johnson v. Strong, 58 S. W. 430, 22 Ky. Law Rep. 577; Torain v. Terrell, 122 Ky. 745, 93 S. W. 10, 29 Ky. Law Rep. 306. But where the defendant merely traverses the allegations of the petition, or, in addition thereto, pleads distinct and separate matters by way of justification or excuse, but which do not amount to an assault, the burden is on the plaintiff to make out his case. Wilken v. Exterkamp, 102 Ky. 143, 42 S. W. 1140, 19 Ky. Law Rep. 1132; Finnell v. Bohannon, 44 S. W. 94, 19 Ky. Law Rep. 1587; Ryan v. Quinn, 71 S. W. 872, 24 Ky. Law Rep. 1517; Hess v. Hymson, 93 S. W. 9, 29 Ky. Law Rep. 327; Doerhoefer v. Shewmaker, 123 Ky. 646, 97 S. W. 7, 29 Ky. Law Rep. 1193.

As the answer, taken as a whole, presents a plea of son assault demesne, the case comes within the first class of cases, supra, and the burden was upon the defendant, the appellee in this case. In so holding the trial court ruled correctly.

Action by Mary F. Hopper against Charles W. Hopper and another. Judgment for defendants and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Myers & Howard, of Covington, for appellant. D. C. Lee and S. D. Rouse, both of Covington, for appellees.

NUNN, J. Appellant, Mary F. Hopper, is a widow about 68 years of age. Her husband died in Cincinnati, Ohio, several years ago, leaving her and several infant children, with a small estate. She bought a lot in the town of Bellevue, Ky., and with the help of her son, Charles Hopper, appellee, and her three daughters, when they arrived at a sufficient age, erected a house upon the lot. She borrowed some money from a building loan association in Bellevue to help erect the house, but by her own efforts and with the aid of her children she repaid the loan, and she was then the owner of the property, which was worth about $2,500, free of any lien. The mother and children then concluded that they would like to have a home in the country, so they bought a house and about four acres of ground from a man by the name of Graf, which was located at Crescent Springs, Kenton county, at the price of $3,900. To secure the money with which to make the first payment of $1,000 on this property, Mrs. Hopper executed a mortgage on her home to the building loan association, and executed a second mortgage for the same amount on the same property to meet the second payment. At about this time Charles Hopper married Georgia Noe Hopper, his coappellee. When the last purchase-money note on the Crescent Springs property fell due, appellee approached his mother and proposed to her that, if she would convey it to him, he would mortgage it to a building loan association in Covington, Ky., and raise the money to pay the note; that he would arrange to pay off the debt to the Covington association, and also the debts held against the Bellevue property, if she would allow the rents from the Bellevue property to go to him to aid in settling the matter. It was also expressly understood that Mrs. Hopper should have a home with her son on the Crescent Springs property so long as she lived, and that he was to furnish her with the necessaries of life. The mother and son were the only two witnesses who testified in the case, and they do not differ in any material degree. The mother conveyed the Crescent Springs property to her son, and moved there, intending to make her home, but soon became dissatisfied. The wife of appellee and his mother could not, for some reason not explained in the record, live together. Mrs. Hopper said she had rather live in the gutter the rest of her days than to live with her daughter-in-law. Appellee's wife complained to him about appellant's conduct, and appellant complained to him of his wife's conduct. The turmoil became so great that the mother left and went to her property in Bellevue. After this the son ceased making any payments on the Bellevue property and the association demanded its debts. Appellant having no means to pay the association, she sold the property, as she claims she was compelled to do, at a sacrifice. She received $250 in cash, and the purchaser assumed the mortgage debts.

[1] Appellant instituted this action to have the deed she made to her son conveying the Crescent Springs property set aside. Soon after she conveyed the property to her son, he deeded it to his wife as a gift. Upon a trial of the case, the lower court dismissed appellant's petition, stating that he was unable to find any proof of fraud on the part of appellee. We agree with the lower court in this respect. Every fact appearing in the record shows the son to be an excellent, industrious, and honorable young man. The record likewise shows that appellant was an intelligent and good woman, and the unfortunate circumstance, the falling out of the mother and daughter-in-law is to be regretted, but nevertheless it is a fact. The separation exists, and, according to the testimony, they cannot live together in peace. The court was right in not setting the deed aside for fraud; but appellant should have at least been adjudged a lien on the Crescent Springs property for her maintenance. She paid $2,000 of the purchase price of that property by placing mortgages on her Bellevue home. She is now old and without a home. For a time she worked, first one place then another, but finally received an injury which rendered her unable to make a living for herself. Under these circumstances, equity and justice demand that appellant should have back at least a portion of the money she paid on the Crescent Springs property, to enable her to live in some comfort the balance of her days. This ought to, and doubtless will, meet with the approval of her son. He carried out his part of the contract with his mother, until his wife and mother were unable to longer live together and the mother left his home. In our opinion, a lien should be declared on the Crescent Springs property for $1,500 in favor of appellant. It is to be subject, however, to the mortgage lien of the Covington Building Loan Association for money paid on the purchase price of the property.

[2] The wife of Charles Hopper took the conveyance for the property without paying any money consideration, therefore, as she knew of the equities of her mother-in-law in the property, declaring a lien upon the property to secure those equities will not disturb any pre-existing equities of the wife. Appellant is entitled to this relief under her general prayer for all equitable and proper relief. On the return of the case the lower court will adjudge the payments of this lien debt on the terms most agreeable to the mother and son, and if they fail to agree the court will then fix yearly payments least hurtful to appellee, but keeping in mind the maintenance of appellant.

For these reasons, the judgment is reversed, and case remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 288*) — SEPARATE MAINTENANCE — REFUSAL TO LIVE WITH HUSBAND.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Whitley County.

Sharp, Gatliff & Smith, of Williamsburg, for appellant. Stephens & Steeley, of Williamsburg, for appellee.

CARROLL, J. This suit was brought by appellant, the wife of appellee, to require him to pay her alimony in the sum of $500, upon the ground that he refused to permit her to live in his home and compelled her to take shelter with her parents. The appellee filed an answer and counterclaim, in which he averred that his wife left his home without any fault on his part, and he sought a divorce from her on statutory grounds. Pending the suit a child was born to appellant, and the lower court, upon the pleadings and evidence, granted the appellee a divorce upon his counterclaim, and ordered him to pay to appellant, for the support of the child, the sum of $300 and also attorney's fee, but refused to allow appellant anything for alimony. On this appeal she asks that the judgment declining to allow her alimony be reversed, with directions to the lower court to enter a judgment giving her alimony.

The weight of the evidence supports the contention of appellee that his wife abandoned him and his home without sufficient cause. He had provided her with as comfortable a home as his circumstances would permit, at a place where his business required him to be; but his wife was not satisfied with the place in which they lived, and desired that appellant should locate in the town in which her parents lived. He could not do this without losing the employment in which he was engaged, and upon his refusal to gratify her wishes in this respect she left his home and went to live with her parents. Under the circumstances she was not entitled to alimony.

The judgment is affirmed.

HOME PROTECTIVE ASS'N v. WILLIAMS.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Dec. 10, 1912.)

INSURANCE (§ 525*)—LIFE POLICY—DISABILITY CLAUSE—CONSTRUCTION—"CONFINED TO BED."

Under a life policy which provided that the insured should not be liable to a member for disability while convalescing from any disease, but that it should accept liability only for the actual time the member is necessarily and continuously "confined to bed," the insured could collect benefits if his sickness was such as would reasonably confine a person continuously to bed or substantially so confine him, though he may have been up at times to get fresh air or for other purposes.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 1310; Dec. Dig. § 525.*]

Extension of opinion. Reversed.

For former opinion, see 150 Ky. 134, 150 S. W. 11.

HOBSON, C. J. When this appeal was originally before us by a clerical error, the policy sued on had not been correctly copied into the transcript. See Home Protective Ass'n v. Williams, 150 Ky. 134, 150 S. W. 11. Since the opinion was delivered under an agreed stipulation of counsel, the original policy has been filed. One of its provisions, following that part of the policy which provides for the payments to be made by the company, is as follows: "From the amount of such payment shall, however, be deducted any disability benefits that may have been paid to said member. In case the above named member shall become wholly disabled by sickness or accident which shall produce visible marks upon the body, and which shall begin after thirty days continuous membership, the association will, upon satisfactory proof thereof, pay to said member, as a benefit for loss of time, $5.00 per week during the time the member is necessarily confined to his or her bed, beginning with the date of mailing notice to the home office, and for a period not to exceed ten weeks in any one year." Section 7 of the conditions indorsed on the policy, among other things, provided: "Neither shall the order be in any manner liable to the member for disability while convalescing from any disease; the order accepting liability only for the actual time the member is necessarily and continuously confined to bed and totally unable to follow his or her vocation. No allowance will be made for fractional parts of a week."

The court gave the jury this instruction: "The court instructs the jury that, if they believe from the evidence that prior to January 5, 1911, Willie Williams was totally unable to follow his vocation or do any labor, and by reason of such disability the defendant company was indebted to him in a sum sufficient to have carried the policy in suit and paid the premiums thereon up to the time of said Willie Williams' death, then and in that event the jury will find for the plaintiff; otherwise they will find for the defendant. The recovery in this case, if you find for plaintiff, not to exceed $300, the amount sued for." It will be observed that the instruction of the court entirely ignored the words "confined to bed" contained in the policy, and the propriety of this ruling is the question now to be determined on the appeal.

There are numerous cases in which the words "confined to the house" have come up for adjudication under similar policies. In Metropolitan Plate Glass & Casualty Ins. Co. v. Hawes, 150 Ky. 52, 149 S. W. 1110, we held that, under such a clause, it was not required that the insured should be confined all the time in the house, and that a recovery might be had where he was able at times to sit on the veranda and get fresh air under the advice of his physician. There are numerous other decisions to the same effect. See Breil v. Claus Groth Plattdutch-en Vereen, 84 Neb. 155, 120 N. W. 905, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 359, 18 Ann. Cas. 1110, and note thereto, in which a number of decisions on the subject are collected, the sum of the decisions being that such clauses must be given a reasonable construction, and that a recovery may be had where there is a substantial confinement to the house, although the assured occasionally goes out of the house to get air or sunshine or to see his physician, or for some other necessary purpose. We have been able to find but two cases construing the words "confined to bed," but we do not see any reason why the same principle should not be applied in construing these words. In Bradshaw v. Am. Benevolent Ass'n, 112 Mo. App. 435, 87 S. W. 46, the court said: "We would not, of course, hold that this clause meant that a patient must spend every minute in bed for his right to indemnity to accrue; but the manifest purpose of the policy was not to indemnify for loss of time due to sickness unless the patient was bedridden in a substantial sense. We suppose the purpose was to insure against such illness only as would keep the patient in bed and thereby diminish the danger of claims founded on feigned or exaggerated illness. Now to hold that a person who could take a trip to Texas, another to St. Louis, and who was able to be up and around when he chose, was confined to his bed would be to ignore one clause of the policy."

The question came before the same court again in Hays v. Am. Benevolent Ass'n, 127 Mo. App. 195, 104 S. W. 1141. In that case the jury had been instructed that the plaintiff might recover if he was bedridden, in a substantial sense, all of the time during the period of his sickness. Approving this instruction as the proper interpretation of the words "confined to bed," the court said: "The words employed must be viewed in the light of common sense, and there must be some reasonable construction placed upon the words 'entirely and continuously' when used in connection with requiring a sick person to keep his bed, otherwise one who is in fact so enfeebled by sickness as to be unable to bear the fatigue of being dressed by an attendant would forfeit his insurance by sitting propped up in a chair for a few moments or an hour, as a change from a reclining position upon the bed. Now, in the case at bar, the plaintiff's proof tended to show he was confined to his bed each and every day during the several months of his sickness. There were times when his dropsical affection rendered him unable to lie in bed, or elsewhere for that matter. He was compelled to sit up in order to breathe."

In the case at bar the insured had consumption. He was taken sick in June, 1910. One witness who testified as to his condition prior to the time of his death in July, 1911, said: "I don't think he was worse much the day he died than he was six months prior to that; he was just walking about virtually dead." There was other evidence that his condition was not so bad until a month or two before he died.

In lieu of instruction 1, the court should have instructed the jury as follows: (1) If the jury believe from the evidence that on and after January 5, 1911, Willie Williams was necessarily and continuously confined to bed and totally unable to follow his vocation, they should find for the plaintiff in the sum of $300. (2) The insured was necessarily and continuously confined to bed if his sickness was such as would reasonably confine a person continuously to bed or substantially so confine him, though he may have been up at times to get fresh air or for other purposes.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 654*)—WAYS—PERMISSIVE USE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Where a strip of land in front of a house was used as a walkway for 15 years after an apparent dedication, its owner, who asserts that the use was merely permissive, in an action for damages from the building of a concrete sidewalk under a city ordinance providing for such building and making the cost of the improvement a lien on the property, has the burden of showing that such use was only permissive.

ing a concrete pavement along her front property line, which abuts on Main (or Ferry) street in Calhoun. Calhoun is a municipal corporation of the fifth class. On August 6, 1909, its council enacted an ordinance requiring the construction of a brick or concrete sidewalk, of certain specifications, in front of the property of appellant and other citizens. One of the specifications was that, if the property owner failed or refused to construct such pavement, the city council would, after due notice, let the construction thereof to the lowest bidder, and the cost of the improvement would become a lien upon the property. Appellant failed to construct the sidewalk, so the city proceeded to have the work done in accordance with the ordinance. Appellant objected to the city placing the walk in front of her property. It was located between her fence and the gutter, in a space which was from 8 to 10 feet wide, and extended the full length of her property. The pavement was 4 feet wide, and a space was left between it and the fence and the gutter. There was no destruction of the property in any manner, except where it was absolutely necessary to locate the walkway as stated. Before 1893 the public traveled along the place where the walk is now located, on slabs which extended the full length of the property; but it appears from the testimony, without contradiction, that in 1893 appellant's husband, who then owned the property, together with several other citizens of the town, made up a fund, purchased material, and constructed a plank sidewalk where the slabs were, and where the concrete pavement now is, and it remained there and was used as a walkway until the concrete walk was constructed.

Appellant brought this action in April, 1911, to recover the value of the land covered by the concrete walk. It appears to us that she waited too long, as her husband appears to have dedicated this strip of land for a walkway prior to 1893, and the public has continuously used it as such from that time to the present, with the knowledge and consent of the owners. But appellant claims that this use was merely permissive, and that the statute did not run. There was no testimony to the effect that the use was merely permissive, and the burden, after a lapse of 15 years, was upon her to show that fact. Butt v. Napier, 14 Bush, 46; Talbott v. Thorn, 91 Ky. 417, 16 S. W. 88, 13 Ky. Law Rep. 401; Newcome v. Crews, 98 Ky. 339, 32 S. W. 947, 17 Ky. Law Rep. 899; Potts v. Clark, 62 S. W. 884, 23 Ky. Law Rep. 332; Bowen v. Cooper, 66 S. For these reasons, the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

CHESAPEAKE & O. RY. CO. v. DE ATLEY. (Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Dec. 10, 1912.)

1. PARENT AND CHILD (§ 7*)—RIGHT OF ACTION FOR INJURIES TO CHILD.

A parent who has not emancipated a child may recover for loss of services and medical care and attention on account of injuries received in the employment of a person employing the child with notice of the minority, but not where he had emancipated such child, or where the child was employed without notice of the minority.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Parent and Child, Cent. Dig. §§ 86-99; Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

2. PARENT AND CHILD (§ 7*)—ACTION FOR INJURIES—WEIGHT AND SUFFICIENCY.

In a father's action for injuries to his son while in defendant's employ, evidence held to show that the father consented that his son might work for himself, and surrendered his right to his control and services.

3. PARENT AND CHILD (§ 7*)—RIGHT OF ACTION FOR INJURIES TO CHILD.

A father, who voluntarily permits a grown son to work for himself in a neighboring county for more than a year without making any effort to control his conduct or employment, although he knows that he is employed, and can easily ascertain the character of his employment, and who permits the son to receive and spend his own wages, cannot recover from the employer for injuries sustained by the son in such employment, since he has impliedly, if not expressly, emancipated the son.

4. PARENT AND CHILD (§ 7*)—RIGHT OF ACTION FOR WAGES OR PERSONAL SERVICES.

A stranger exercising reasonable care to ascertain the age of a person applying for employment whose appearance indicates that he is over 21 years of age is not liable to such person's father for personal injuries sustained by the son, although the son is, in fact, under 21 years of age when employed.

5. PARENT AND CHILD (§ 7*)—RIGHT OF ACTION FOR INJURIES—EMPLOYER'S KNOWLEDGE OF MINORITY.

Where a minor, when employed by a railroad company, misstates his age in his application by advice of the company's clerk, and, when subsequently employed in an entirely different department of the road, again misstates his age, in reliance on the advice previously given, the company is not charged with knowledge that he is a minor, so as to render it liable to his father for personal injuries.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Mason County. Action by W. L. De Atley against the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Worthington, Cochran & Browning, of Maysville, for appellant. Allan D. Cole, of Maysville, and Holmes & Ross, of Carlisle, for appellee.

CARROLL, J. John De Atley, a minor, was injured while working for the appellant, and this action was brought by the appellee, his father, to recover from the appellant damages for the loss of the services of his son during the time he was unable to work on account of the injuries, and reimbursement for amounts he had paid out in furnishing medical service and attention to him during the time he was suffering from the injuries. He averred that his son was employed by appellant without his knowledge or consent, and received injuries while engaged for it in the performance of dangerous work. For answer the appellant, after traversing the averments of the petition, affirmatively pleaded that, when it employed John De Atley, it believed he was of age, and had no knowledge or information that he was under 21 years of age, and could not have obtained such information by the exercise of ordinary care. It further pleaded that the appellee knew that his son was working for it as an employé in its train service, and that he permitted him to continue in the service without objection. It further averred that appellee had emancipated his son and voluntarily relinquished all right to control his employment or to have the benefit of his services, and, this being so, had no cause of action upon the grounds stated. Upon a trial before a jury a verdict was returned in favor of appellee for $500, and a reversal of the judgment on this verdict is asked upon the single ground that the trial court should have directed a verdict in its favor.

[1] If appellee had not emancipated his son, and he was employed by appellant without the consent of appellee and with notice of his minority and received injuries while in this employment, then appellee was entitled to recover, not only for the loss of the service of his son while unable to work on account of injuries received, but also the money necessarily expended by him in giving to his son medical care and attention. McGarr v. National & Providence Worsted Mills, 24 R. I. 447, 53 Atl. 320, 60 L. R. A. 122, 96 Am. St. Rep. 749; Dennis v. Clark, 2 Cush. (Mass.) 347, 48 Am. Dec. 671; Meers v. McDowell, 110 Ky. 926, 62 S. W. 1013, 23 Ky. Law Rep. 461, 53 L. R. A. 789, 96 Am. St. Rep. 475; Illinois Central Ry. Co. v. Henon, 68 S. W. 456, 24 Ky. Law Rep. 298; L. & N. R. R. v. Willis, 83 Ky. 57, 4 Am. St. Rep. 124. But if appellee had emancipated his son, or if appellant employed him without notice of his minority, he was not entitled to compensation for loss of his services, or to be reimbursed for amounts expended by him in care and attention to his son during the time he was suffering from the injuries received. When the father loses by manumission the right to control the services of his son, who is old enough to work for himself and make his own living, he also loses the right to recover from the person in whose service his son was engaged the amount expended by him in care and attention to his son, made necessary by injuries received while so employed, as the right to recover for this expense depends on the right to recover for loss of service. In such a state of case the right of action to recover for lost time and medical expenses is in the son, not the father. Rounds Bros. v. McDaniel, 133 Ky. 669, 118 S. W. 956, 134 Am. St. Rep. 482, 19 Ann. Cas. 826.

[2] This being the law applicable to the case on this point as we understand it, we will now look into the evidence for the purpose of determining whether or not the appellee had emancipated his son before he accepted employment with appellant. The evidence shows that the son, John De Atley, was born in September, 1891, and lived with the appellee, his father, until December, 1909, when he left home and went to a relative of his father's in Bourbon county, Ky., to assist him in stripping tobacco. He remained in Bourbon county for about 10 days, and went from there to Covington, Ky., at which place another relative of his father's lived.

While he was in Bourbon county his father testifies that he went to see him twice, but did not succeed in finding him, and that he supposed he went away from home because he wanted to work for himself. He further testifies that, after he went to Covington, his mother received a letter or two from him, which she answered, but that he did not know his address in Covington, although he heard he was living there and was working at a wholesale whisky house, and that he took no steps to find out where he was, as he expected he would get homesick and come back. He also said he did not write to his brother-in-law who lived in Covington, although he suspected that his son was making his home with him, or that he knew where his son was, and that he did not send his son any money, nor did his son send him any. He was asked these questions: "Q. From the time your son left your home in Bourbon county, in the fall of 1909, until he was injured in January, 1911, you acquiesced in his remaining away from home and at work, and permitted him to do this without requiring any portion of his wages to be sent to you? A. I never gave him any authority to work for anybody. Q. But you permitted him to work away from home for other people without requiring his wages to be sent to you? A. No, sir; he never worked away from home. Q. Did you think he was living without expense? A. I allowed the boy was trying to earn his wages. Q. You knew he had to have money to live on away from home, didn't you? A. I suppose a man could not live without doing something. Q. You knew that six or eight months prior to the time of his injury you had heard he was at work? A. I heard it rumored about the house. Q. And that he was working in a whisky house in Covington? A. I heard it.

Q. You never went to Covington to ascertain his whereabouts? A. I never went for the reason I had bought a little place, and didn't have the money to spend running around hunting the boy. Q. Did you know the name of the whisky house? A. No, sir. Q. Did you ever try to find out? A. No, sir. Q. Did you write to your son in Covington, or to your brother-in-law in Covington, to ascertain where he was, or for whom he was working? A. No, sir; I did not. Q. Did you undertake to ascertain just exactly where he was and just exactly what he was doing, in order that you might write him to get a portion of his wages to assist you? A. I did not. Q. Guy Bell told you he was in Covington and was not coming home Christmas? A. He did not think he was. He was thinking of going on the railroad. Q. When you heard that he was going on the railroad, why didn't you go and see him? A. I just said it looked like times were pretty hard, and as I was in debt and didn't have the money to spend. Q. But you had notice, that your son intended to go to work on the railroad? A. I heard he was thinking of going on the railroad, and I said to Guy: 'You tell him it is against my will to go to work on any railroad, and to come home.'

John De Atley, the son, says that, when he left home, he went to his uncle's in Bourbon county, and remained there about two weeks, and went from there to his uncle's in Covington, and after being there three or four weeks got employment as a laborer with the appellant company, and worked for it about three months, and then got employment in a whisky house in Covington, and worked there about six months, when he again went back to work for the railroad company as a brakeman, and continued in this employment until he was injured in January, 1911. He further testifies that, when he first obtained employment from the appellant company, he was sent to a clerk to make out a written application, and, when he told the clerk that he was born in 1891, the clerk told him that his minority would prevent him from getting employment, and suggested to him that he say in his application that he was born in 1889, and this he did. He also testified that when he was employed the second time as a brakeman, by another and different department, he filled out his own application, giving the date of his birth as 1889, doing this because he had been told by the clerk to give this date if he ever afterwards applied for employment. He says that, when he was employed the second time, he was not asked his age and did not tell it, although he himself made out the written application in which his age was given as over 21. When the son left home, he was between 18 and 19 years of age, and, when he was employed the second time by the appellant company, in December, 1910, he was between 19 and 20 years of age, and the evidence shows that his appearance indicated that he was over 21 years of age.

We think the evidence shows very plainly that the father consented that his son might work for himself, and that he surrendered his right to the control and services of his son. The boy was old enough and large enough to make his own living, and although he worked for more than a year within a hundred miles of his father, who all this time knew where he was, he made no effort to reclaim his services, nor did he do anything indicating that he desired to exert any further paternal control over him.

[3] This course of conduct on the part of the father amounted to an implied, if not an express, emancipation of his son. A father who voluntarily permits his grown son to work for himself in a neighboring county, and who knows where his son is employed, or at least knows that he is employed, can easily ascertain the character of his employment, and who permits him to remain away from home more than a year without making any effort to control his conduct or his employment, and the son receives and spends his own wages, in short, acts in all respects as if he had reached his majority, the father cannot, when the son receives some injury, assert claim of parental authority, and recover from the employer of the son compensation. L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Davis, 105 S. W. 455, 32 Ky. Law Rep. 306; Mauck v. Southern Ry. Co., 148 Ky. 122, 146 S. W. 28; Rounds Bros. v. McDaniel, 133 Ky. 669, 118 S. W. 956, 134 Am. St. Rep. 482, 19 Ann. Cas. 326.

[4] There is another reason why the appellee should not recover in this case. When the son was employed in December, 1910, as a brakeman, in which employment he received the injuries that are the basis of the recovery sought in this action, his appearance indicated that he was 21 years of age, and a written application, made out by himself, gave his age as over 21. Under this state of facts, the appellant is not liable to the father upon the ground that it employed his minor son. In actions like this the father is not entitled to recover unless the employer of his son knows, or in the exercise of reasonable prudence and care could know, that the son was an infant. A stranger who exercises reasonable care to ascertain the age of a person making application for employment, and whose appearance indicates that he is over 21 years of age, cannot be made liable in an action by the father, either for the services of his son or for care and attention given to him while suffering from injuries received in the course of the employment, although the son may in fact have been under 21 years of age when he was employed. Gulf, Colorado & Santa Fé R. Co. v. Redeker, 67 Tex. 190, 2 S. W. 527, 60 Am. Rep. 20; Illinois Central R. R. Co. v. Henon,

[5] The attempt, however, is made to overcome this principle by the testimony of the son that, when he was first employed, the clerk who took his application advised him to give 1889 as the date of his birth, also telling him that if he was afterwards employed and required to state his age to give 1889 as the date of his birth, although the clerk knew that he was born in 1891. Assuming that in giving the date of his birth incorrectly in the written statement made by him when he was first employed by the appellant company in January, 1910, he was induced to do so by the advice of the clerk, this did not excuse him from the consequences of giving an incorrect date when he was employed the second time, nor did the advice of the clerk charge the company with notice that when he was employed the second time he was in fact a minor. His employment the second time was in an entirely different department of the road from the one in which he worked under his first employment, and there is no suggestion in the record that any person connected with the railroad company at the time of the second employment had any knowledge or information of the misstatement made in his first application, or of the advice given to him by the clerk who took it.

The motion for a peremptory instruction should have been sustained. The judgment is reversed, with directions for a new trial in conformity with this opinion.

ÆTNA LIFE INS. CO. et al. v. RUSTIN.

1. TRIAL (§ 25*)—RIGHT TO OPEN AND CLOSE.

In an action on an insurance policy, where defendants denied the allegations of the petition, and also pleaded that insured either killed himself or procured another to kill him, a motion for leave to make the concluding argument was properly overruled, since under the pleadings, if no evidence had been given on either side, plaintiff would have been defeated.

2. INSURANCE (§ 665*)—ACTIONS ON POLICIES—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—CAUSE OF DEATH.

In an action on an accident insurance policy in which defendants pleaded that insured either killed himself or procured another to kill him, evidence that he was found on his porch shot in the abdomen, and said that a man had shot him, made a prima facie case for plaintiff.

3. TRIAL (§ 62*)—RECEPTION OF EVIDENCE—REBUTTAL.

The trial court has a discretion in permitting the introduction of evidence in rebuttal.

4. INSURANCE (§ 669*)—ACTIONS ON POLICIES—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action on policies insuring a person against death resulting directly and independently of all other causes from bodily injuries effected solely through external, violent, and accidental means, where there was evidence that he was found shot, and said a man had shot him, and evidence tending to show that he either shot himself or procured some one to shoot him, instructions that if the wound causing his death was inflicted accidentally, either by himself or another, or intentionally by another without his consent or procurement, the law was in his favor, but if he committed suicide, sane or insane, or if the wound was inflicted intentionally by another with his consent or procurement the law was for defendants, and the jury should so find—properly submitted the case as made by the evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 1556, 1771-1784; Dec. Dig. § 669.*]

5. INSURANCE (§ 665*)—ACTIONS ON POLICIES—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—CAUSE OF DEATH.

A policy of insurance provided for payment of a specified sum upon the death of insured through external, violent, and accidental means, and in the clause containing the promise to pay contained no qualification or exception or reference to a subsequent part of the policy providing that in case of death from injuries intentionally inflicted upon insured by another person, except assault committed for the purpose of burglary or robbery, only one-tenth of the principal sum should be paid. The evidence in an action thereon tended to show that insured was shot on the porch of his residence by some unknown man, but showed nothing else tending to show an assault for robbery or burglary. Held, that the rule that if on one state of facts plaintiff may recover, and on another not, and the evidence tends no more strongly to prove the first state of facts than the second, no recovery can be had, did not apply because the burden was on defendant to allege and prove the facts limiting its liability.

6. INSURANCE (§ 629*)—ACTION ON POLICY—NECESSITY OF NEGATING EXCEPTIONS.

Where a policy contains a general clause containing a promise to pay without any reference to a subsequent separate and distinct clause containing limitations on the liability under the policy, a party relying on the general clause may plead it without noticing the exception.

7. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1003*)—REVIEW—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE TO SUPPORT VERDICT.

A verdict will be disturbed on appeal as unsupported by the evidence only when it is palpably against the evidence, and not in every case where the appellate court would on the evidence reach a different conclusion.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jefferson County, Common Pleas Branch, First Division. Action by Grace H. Rustin against the Ætina Life Insurance Company and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Marion W. Ripy and Bennett H. Young, both of Louisville, for appellant Casualty Co. Fred Forcht, Jr., of Louisville, and Edwin A. Jones, of New York City, for appellant Fidelity & Casualty Co. Trabue, Doolan & Cox, of Louisville, and William BroSmith and R. C. Dickenson, both of Hartford, Conn., for appellant Travelers' Ins. Co. Kohn, Bingham, Sloss & Spindle, of Louisville, for appellant Ætina Life Ins. Co. T. J. Mahoney, of Omaha, Neb., and Wm. Marshall Bullitt and Bruce & Bullitt, all of Louisville, for appellee.

HOBSON, C. J. These suits were brought by Grace H. Rustin against appellants to recover on certain policies issued by them on the life of her husband, Dr. Frederick Rustin of Omaha, Neb. The policies insured against death "resulting directly and independently of all other causes from bodily injuries effected solely through external, violent and accidental means." The defendants denied the allegations of the petition, and pleaded, in substance, that Dr. Rustin either killed himself or procured another to kill him. There was a trial before a jury which resulted in a judgment in favor of the plaintiff. The defendants appeal.

[1] 1. It is urged that the appellants had the burden and were entitled to the concluding argument, but they did not assert this at the opening of the trial, and nothing was said about it until the evidence had all been introduced, and the court had given the jury his instructions. The defendants then asked to be allowed to make the concluding argument. The motion was properly overruled. Under the pleadings, if no evidence had been given on either side, the plaintiff would have been defeated. Civil Code, § 526.

[2] 2. The court did not err in refusing to instruct the jury peremptorily to find for the defendants at the conclusion of the plaintiff's evidence. If the evidence for the plaintiff was true, a prima facie case was made out for her. Hutchcraft v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 87 Ky. 300, 8 S. W. 570, 10 Ky. Law Rep. 260, 12 Am. St. Rep. 484; Campbell v. Fidelity & Casualty Co., 109 Ky. 661, 60 S. W. 492, 22 Ky. Law Rep. 1295. Her proof showed that her husband was found on the porch of his residence shot in the abdomen, and that he said when found that a man had shot him. It is not presumed on these facts that he procured a man to shoot him, or that he had done anything wrong which brought on the shooting.

[3] 3. There was no substantial error in the introduction of evidence in rebuttal. The trial court has a discretion in this matter and we do not see that it was abused.

[4] 4. The court by its instructions clearly submitted to the jury the issue. By the first instruction he told the jury as follows: "If the jury believe from the evidence that the wound which caused the death of Frederick Rustin was inflicted accidentally, either by himself or by another, or that it was inflicted intentionally by another without the consent or procurement of Frederick Rustin, then the law is for the plaintiff." The second instruction is in these words: "But if the jury believe from the evidence that Frederick Rustin committed suicide, sane or insane, or that the wound which caused his death was inflicted intentionally by another with the consent or procurement of Frederick Rustin, then the law is for each of the four defendants named in the foregoing instruction and the jury should so find."

These instructions aptly submitted to the jury the case as made by the evidence as to the first three appellants. The policy issued by the Travelers' Insurance Company is as follows:

"The Travelers' Insurance Company of Hartford, Connecticut, in consideration of the warranties hereinafter set forth, and of twenty-five dollars, does hereby insure Frederick Rustin of Omaha, county of Douglas, state of Nebraska, under classification preferred (being a physician by occupation) for the term of twelve months from September 13th, 1904, against bodily injuries effected through external, violent and accidental means, as specified in the schedule below. The principal sum of this policy in the first year is $5,000.00, with 5% increase annually for ten years amounts to $7,500.00. Each consecutive full year's renewal of this policy shall add 5 per cent. to the principal sum of the first year until such additions shall amount to 50 per cent., and thenceforth so long as this policy is maintained in force the insurance shall be for the original sums plus the accumulations theretofore granted.

"Schedule of Indemnities. [Here follows schedule.]

"In event of death the principal sum insured shall be paid to Grace H. Rustin [the beneficiary] if surviving, otherwise to the executors, administrators, or assigns of the insured.

"Weekly Indemnity. [Here follows provisions as to weekly indemnity.]"

The policy then contains under the head of double payments and special payments provisions on these subjects. These are followed by other clauses on the second page of the policy limiting the liability of the company in certain contingencies. One of these clauses is as follows: "In the event of death, loss of limb or sight, or disability caused by gas, vapor or poison, or by injuries intentionally inflicted upon the insured by any other person, sane or insane (except assaults committed for purpose of burglary or robbery), the company shall pay but one-tenth of the amount otherwise payable for bodily injuries covered hereby, anything to the contrary in this policy notwithstanding."

As to the Travelers' Insurance Company the court instructed the jury as follows:

"(a) If the jury believe from the evidence that the wound which caused the death of Frederick Rustin was inflicted accidentally, either by himself or by another, or that it was inflicted intentionally by another, without the consent or procurement of Frederick Rustin, in an assault committed by such other person, if any, for the purpose of burglary or robbery, then the law is for the plaintiff as against the Travelers' Insurance Company, and the jury should award the plaintiff the sum of $5,870, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum from January 10, 1909.

"(b) If the jury believe from the evidence that the wound which caused his death was inflicted intentionally by another, without the consent or procurement of Frederick Rustin, and not in an assault committed by such other person, if any, for the purpose of burglary or robbery, then the law is for the plaintiff as against the defendant, the Travelers' Insurance Company, and the jury should award the plaintiff the sum of $587, with interest thereon at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum from January 10, 1909.

"(c) But if the jury believe from the evidence that Frederick Rustin committed suicide, sane or insane, or that the wound which caused his death was inflicted intentionally by another with the consent or procurement of Frederick Rustin, then the law is for the defendant, the Travelers' Insurance Company, and the jury should so find.

"(d) 'Burglary,' as used in these instructions, means the breaking and entering of a dwelling house of another in the nighttime with the intent to commit a felony therein. 'Robbery' means the taking with intent to steal of personal property, in possession of another, from his person, or in his presence, by violence or by putting him in fear."

[5] The jury found for the plaintiff the full amount of the insurance, and the company insists it can be held liable in any event under the evidence for only 10 per cent. of the amount of the policy.

The evidence as to how Dr. Rustin came to his death is by no means satisfactory. Between 2 and 3 o'clock in the morning a pistol shot was heard. His wife, who was upstairs, went down to the front door, and there found her husband shot in the abdomen. No one heard any altercation in the street or on the front porch where he was found. No pistol was found on him or about him. Where he had been for two or three hours before this is not shown by the evidence, and no one knows how he came to his residence. The sound of the pistol indicated that it was fired on the porch or near the front of the house. No one was seen or heard running therefrom. His pocketbook and watch were upon his person, and no other fact was established in the evidence tending to show an assault for robbery or burglary. He did not explain how he came to be shot except to say that a man shot him. If he was shot by another accidentally, the full amount of the policy may be recovered, but, if he was shot by another intentionally, the full amount of the policy cannot be recovered, unless the shooting was done in an assault committed for the purpose of burglary or robbery.

We have held in a number of cases that if on one state of case the plaintiff may recover, and on another he cannot recover, and the evidence for the plaintiff tends no more strongly to prove the first state of case than the second, no recovery can be had. It is insisted for the Travelers' Insurance Company that this rule should be applied here, as the evidence fails to show how the shooting occurred. But the argument misapplies the rule. The rule has been applied only in those cases where the plaintiff had to show a certain state of facts in order to recover, and the evidence offered by the plaintiff to show these facts tended no more strongly to establish them than it did to establish another state of facts under which the defendant would not be liable. The plaintiff here made out a prima facie case when she showed that her husband had been shot, for the presumption against suicide was strengthened by the proof that no pistol was found about him or about the premises, and the nature of his wound was such that he must have been shot practically where he was when found. In addition to this, he said when found that a man had shot him. As the plaintiff had thus made out her case, it then devolved on the defendant to show that the clause limiting its liability applied. It will be observed that in the general clause of the policy containing the defendant's promise to pay there is no qualification or exception and no reference to the subsequent part of the policy containing the limitations upon its liability.

[6] In Stephens on Pleading, side page 443, the learned author, after showing that an exception contained in the general clause must be negatived, adds: "Hence, if a statute or a private instrument contain in it, first, a general clause, and afterwards a separate and distinct clause, which has the effect of taking out of the general clause something which would otherwise be included in it, a party relying on the general clause in pleading may set out that clause only, without noticing the separate and distinct clause which operates as an exception." Under this rule, it was unnecessary for the plaintiff to allege facts showing that the limiting clause did not apply, and, it not being necessary for her to allege these facts, it was not necessary that she should in the first place prove them. The burden was on the defendant both to allege and prove them, and it was a question for the jury on all the evidence in what manner the deceased came to his death. The case therefore for the Travelers' Insurance Company is practically the same as for the other defendants.

[7] 6. The ground chiefly relied on for reversal as to all the appellants is that the verdict is palpably against the evidence. We have gone over the record with great care, and have made an abstract of the testimony which we have placed with it. Our conclusion is on this branch of the case that we ought not to disturb the finding of the jury. It would serve no good end to extend this opinion by setting out the evidence in detail. There is much in the proof offered by defendants to sustain their view. But, after all, the case turned largely on the credibility of the witnesses, and, in view of all the facts and circumstances, we cannot say that the verdict of the jury is palpably against the evidence.

The constitutional guaranty of trial by jury would be of little value if new trials were granted by the court in all cases where on all the evidence it seemed as probable to the court that a state of case existed under which the defendant was not liable, as that a state of case existed under which the defendant was liable. As the law has established this means of trial, the verdict of the jury must stand, unless we can say that it is palpably against the evidence. It is not sufficient that we would have reached a different conclusion. There is much evidence on behalf of the defendants tending to show that Dr. Rustin either shot himself or procured another to shoot him, and not a few circumstances tending to support this conclusion. But a great part of this evidence comes from a woman of confessedly bad character, and from a man confessedly mentally unbalanced. While their testimony is in some respects confirmed by other evidence, we all know how the effect of a fact may be changed by a slight coloring of its setting. The jury had a right in their discretion to give little weight to the testimony of these witnesses, and, if we leave out of view their testimony, the keystone of the arch of appellants' defense is taken away.

Judgment affirmed.

OWEN et al. v. BURKS.

1. WILLS (§ 602*)—ESTATES GRANTED—DEFERRED FEE.

A will devising property in trust for the sons of the testatrix during life, with a further provision that if either of them should die before the final distribution of the estate, directed to be made by the trustee, without leaving bodily heirs, the portion devised to the decedent should vest in the survivor; and that if both should die, without bodily heirs, before distribution, the property should go to designated persons. Held that, after the final distribution of the estate, the reversionary interest granted was defeated, and must be considered to have remained in the testatrix, and to have passed by inheritance to her children, so that a survivor would hold a fee defeasible by his having children at the time of his death.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 1351-1359; Dec. Dig. § 602.*]

2. TRUSTS (§ 193½*)—CREATION BY WILL—SALE AND REINVESTMENT OF PROPERTY.

Where property devised in trust for the children of testatrix produced very little income, the court properly permitted its sale and the reinvestment of the sum secured in other property, title thereto to be taken in a trustee, as required by the will, where the reinvestment would be advantageous.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Hart County.

Action by Lee O. Burks against Jordon Owen and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Watkins & Carden, of Munfordville, for appellants. McCandless & Larimore, of Munfordville, for appellee.

TURNER, J. [1] Mrs. Cleopatra Chapline died in Hart county in 1895, having first made her will; and the construction of that will is the only thing involved in this appeal. The third, fifth, and sixth clauses thereof are as follows, to wit:

"3. I give and bequeath to my brother Jordon Owen the sum of one thousand dollars, in trust for the use and benefit of my son Lee O. Burks to be held by said trustee and by him invested in real estate as soon as same can be properly done and advantageously done, and said land to be by him held as aforesaid in trust for the use and benefit of said Lee O. Burks, during his life and at his death to descend to his children should he leave any surviving him.

"5. It is my will and desire that after my death my executor shall sell all my personal estate and also the tract of land upon which I now live known as the home place, and that he shall sell same either publicly or privately as he may deem best and in order to enable him to carry out this provision, he is hereby vested with full power and authority to sell and convey said land by deed or deeds of conveyance with covenant of general warranty in as full and ample a manner as I myself might or could do if present and acting in the premises, and it is my desire that the proceeds of the sales of said property and remainder of my estate from all sources whatsoever shall be divided between my two sons Lee O. Burks and C. H. Burks in such manner as to give to my said son C. H. Burks ($900.00) nine hundred dollars more thereof than to my son Lee O. Burks for the reason that my said son C. H. Burks has been denied the educational advantages enjoyed by his brother Lee O. and has also given much of his time and attention to caring for me in the long illness through which I have passed, and it is my will and desire that the portion of my said estate herein devised to my said son Lee O. Burks shall be invested by the trustee aforesaid in real estate to be held by him in trust for my said son during his life and to descend to his children should any be left by him at his death, but the trustee Jordon Owen is not to be charged nor become liable to pay any interest on either of the funds herein set apart for the use of the said Lee O. Burks or the said C. H. Burks during the existence of said trusts.

"6. It is further my will and desire that in the event that either of my said sons Lee O. or C. H. Burks shall die before the final distribution of my estate hereunder without leaving bodily heirs, then the portion of such decedent herein devised shall vest in the survivor, and if both of my said sons shall so die without leaving bodily heirs then I desire that one half of the property herein devised to them shall descend to my brother Jordon Owen and the other half thereof to be equally divided between my nieces Lizzie and Pearl Smith, Lizzie Owen daughter of my brother David R. Owen and my nephew Charles Smith."

She appointed her brother Jordon Owen executor, and he, as such, in March, 1898, made a final settlement of his accounts. Thereafter, in 1900 or 1901, her son C. H. Burks died, never having been married, and leaving no child. This suit was instituted by the appellee, Lee O. Burks, alleging that the appellants Jordon Owen and others, under the sixth clause of the will aforesaid, were claiming an interest in a tract of land which had been conveyed in trust to Jordon Owen, as his trustee, under his mother's will, and asserting in himself a fee-simple title therein, and praying the court to quiet his title as against their claims and to adjudge him the owner thereof in fee simple, and praying in the alternative that if the court was of opinion that his title to said property might be defeated, in the event he had a child surviving him, that the property be sold and reinvested in property in Louisville, where he lived, and setting up certain reasons why the reinvestment should be made.

To this petition the appellants Jordon Owen and others filed their answers, setting up their claim to a reversionary interest in the property under the above provisions of the will, in the event that Lee O. Burks should die without a child surviving him. On a demurrer to these pleadings the lower court held that the appellee had a defeasible fee in the property, subject to be defeated only by his death with a child or children surviving him; and that the appellants had no interest whatever, under the will of the testatrix, in the property. The contingency in which the appellants were to take the property, to wit, the death of both Lee O. and C. H. Burks before the final distribution of the estate, without leaving bodily heirs, did not occur, and cannot now occur, for the estate has been finally settled; and, the testatrix having made no further provision for the reversionary interest, except in that contingency, that reversion was left in her, and as to it she died intestate, and at her death C. H. and Lee O. Burks inherited the same. Therefore Lee O. Burks, having taken a life estate under the will and inherited the reversion from his mother in the property sought to be sold, took a defeasible fee therein, subject to be defeated only by having a child or children living at the time of his death. Alexander v. De Kermel, 81 Ky. 351; Pryor v. Castleman, 7 S. W. 892, 9 Ky. Law Rep. 967; Coots v. Yewell, 95 Ky. 368, 25 S. W. 597, 26 S. W. 179, 16 Ky. Law Rep. 2.

[2]/It appears that the appellee received very little income from the farm in Hart county, and that its proceeds could probably be advantageously reinvested in the city of Louisville, where he lived; and the lower court properly ordered the sale of the farm and a reinvestment of the proceeds, the title to be taken to some trustee and held under the provisions of Mrs. Chapline's will.

Judgment affirmed.

HOWARD v. CORNETT et al

DEEDS (§ 114*)—PROPERTY CONVEYED—CONFLICTING DESCRIPTIONS.

The language of the whole deed, as well as the surrounding facts and circumstances, being required to be considered in ascertaining the intention, a deed, though boundaries given by it of the tract excluded 20 acres of the farm, within which was a graveyard, having concluded said "boundary being known as the N. farm, except one-fourth acre, it being a graveyard with the right of way to go to and from same," and the grantee having for years afterwards had undisputed possession, will be held to include the 20 acres; the exception of the quarter acre being otherwise senseless.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Harlan County.

Two actions, consolidated, one by A. B. Cornett and another, the other by W. S. Blanton, both against N. H. Howard. From judgments for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Reversed, with directions to dismiss.

W. F. Hall, of Harlan, for appellant. J. G. & J. S. Forester and Chas. G. Mutzenberg, all of Harlan, for appellees.

NUNN, J. Thirty or forty years ago Robert Napier owned about 400 acres of land on what is known as "Bob's Creek" in Harlan county, Ky. It laid in one irregular body and was covered by several patents; three in his name, two in the name of William Farmer, one in the name of James Farmer, and one in the name of Jonathan Kelly. This 400-acre survey also conflicted with a 1,000-acre patent in the name of Lewis Farmer and another 1,000-acre patent issued to John Ledford and Robert Napier. These two 1,000-acre patents also conflicted with each other, and this court settled the rights of the owners of these two patents in the case of Hall v. Blanton, 77 S. W. 1110, 25 Ky. Law Rep. 1400. Robert Napier inclosed and cultivated a considerable portion of his 400-acre patent, and it was about 20 acres of this inclosed and cultivated land that the lower court gave Blanton in the judgment appealed from. This inclosed land was near the dwelling house of Napier and contained an orchard and graveyard. Appellee W. S. Blanton married a daughter of Robert Napier, and, after the death of Napier, he purchased all the interests of the other children in the land referred to, resided upon and cultivated the land for many years, and sold it April 30, 1901, to W. S. Hensley for $4,000, moved away, and gave Hensley possession of the whole farm. The deed to Hensley attempted to give the boundary of the land; but it appears from the plat of the survey on file in the record and the evidence that the calls in the deed did not fit the actual boundary of the land in several particulars. Evidently, Blanton had lived upon the farm for such a long time he thought he could and attempted to give the exact location of the whole outside boundary of the farm from memory and failed in several particulars. The deed, after attempting to give the outside boundaries as stated, concluded with these words: "Same boundary being known as the R. Napier farm, except one-fourth acre, it being a graveyard with the right of way to go to and from same." It is certain that Blanton sold, attempted to and did convey the R. Napier farm, and the 20 acres of improved land recovered by Blanton in the judgment below was a part of the R. Napier farm. Hensley sold and conveyed this farm to Charles Hall, who sold it to N. H. Howard, appellant herein. In both of the deeds last mentioned, the 20 acres was included. The error made in the deed from Blanton to Hensley was not made in these deeds. Since 1901, the date of the deed from Blanton to Hensley, the R. Napier farm, including the land in contest, has been in the possession of and cultivated by the purchasers; and Blanton has exercised no control whatever over it, except several years after he sold it and, after appellant Howard had purchased it, he gave Howard notice not to trespass upon this disputed piece. It is evident to our minds that some time after Blanton conveyed the land he discovered that the calls in the deed made by him to Hensley did not include the land in dispute, and from that time he began, orally, to make some claim to it, and in 1905

he executed a mortgage upon it to A. B. Cornett and J. F. Skidmore to secure the payment of $600. He says he received from Cornett and Skidmore as much as $20 in cash; that they paid some fines for him and, to use his language, "a part of the consideration for this mortgage debt was that they were to take the property and keep thieves and rogues from stealing it."

This action was instituted by Cornett and Skidmore to enforce their mortgage lien, and Howard answered claiming the land. There is consolidated with this action, one brought by Blanton against N. H. Howard and one Asher in which he sued them for damages for trespass upon the land and cutting timber and for opening roads through the land in dispute. The actions were tried together, and the lower court enjoined appellant and Asher from trespassing upon the land and adjudged Blanton to be the owner of the small piece of land referred to and enforced appellees' lien. Much testimony is introduced showing that the land in dispute, or nearly all of it, was included in the patent boundary of Lewis Farmer for 1,000 acres and also in his patent for 400 acres, and there was also much evidence introduced showing the contrary. However, from the view we take of the case, after a careful examination of the record, it is unnecessary to pass upon this question. We are of the opinion that Blanton intended to sell and that Hensley thought he bought the whole of the R. Napier farm. It is not reasonable to suppose that Hensley thought, when he accepted the deed from Blanton, that he was not to get the orchard and this 15 or 20 acres of cleared land near his house which had been used and cultivated by Napier in his lifetime and by Blanton up to the time he made the deed to Hensley. There is also a statement in the deed which is inconsistent with the idea that Blanton retained the property in controversy; that is, the words above copied whereby Blanton reserved the graveyard and a right of way to and from it. Blanton could not and did not attempt to explain why he made this reservation if he did not sell the land immediately surrounding the graveyard, which is the land in dispute. The provision is absolutely senseless if he reserved that part of the R. Napier farm which he now claims he did reserve, for it included the graveyard. We are not unaware of the rule that a particular description in a deed usually governs the general description. But there is another rule which prevails in this case, which is as follows: To ascertain the intention of a vendor, the language of the whole deed must be considered as well as the surrounding facts and circumstances. So when, in accordance with this rule, we take the plat of the survey of the Napier farm which is on file and compare it with the calls in the deed which attempted to give the outside boundary of the land and discover the discrepancies in the deed, and consider that fact together with the fact that Blanton stated in his deed that he was selling Hensley what was known as the "R. Napier farm," and with the fact that if he did not sell the land in dispute the reservation of the graveyard and right of way to and from it was meaningless, we are convinced that Blanton sold the whole farm to Hensley, and that by oversight the land in dispute was not included in the specific calls in the deed which attempted to give the outside boundary.

For these reasons, each of the judgments in the consolidated action against Howard is reversed and remanded, with directions to the lower court to dismiss the petition in each case.

ASBURY v. TAUBE et al.

1. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 348*)—TRANSFER—HOLDER BEFORE MATURITY.

Where a check, regular on its face and payable on demand, is transferred within two days after it is drawn, the transferee acquires title before it is overdue.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bills and Notes, Cent. Dig. §§ 870-877½; Dec. Dig. § 348.*]

2. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 497*)—ACTION—BURDEN OF PROOF—HOLDER IN DUE COURSE.

Under the express provisions of Ky. St. § 3720b, subsec. 56, defining notice, subsection 55, declaring that fraud in obtaining a negotiable instrument constitutes defective title, and subsection 59, providing that a holder is presumed to hold in due course, the transferee of a check, obtained from the maker by fraud, has the burden of showing that he acquired title as a holder in due course.

3. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 525*)—ACTION—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—HOLDER IN DUE COURSE.

Evidence, in an action by the purchaser of a check for cash, held to show that plaintiff was a bona fide holder in due course.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Boone County.

Action by George Taube against J. S. Asbury and others. Judgment for plaintiff against defendant Asbury, and he appeals. Affirmed.

D. E. Castleman, of Covington, for appellant. S. W. Tolin, of Burlington, and John S. Gaunt, of Louisville, for appellee.

CLAY, C. Plaintiff, George Taube, brought this action against J. S. Asbury, the Farmers' Bank of Petersburg, Ky., and S. Straus to recover on a check for $200 drawn by Asbury on the Farmers' Bank and made payable to S. Straus. Straus was not before the court. The Farmers' Bank paid the amount of the check into court, where it is now held pending the final determination of this suit. The defendant Asbury pleaded that the check was obtained from him by fraud, and that plaintiff, Taube, not only had knowledge thereof, but that he and defendant S. Straus were partners in the transaction, and that they had entered into a conspiracy to cheat and defraud defendant. The case as to defendant Asbury went to trial. At the conclusion of all the evidence, the court directed a verdict in favor of the plaintiff. To review the propriety of this ruling, the defendant appeals.

The check was executed and delivered under the following circumstances: Asbury, who lives in Boone county, Ky., went to Cincinnati on February 11, 1911, to purchase two horses. There he met his codefendant, S. Straus, and purchased the horses from him. Thereupon he gave to S. Straus the check in question to pay for the horses, and Straus agreed to deliver the horses on the following Monday on the Kentucky side of Anderson Ferry at Constance, in Boone county, Ky. Asbury went to Constance on Monday and waited for the horses. The horses were not delivered then, or at any time thereafter. While Asbury was waiting for the horses, Straus went to Petersburg, in Boone county, Ky., and presented the check to the Farmers' Bank for payment. Payment was refused because of Straus' failure to be identified. Straus then asked the cashier of the bank to certify the check. This was done. Returning to Cincinnati, Straus assigned and delivered the check to plaintiff, Taube. After Straus failed to deliver the horses on Monday, Asbury went to his place of business to find out what was the matter. Straus made some kind of explanation to the effect that one of the horses had become sick and could not be delivered. Asbury then demanded a return of the check. Straus refused, and replied that it had been put in the bank. Asbury returned home and directed the bank not to honor the check. When the check was presented by one of the bank's correspondents, payment was refused. The check was then duly protested, and this suit followed.

[1] The check in question being regular on its face and payable on demand, and being negotiated within two days after it was drawn, plaintiff acquired title before it was overdue. The only question to be determined is: Did plaintiff take the check in good faith and for value, and without notice of any infirmity in the instrument or defect in the title of his codefendant, Straus.

[2] To constitute notice of an infirmity in the instrument or defect in the title of the person negotiating the same, the person to whom it is negotiated must have had actual knowledge of the infirmity or defect, or knowledge of such facts that his action in taking the instrument amounted to bad faith.

Kentucky Statutes, § 3720b, subsec. 56. The title of a person who negotiates an instrument is defective when he obtains the instrument, or any signature thereto, by fraud. Kentucky Statutes, § 3720b, subsec. 55. When it is shown that the title of any person who has negotiated the instrument was defective, the burden is on the holder to prove that he, or some person under whom he claims, acquired title as a holder in due course. This rule, however, does not apply in favor of a party who become bound on the instrument prior to the acquisition of such defective title. Kentucky Statutes, § 3720b, subsec. 59. The evidence in this case leaves no doubt that the check was obtained from Asbury by fraud. That being shown, it was incumbent upon plaintiff to show that he acquired title as a holder in due course.

[3] Plaintiff, who was a horse dealer in Cincinnati, and conducts a sale stable at the stockyards, and other sale stables, testifies that on Monday night, following the transaction which Straus had with defendant, Straus came to him and asked him to cash a check. Straus informed plaintiff that a man had given him the check in payment for a horse. Plaintiff looked at the check and saw that it was certified, and said: "I guess it is good. I will give you the cash for it." He then paid to Straus the amount of the check. At the time he did this, plaintiff knew nothing about the transaction between Straus and defendant, and did not have the slightest information that there was anything wrong with the check. He had nothing to do with the transaction which took place between Straus and defendant. He and Straus had never been associated together in business. The only business he had ever had with Straus was to sell him horses occasionally. On cross-examination, plaintiff admitted that he had a bookkeeper by the name of Hopkins, who would sometimes fix up accounts for him. Did not remember whether Hopkins had ever fixed up his account with Straus or not. He never employed Straus to sell horses for him. He only sold to Straus. When he did, they would agree on the price before they went to Straus' stable.

Defendants proved by Joseph Snelder that the latter worked for plaintiff, who was operating a stable at the Union Stockyards at Cincinnati, Ohio. Snelder had known plaintiff for about five years, and on several occasions had, at plaintiff's direction, taken horses to Straus' stable; plaintiff telling him that the horses had been sold. Sol Straus, a brother of defendant Straus, testified that he knew plaintiff. Plaintiff has a stable at the stockyards and a stable at other places. Sidney Straus worked for plaintiff at the stable on Second street. Sidney Straus is the same person as the defendant S. Straus. The way witness knew that Sidney Straus was working for plaintiff was that while witness was at the barn Sidney Straus would come out there and pick out three or four horses and take them away and sell them. Sidney Straus worked for Taube for about eight months. W. M. Hopkins testified that three or four years ago he kept books for plaintiff. Since that time he had done odd jobs for plaintiff, fixing up accounts for him. Plaintiff would advance money for traders to buy stock with. When the stock was sold, the traders would return the money to plaintiff. Plaintiff, after deducting his commissions and expenses, would divide profits with the traders, and sometimes the traders would get all the profits. While witness was working for Mr. Taube, Mr. Taube advanced money to Sidney Straus to buy stuff for him. Witness never did any book-keeping for Straus; but when he worked it was for Mr. Taube. Mr. Taube would call off to him the amount of stuff he had sold, what it cost, what he advanced on it, and the expense, from which items he would ascertain the profits that had been made. The profit was divided, or "torn in two." Witness further stated that in adjusting the accounts between Taube and Straus he charged up to Straus' business the rent of the stable occupied by Straus.

Giving full effect to the evidence of the defendant, it fails to show that a partnership existed between plaintiff and Straus. It simply tends to prove that plaintiff and Straus had occasional transactions with reference to the sale of horses, and that these transactions were settled as they arose. It is not shown that plaintiff had the slightest connection with the transaction in question. There is a failure to show either that plaintiff, at the time he cashed the check, had knowledge of the fraud of Straus, or had knowledge of such facts that his action in taking the instrument amounted to bad faith. Plaintiff having shown that he paid cash for the check, and he had no notice of any infirmity in the instrument or defect in the title of Straus, and defendant having failed to prove any facts or circumstances tending to show the contrary, we conclude that the trial court properly directed a verdict in favor of plaintiff.

Judgment affirmed.

CAHILL v. MANGOLD et ux.

1. EASEMENTS (§ 36*)—EVIDENCE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Where the owner of land, across which another claimed a right of way, had asserted his ownership, and indicated that the use was by permission only, by changing its location and erecting fences and gates across it, the burden was on the person claiming the right of way to show that prior use thereof was under a claim of right, and not merely by permission.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Easements, Cent. Dig. §§ 77, 78, 88-93; Dec. Dig. § 36.*]

2. EASEMENTS (§ 36*)—INTERRUPTION OR CONTROL—EVIDENCE.

Where the use of a right of way is interrupted or controlled by the owner of the land as a matter of right, this constitutes evidence that the use was permissive only.

3. EASEMENTS (§ 36*)—EVIDENCE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Where a way across another's land is used without interruption or interference for many years, it will be presumed that it existed as a matter of right; and the burden is on the landowner to show that such use was permissive.

4. EASEMENTS (§ 36*)—EVIDENCE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

The presumption that the uninterrupted use of a way for many years was one of right, and not by permission, may be rebutted by proof of acts showing that the landowner never intended to recognize that the use was other than permissive.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Easements, Cent. Dig. §§ 77, 78, 88-93; Dec. Dig. § 36.*]

5. EASEMENTS (§ 37*)—PRESCRIPTION—QUESTIONS OF LAW OR FACT.

Whether the use of a way across another's land was under a claim of right or by permission, is a question of fact.

6. EASEMENTS (§ 36*)—EVIDENCE—WEIGHT AND SUFFICIENCY.

In an action to enjoin interference with a way across defendant's land, evidence held to support a finding that the previous use of such way by plaintiff was by the owner's permission, and not under a claim of right.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Pendleton County.

Action by Mrs. M. J. Cahill against Charles Mangold and wife. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

E. E. Barton, of Mazathau Simaloa, Mexico, and William A. Byrne, of Covington, for appellant. John H. Barker, of Falmouth, for appellees.

MILLER, J. The farm of Ora Mangold, in Pendleton county, lies between the farm of the appellant, Mariah Cahill, on the west and the Portland and Gardnersville turnpike road on the east. Appellant claims that she has had a passway from her farm over and across the Mangold farm to the turnpike since 1854; and, appellee having closed the passway about March 1, 1911, appellant brought this suit to enjoin the appellee and her husband, Charles Mangold, from interfering with the appellant's use thereof. Both tracts of land originally belonged to Arnold. Arnold sold the Mangold tract to Francis Mann, and put him in possession, in about 1852, but did not make him a deed thereto until 1859. In 1854 Arnold sold the Cahill tract to Doyle and Kelly, and in the same year they sold the property to John Cahill, the husband of appellant. Mrs. Mangold inherited her farm from her grandfather, Francis Mann, and had lived thereon for about 12 years before this suit was brought. John Cahill and his wife have lived upon their property until John's death in 1900; and since 1900 his widow, the appellant, has occupied the homestead. At the time, however, that the Cahills moved upon their tract in 1854 Francis Mann was living upon the intervening tract now owned by his granddaughter, Mrs. Mangold.

Many pages of testimony have been taken, for the purpose of showing the character and the extent of the use of the passway by appellant and her husband. The substance of it is as follows: Three separate and distinct passways ran over the Mann land as early as 1854; the land being then almost entirely uninclosed, and in timber. These several roads were subsequently inclosed by the owner of the land over which they ran. These three ways ran, part of the way, over the Cahill land, and, after merging into one road on his land, it ran on westwardly to the McMillan place, and beyond. At that time there was a gristmill located upon the McMillan farm. About 27 years ago John Cahill built a fence across the road on his land, and stopped all travel over his farm westwardly. This act upon the part of Cahill resulted in closing all of the roads referred to, except so much of the one in controversy as ran from Cahill's house eastwardly and over appellee's land to the turnpike, near Mann's residence. About 24 years ago Mann built a fence across what remained of this passway between Cahill's house and Mann's residence, without objection from Cahill, and thereafter Cahill went through Mann's land by laying the fence down and opening the gates Mann had previously placed across the way. In allowing Mann to build this fence, Cahill was conceding to Mann the same right to close this road through his own land that Cahill had exercised in closing the road through his land. In separating his fields, and in fencing his barn lot. Mann placed gates across the way for his own convenience, at his own expense, and kept them in repair. After Mrs. Mangold and her husband moved there 12 years ago, he built a fence where Mann had built one years before, placed new gates, changed some of them, and inclosed part of this road into his calf lot, all without objection from the appellant. All these gates were placed upon the land either by Mann or by Mangold, at their own expense, and kept in repair by them. The passway had been thus controlled by Mann and Mangold since 1854, without interruption or objection from any source, and, so far as this record shows, appellant never asserted any right to use this passway prior to about the time she brought this suit; on the contrary, according to the evidence of at least two witnesses, she admitted she had no such right.

Furthermore, it appears from the testimony of Michael Hyland that John Cahill, shortly before his death, became anxious about the use of the highway and sought the aid of Hyland, whom he requested to assist him in buying the right of way from Mann; and, some one having assured Cahill there would be no trouble about it, he replied that he did not fear any trouble from Mr. Mann, but there might be trouble with those who came after him.

Furthermore, Hyland had a similar passway across the Mann land for many years, which he admits was by permission only; and, according to the evidence, it was of the same general character as the passway used by Cahill.

Under this state of fact, the circuit court dismissed the petition, and Mrs. Cahill appeals.

[1] In order for appellant to establish her right, she must show that the use of the road by her and her husband was under a claim of right to so use it, and not merely by the permission of the owners of the land.

In Lyles v. Graves, 147 Ky. 809, 145 S. W. 763, we reaffirmed this well-established rule in the following language: "By a uniform line of decisions this court is committed to the doctrine that, where the use of the passway has extended over a long period of years, very slight evidence will be sufficient to show that it was enjoyed under a claim of right; and when a proprietor undertakes to close a passway the burden is on him to show that the use was merely permissive, and to explain away the presumption that its uninterrupted enjoyment for more than 15 years was not exercised under a claim of right. The mere fact that the owner of the servient estate never gave, and the persons using the passway never asked, permission is not, in itself, sufficient to overcome the presumption in their favor arising from the long-continued use of the way. Smith v. Pennington [122 Ky. 355, 91 S. W. 830], 28 Ky. Law Rep. 1282 [8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 149]; Anderson v. Southworth [76 S. W. 391], 25 Ky. Law Rep. 776; Rogers v. Flick, 144 Ky. 844 [139 S. W. 1008]."

But, in determining when a permissive use may be changed into a use under a claim of right, we used the following language, in Fightmaster v. Taylor, 147 Ky. 469, 144 S. W. 381: "The law is well settled that the permissive use of a passway for any number of years does not deprive the owner of the land of the right to close it at any time; and when the use is originally acquired by permission the character of the passway is established, and such use continues to be permissive until something is done bringing notice home to the owner of the land that the character of the use has been changed. Hall v. McLeod, 2 Metc. 98, 74 Am. Dec. 400; Conyers v. Scott, 94 Ky. 123 [21 S. W. 530, 14 Ky. Law Rep. 784]. It is only where a claimant has had an uninterrupted use of a passway for a great number of years that a grant will be presumed. Bowman v. Wickliffe, 15 B. Mon. 84; Beall v. Clore, 6 Bush, 676."

[2] If the use is interrupted or controlled by the landowner as a matter of right, such interruption and control is evidence that the use was permissive only.

Appellant relies, however, principally upon Lyles v. Graves, supra. But the facts of that case clearly distinguish it from the case at bar, since Lyles not only knew that the passway was in existence, but he actually bought it. Moreover, in Lyles v. Graves, the passway traversed several tracts of land, and was used by the traveling public generally in going from one road to another road. In the case at bar, however, the Cahills discontinued the road through their own farm, and thereby not only denied its use to appellees and others in going to other farms or roads to the west of them, but insisted upon claiming an outlet from their own farm across appellee's farm to the turnpike on the east of both of them.

[3-5] In Smith v. Pennington, 122 Ky. 355, 91 S. W. 830, 28 Ky. Law Rep. 1282, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 149, as in other cases relied upon by appellant, the enjoyment of the passway had been without interruption or interference for many years; and in the absence of sufficient proof that it was permissive the court indulged the presumption that it existed as a matter of right. In that class of cases a presumption arises that the use is one of right; and the burden is upon the landowner to show that the use was permissive only. O'Daniel v. O'Daniel, 88 Ky. 185, 10 S. W. 638, 10 Ky. Law Rep. 760; Talbott v. Thorn, 91 Ky. 417, 16 S. W. 88, 13 Ky. Law Rep. 401; Goldberg v. Cleveland, 33 Ky. Law Rep. 953, 111 S. W. 682. This presumption may, however, be defeated by proof of acts which show that the landowner never intended to recognize that the use was other than permissive. Thus, in Schwer v. Martin, 97 S. W. 12, 29 Ky. Law Rep. 1221, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 615, it was pointed out that where the use of the passway was merely permissive on the part of the owner of the land, and there was no conduct by the owner indicating that the use thereof was other than a neighborly act, the privilege was one that might, at any time, be revoked by the owner of the land, regardless of the extent of the time during which it had been so used. Conyers v. Scott, 94 Ky. 123, 21 S. W. 530, 14 Ky. Law Rep. 784, Warth v. Baldwin, 84 S. W. 1148, 27 Ky. Law Rep. 339, and Berea College v. Burnett, 111 S. W. 332, fully recognize the rule. So the decision turns, in each case, upon the character of the use. It is a question of fact in each case. Downing v. Benedict, 147 Ky. 8, 143 S. W. 756; Driskill v. Morehead, 147 Ky. 107, 143 S. W. 758.

In Downing v. Benedict, supra, a passway over uninclosed woodland had been used for about 20 years, when the owner fenced it, and thereafter some people used the way with the owner's permission, and others without his permission. Subsequently the owner built a rock fence across the passway, in which he placed a gate; persons continuing to pass through the gate with or without his permission. Still later the owner's grantee took the gates down and erected wire fences. Under that state of fact it was held that the fences and gates, which had been continued for 40 years, were sufficient notice to those using the passway that the owner had not dedicated it to a public use.

[6] So in the case at bar. Originally the passway was some 75 or 80 feet distant from where it is now located, and it has been changed, from time to time, and at the will of Mann and Mangold, the owners. At no time have they ever surrendered their control over the location of the passway, or its use; on the contrary, they have asserted their ownership, and indicated that appellant's use was by permission only, by changing its location and erecting fences and gates across it, at their pleasure. Mangold protected only when appellant continued to travel outside the lines of the passway, and thus injuring his meadow; and this he had the right to do.

This case, in its controlling facts, is very much like the case of Fightmaster v. Taylor, above referred to, where, in concluding, we said: "The evidence showed beyond question that the passway in dispute was never claimed by those who used it as a matter of right, but at all times with the consent or permission of the owner of the land over which it ran."

The issue being one of fact, and the chancellor having reached the conclusion that the use by appellant and her husband was by permission only, we will not disturb his finding. It is fully sustained by the proof.

Judgment affirmed.

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 286*)—ACTIONS FOR INJURIES—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In an action for injuries caused by a chain on an air hoist breaking and striking the employé operating it, evidence to support plaintiff's contention that the chain would not have struck him if valve chains had been properly adjusted held to present a question for the jury.

2. TRIAL (§ 143*)—QUESTIONS FOR JURY—CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.

The fact that defendant's evidence strongly contradicts that of plaintiff does not justify a peremptory instruction for defendant; it being the province of the jury to weigh and pass upon all the evidence.

4. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 234*)—LIABILITY FOR INJURIES—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

An employé is not guilty of contributory negligence in continuing work, although he knows of defects in the machine operated by him, unless the danger is so obvious and imminent that he must or should have known thereof.

5. EVIDENCE (§ 539*)—OPINION EVIDENCE—QUALIFICATIONS OF EXPERT WITNESSES.

The foreman of a machine shop whose knowledge and skill as a machinist was derived from an experience of 30 or 40 years of work in that line, and the proprietor of a machine shop with an experience in handling and operating such machinery of more than 50 years, were qualified to testify that, if the valve chains on an air hoist had been properly adjusted, an employé would not have been injured by the breaking of the hoisting chain.

6. DAMAGES (§ 132*)—EXCESSIVENESS—PERSONAL INJURIES.

An employé was struck in the face by a broken chain, mashing in his face and upper jaw, and splitting his lip. Several teeth were knocked out, and the upper jaw was broken. An operation was necessary on his upper lip. His breast was also injured. He had a depressed fracture of the skull at the back of his head, and had a profound nervous shock. He was confined to the house for several months, and required medical treatment for eight months or a year. Although able to do some light work, he was permanently disabled from performing such work as he was accustomed to perform before the injury or to earn the same wages. Held, that a recovery of $5,000 was not so excessive as to show passion or prejudice.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jefferson County, Common Pleas Branch, Third Division.

Action by J. N. Goodwin against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Helm & Helm, Benjamin D. Warfield, and Chas. H. Moorman, all of Louisville, for appellant. A. T. Burgevin, of Louisville, for appellee.

SETTLE, J. This is the second appeal of this case. The opinion on the first appeal appears in 140 Ky. 837, 131 S. W. 1012, and, as it contains an elaborate statement of the facts with respect to the manner in which appellee received the injuries for which he recovered damages in the court below, only a partial review of them will now be necessary. It appears that appellee was operating an air hoist in appellant's machine shop, and while so engaged an iron chain, connecting the end of a piston rod with an axle and two car wheels, broke, striking him in the face and head, thereby producing the injuries complained of. The movements of the piston rod were controlled by the valve of an air cylinder, operated by a cross-piece six inches in length, to each end of which a short chain was attached. By pulling one of these short chains the valve on the air pipe would open and the air pressure enter into the cylinder, raising the piston rod. By pulling the other short chain the air pressure escaped from the cylinder, thereby lowering the piston rod. When the piston rod was thus lowered, the chain which was attached to the piston rod, and by the breaking of which appellee was injured, was connected with the car axle and wheels which were to be moved. By the application of the air pressure to the cylinder in the manner above described, the piston rod was being raised and with it the axle and wheels, when the chain broke and struck appellee.

It is appellee's contention that his injuries were caused by the improper location of the cap of the cylinder and crossbeam to which the short chains for raising and lowering the piston rod were attached; that is, that they were placed on the opposite side of the cylinder from where he had to stand in controlling the hoisting machine, which compelled him to reach around the cylinder to manipulate the valve chains, and thereby place his body so close to the chain which attached the piston rod to the axle and car wheels that the breaking of the chain necessarily injured him; whereas, the proper place for the cylinder cap and valve chains was on the side of the cylinder where he had to stand in operating the hoisting machine, and, if it had been so properly placed, he, in manipulating the valve chains, could have stood farther off and at such a safe distance from the chain which attached the piston rod to the axle and car wheels that the breaking of the chain would not have injured him. In considering this contention, we, in the former opinion, said: "The trial court submitted the case to the jury upon the single question of the defect in the position of the lower cap of the cylinder which placed the crossbeam further away from the operator than it should be. The promise to repair, and the failure to do so, although made a ground of negligence, was ignored in the instructions, and we think properly so, as the evidence did not sufficiently show that any promise to repair was made, or that appellee in continuing to work relied on any promise to repair. American Tobacco Co. v. Adams, 137 Ky. 414

[125 S. W. 1067]. But the case must be reversed because it does not appear from the evidence that the location of the valve chains on the cylinder cap was the proximate cause of the injury to appellee. * * * In other words, there should have been some evidence conducing to show that the position appellee was compelled to occupy in operating the machine on account of the location of the valve chains placed him in such a position that the chain, if it broke, would strike him. * * * On another trial, if the evidence on this point is the same as on the last trial, the court should direct a verdict for the defendant; but, if there is evidence conducing to show that appellee would not have been struck by the chain if the valve chains had been properly adjusted, then the court should let the case go to the jury under the instructions given on the last trial."

[1] It will be observed that the opinion narrowed the case to the single issue stated, distinctly approved the instructions given on the first trial, and directed that the case be again submitted to the jury under the same instructions, if the evidence on the second trial should conduce to prove that appellee would not have been struck by the chain, if the valve chains had been properly adjusted. Properly accepting the former opinion as the law of the case, the circuit court on the last trial submitted it to the jury under the instructions given on the first trial. A verdict was returned in favor of appellee for $5,000 damages, and the present appeal is prosecuted from the judgment entered upon that verdict. We are now called upon to determine whether there was evidence to support it. It is insisted for appellant that the evidence on the last trial did not substantially differ from that introduced in appellee's behalf on the first trial, and that a peremptory instruction directing a verdict for it should, therefore, have been given. Our reading of the record has not enabled us to reach this conclusion. On the contrary, the additional evidence required to authorize the submission of the case to the jury was supplied by the testimony of appellee and his two expert witnesses, Cook and Fletcher. That of appellee, with great elaborateness of detail, explained his duties as operator of the hoisting machine, the safe and customary manner of operating same, and the manner of receiving his injuries; furthermore, that the placing of the cap of the cylinder, crossbeam, and short chains for raising and lowering the piston rod on the opposite side of the cylinder from where he had to stand in performing his duties rendered same unsafe for use and dangerous to him, as he was thereby compelled to manipulate the valve chains in raising and lowering the piston rod, by extending his arms and hands around the cylinder for the purpose of reaching them, which forced his body so dangerously close to the piston rod and chain attaching it to the axle and car wheels that there was no way for him to escape injury from the breaking of the chain; that, if the cap of the cylinder and valve chains had been placed on the side of the cylinder where appellee, in the performance of his duties, was compelled to stand, he could have manipulated the valve chains without reaching around the cylinder and by standing at such a distance from the piston rod and its chain, as that no injury would have resulted to him by the breaking of the chain. It appears from the appellee's testimony that he complained to appellant's foreman of the improper location of the cylinder cap and valve chains, and requested that they be changed to the side of the cylinder next to which he was required to stand in performing his duties, but that the requested change was not made. It does not appear that any material part of the testimony referred to was given by appellee on the first trial of the case, or that any questions were asked him calculated to elicit it. The experts, Cook and Fletcher, were not introduced as witnesses on the first trial, and their testimony appears to fully corroborate that of appellee. It may, therefore, well be said that the testimony of the three furnished the additional evidence, which the opinion, on the first appeal, said would be necessary to authorize a submission of the case to the jury.

[2] It is true the evidence furnished by the several witnesses introduced for the appellant strongly contradicted that of appellee and his two witnesses referred to, but this did not authorize a peremptory instruction as asked by the appellant. The evidence being conflicting, it was the province of the jury to weigh and pass upon it all; and, as their verdict indicates, they gave greater credence to the evidence furnished by the appellee and his two witnesses than to that furnished by the appellant's witnesses.

[3] This they had the right to do, and, as in our opinion the case is not one in which we would be justified in holding that the verdict is flagrantly against the evidence, we are without authority to disturb it.

[4] If, as argued by counsel for appellant, there was evidence conducing to show contributory negligence on the part of appellee, we can only say that that question was fairly submitted to the jury by the instruction as to contributory negligence; and although there was evidence conducing to prove that appellee, notwithstanding his complaint to appellant's foreman of the improper location of the cylinder cap and valve chains, continued to work at the hoisting machine, in our opinion it failed to show that the danger of his continuing the performance of his duties thereat was so obvious and imminent as that he must or ought to have known it. It cannot, therefore, be said that contributory negligence was conclusively established.

[5] It is contended by appellant's counsel that the testimony of both Cook and Fletcher was incompetent, and should have been excluded from consideration at the hands of the jury. We assume from the briefs that this contention rests upon the theory that the testimony of these witnesses did not show them to be experts; but we do not find in the bill of evidence that the introduction of the witnesses was objected to on this ground. There were objections to one or two hypothetical questions asked each of them, which were, in our opinion, properly ruled on, but none to such as were asked them respecting their skill and experience as machinists. It was shown that Cook is foreman of the Atlas Machine Company and that his knowledge and skill as a machinist was derived from an experience of 30 or 40 years of work in that line. It was also shown that Fletcher is himself the proprietor of a machine shop, and that his work and experience in handling and operating such machinery covered a period of more than 50 years. So it is fairly apparent from the evidence that both Cook and Fletcher were familiar with such hoisting machines as the one by which appellee was injured, and, though they had never seen that particular machine, that they understood its various parts, how it should be operated, and illustrated their knowledge thereof by reference to a model of the machine which was used on the trial. In view of these facts, we think each of them possessed the qualifications of an expert, for which reason their testimony was properly allowed to go to the jury.

[6] It is also insisted for appellant that the verdict is excessive. In view of the character of appellee's injuries, we cannot sustain this contention. He was first attended after they were received by appellant's surgeon, Dr. Griffith, who did not testify as a witness, because he died before the first trial. It appears, however, that Dr. J. W. Galvin, appellee's regular physician, began to attend him the week following the infliction of his injuries and continued such attendance until he was able to leave his bed and home.

Upon being called as a witness, and asked as to appellee's injuries, Dr. Galvin said: "His face, upper jaw, was mashed in and lip split. * * * He was laid up and a part of the time out of his head; six, eight or ten teeth, a number of teeth were missing from one side, and the upper jawbone was broken in there. He had an injury to his breast, his sternum, breastbone, and, I believe, an injury to his head. I don't recall about that. It has been two or three years ago. I treated him from January, about the 24th, up until probably middle of May. He was laid up, confined to the house at the time. Afterwards I treated him occasionally for about eight months or a year. * * * I operated upon his face afterwards on his upper lip. It was all adhering, stuck to the bone, stuck to the process bone and tissues. He could not use his mouth so he could not take any fluid or food. I freed it all up so he could, so he could hold material in his mouth." In reply to the question as to when he had last seen and examined appellee the witness replied: "This week." Upon being further asked whether appellee's injuries were or not of a permanent character, the witness answered: "Yes; he is disabled, to a great extent for life. I don't see how he can ever recover; get better now."

Dr. D. S. Reynolds testified that he had examined appellee more than once since his injuries were received; the last time in April, 1909. In reply to the question: "What did you find to be his condition at that time?" Dr. Reynolds said: "He has a depressed fracture of the skull at the back of his head. He has a cut over the left nostril there, over the left, carrying away a portion of the jaw bone containing seven of the teeth on the upper side; cut through lower lip. He has profound nervous shock." In reply to an inquiry as to the extent, if any, of appellee's disability as to the performance of manual labor, the witness said: "It would be difficult for me to say. I should say a man, however, whose breathing is so rapid as his, with elevated temperature, feeble, irregular pulse would not be able to do much manual labor."

Other witnesses, relatives and neighbors of appellee, also testified as to the character of his injuries, the length of time he was confined to his bed and home, and the extent to which his injuries impaired his ability to earn money.

It appears from the evidence that appellee, after many months of complete disability, sufficiently improved in health to be able to do some light work, such as setting type, and that he is now at times engaged at that work in the Courier Journal office; but it is further apparent from the evidence that he will not again be able to perform such manual labor as he was accustomed to perform before he was injured, or to earn the same wages he then received. It is evident that the physical and mental suffering resulting to appellee from his injuries must have been very great; and, when to such suffering is added the value of the time lost by him, the expense incurred in endeavoring to effect a cure and the loss sustained in the permanent impairment of his power to earn money, caused by the injuries, the damages awarded, though liberal in amount, cannot fairly be pronounced excessive. At any rate, we are unwilling to say that the verdict bears any of the earmarks of passion or prejudice on the part of the jury.

Other objections besides those we have mentioned, are made by appellant to the judgment appealed from, but, as they were determined on the first appeal and disposed of by the opinion then rendered, it will not be proper to consider them again.

Judgment affirmed.

CITY OF LOUISVILLE v. KRAMER'S ADM'X.

1. TRIAL (§ 252*)—INSTRUCTIONS—EVIDENCE TO SUSTAIN.

In an action for damages from the maintenance of an inadequate sewer, an instruction on contributory negligence was properly refused where the only evidence tending to show it was to the effect that there was a drain in the plaintiff's basement about two feet below the bottom thereof, and that the sewer was about two feet above the bottom of the basement, without any showing that the drain was connected with the sewer, as the submission of the issue would require a guess that the water which caused the damage flowed from the drain-pipe into the basement.

2. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 55*)—ACCRUAL OF CAUSE—INSUFFICIENT SEWERS.

Though at the time a sewer was built it was adequate to carry off accumulated water, where it was rendered insufficient by reason of a construction of a feeder sewer and of new streets and their consequent drainage into the latter sewer, a right of action accrued upon the causing of damage from the overburdened sewer, and the failure to construct sufficient catch-basins to carry off the surface water.

3. LIFE ESTATES (§ 22*)—INJURIES TO PROPERTY—RIGHTS OF LIFE TENANT.

A life tenant may recover damages for the diminution in the value of her life use, caused by the depreciation of the rental value of the property and the time and money spent in repairing damage done by floods caused by the failure of the city to maintain a proper sewer.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1033*)—REVIEW—PERSONS ENTITLED TO ALLEGE ERROR—PREJUDICE TO OPPOSITE PARTY.

Where, in an action for damages from an inadequate sewer, the evidence showed that the value and the use of the property had depreciated while the plaintiff occupied it, and that the rent had decreased while she rented, as well as the cost of repairs which were necessitated by floods, an instruction authorizing on a finding for the plaintiff the assessment of such damages as will fairly and reasonably compensate for any damage done to the use between certain dates was erroneous, but prejudicial only to the plaintiff, and cannot be complained of by the defendant as error warranting a reversal.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jefferson County, Common Pleas Branch, First Division.

Action by Gertrude Kramer's administratrix against the City of Louisville. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Huston Quila and Clayton B. Blakey, both of Louisville, for appellant. Jacob Solinger and O'Neal & O'Neal, all of Louisville, for appellee.

NUNN, J. One Frederick Kramer owned a lot with a 135-foot front and 125 feet deep on a corner of Clay and Ormsby streets, in the city of Louisville, upon which was a house worth about $2,500. The lower floor of the house was a storeroom. Prior to 1903 Frederick Kramer died leaving a will in which he devised this property to his widow, Gertrude Kramer, for life with remainder to his children. In 1898 the city constructed a 36-inch sewer along Ormsby street which, prior to February, 1903, caused the water to overflow this property when there was an exceedingly hard rain. In February, 1903, the city constructed or reconstructed Clay street with vitrified brick and placed therein a 27-inch sewer, but, according to the proof, placed only two or three catch-basins therein, and several other streets in that vicinity were constructed and drained into Clay street. It appears from the testimony that after these streets were constructed and the sewer, which was provided with an insufficient number of catch-basins, was placed in Clay street, when an ordinary rain fell, the water would accumulate on the corner where appellee's property was situated so fast that the sewers would not carry it off, and it would become two or three feet deep, and at times it would get deep enough to flow into the lower floor of the house, and the basement of the building was rendered useless for the purposes for which it was constructed.

Appellee instituted this action February 12, 1908, to recover $1,500 in damages which she alleged were occasioned to her use of the property by reason of the overflows from the date of the construction of Clay street to the time of filing the suit. She did not ask for any damages occasioned by the construction of the sewer in Ormsby street, which the proof shows was sufficient to carry off the water which drained to it during ordinary rain falls. Appellant, by its answer, denied the allegations of the petition, entered a plea of contributory negligence on the part of Mrs. Kramer, and a plea of the statute of limitations.

[1] Appellant asks a reversal of the case because the lower court failed to give an instruction upon its plea of contributory negligence, and calls attention to the fact that one witness stated that a drainpipe was discovered in the basement of appellee's house which was about two feet from the bottom of the basement, and that the sewer in Ormsby street was also about two feet above the bottom of the basement. There is no proof by any witness that this drainpipe was connected with the sewer in the street;

nor does the witness who testified to the above facts, or any other witness, state or even intimate that the water flowed through this drainpipe into the basement. No witness was asked about this matter. In order for the court to give an instruction on contributory negligence, it would have had to guess that the water flowed through the drainpipe into the basement, and this, of course, it was not authorized to do.

[2] The plea of limitation was not sustained for the reason that the injuries complained of occurred within five years before the institution of the action. The sewer in Ormsby street might have been adequate to carry off the water that accumulated at appellee's property at the time it was constructed, but it was insufficient to carry off the increased volume of water caused to collect at that place by reason of the construction of Clay street and the construction of other streets and their drainage into Clay street. Therefore, it was negligence in the city to overburden the sewer in Ormsby street and to fail to provide the sewer in Clay street with sufficient catch-basins to receive the surface water which accumulated therein, and which, according to the testimony, caused the overflow of appellee's property. City of Louisville v. Leezer, 143 Ky. 244, 136 S. W. 223. The testimony shows that the foundation of the building was constructed of brick; that there was a shed erected in front of the building; that the surface water which came down Clay street washed the sand and mortar from between the brick which caused the foundation to give way; that it flowed around the posts supporting the shed and caused them to decay; that appellee expended $97 in cash to repair the building; that she used the building a small portion of the time and rented it the balance of the time; and that, on account of the overflows, she had to rent the building for less than she did previous thereto.

[3] The contention of appellant that appellee is not entitled to recover because she was only a life tenant is without merit. She had a right to recover the diminution in the value of her life use. Her criterion of recovery was the depreciation of the rental value of the property while she rented it and the diminution in the value of its use while she used it, together with the value of her time and the money spent in repairing the damage done by the floods. Hutchison v. City of Maysville, 100 S. W. 331, 30 Ky. Law Rep. 1173; City of Louisville v. Leezer, 143 Ky. 244, 136 S. W. 223; Ewing v. City of Louisville, 140 Ky. 726, 131 S. W. 1016, 31 L. R. A. (N. S.) 612. This action was based upon the theory that the city by its negligent construction of the streets and sewers caused the injury to appellee's property, and the above authorities are peculiarly applicable to this case.

[4] Appellant complains especially of instruction No. 4, which is as follows: "If the jury find for the plaintiff, they should award her such damages as the jury may believe from the evidence will fairly and reasonably compensate the estate of Gertrude Kramer for any damage done to her use of the property mentioned in the evidence between February 12, 1903, and February 12, 1908, the award not to exceed the sum of $1,500, the amount claimed in the petition. If the jury find for the defendant, they will simply say so by their verdict and no more." This instruction was erroneous, but all the errors were prejudicial to appellee, and not to appellant. The instruction should have allowed her to recover the reasonable depreciation of the value of the use of the property while she occupied it, and to recover the rental decrease, if any, while she rented it, and to recover the cost of the repairs which had to be made upon the property by reason of the overflows. These matters were all in evidence, and the verdict shows that the jury considered them. The evidence supports the verdict, and we are not authorized to reverse a case when, upon the whole record, it appears that the substantial rights of the appellant have not been prejudiced.

For these reasons, the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

BRYANT v. STRUNK.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Dec. 4, 1912.)

1. BOUNDARIES (§ 40*)—LOCATION—QUESTION FOR COURT.

The proper location of land patented by the state is for the court, where there is no dispute as to the facts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Boundaries, Cent. Dig. §§ 196-204; Dec. Dig. § 40.*]

2. BOUNDARIES (§ 3*)—CALLS—DISTANCES—MONUMENTS.

The rule that calls of a patent for course and distance give way to monuments on the ground is for the purpose of establishing the actual location of the lines and corners of the original survey; and it has little application where the lines were not run out in the original survey, but were simply laid down by the surveyor by protraction, and, when the lines were not in fact run, the court in determining the lines has little to guide it, except the calls and the plot accompanying the original survey, and the plot is evidence in determining the general shape of the tract intended to be patented.

3. BOUNDARIES (§ 3*)—CALLS—DISTANCES—MONUMENTS.

The lines of a patent will not be extended to reach a designated monument on the ground where it is evident from all the facts that the surveyor made a mistake as to the location of the monument; he supposing it to be in one place while in fact it is in another.

4. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 73*)—COLOR OF TITLE—PATENTS.

A junior patentee who enters on his grant claiming to the extent of its boundaries is in possession of the land included in the patent, for a patent, though void because including land previously granted, is color of title, and defines the extent of the possession.

5. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 116*)—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where there is evidence of adverse possession by a junior patentee in a patent including land previously granted sufficient to take the case to the jury as to any part of the land, the court must by its instructions define the extent of possession under the facts, so that only a question of fact will be submitted to the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. § 66; Dec. Dig. § 116.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Whitley County.

Action by Roberta S. Bryant against Murray Strunk. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded for new trial.

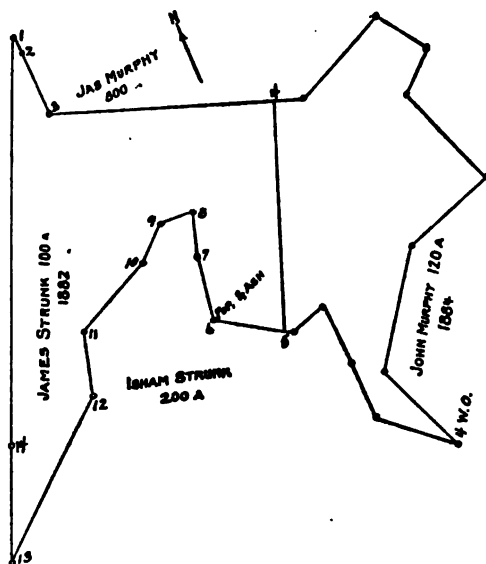

E. L. Stephens and Geo. P. Johnson, both of Williamsburg, for appellant. J. N. Sharp and I. N. Steely, both of Williamsburg, for appellee.

HOBSON, C. J. Roberta S. Bryant claims a large body of land in Whitley county under a patent for 9,600 acres issued October 18, 1855, to Jacob Hudson and Cyrenius Wait. The patent includes a large boundary of land from which prior patents and surveys are excepted. She brought this suit against Murray Strunk and others to recover a portion of the land embraced in her patent which was claimed by them. On a trial between her and Strunk, Strunk was adjudged the owner of the land claimed by him. She appeals.

Strunk's claim to the land is based upon a patent issued July 12, 1883, upon a survey made June 12, 1882. Although his patent is junior to hers, he insists that he is the owner of the land covered by his patent by reason of the fact that he and those under whom he claims had been in the adverse possession of the land for more than 15 years before the bringing of the action. He does not show a marked or well-defined boundary to which he claimed, but he insists that, having entered under his patent, he was in possession of all the land which the patent includes. So it becomes necessary to locate his patent in order to determine the extent of his possession. As claimed by him, and as located by the judgment of the circuit court, his patent, though calling for only 100 acres, in fact includes, according to one surveyor, 486 acres, and according to another 550 acres. The calls of his patent are as follows: "Beginning at a white oak corner of a survey in the name of Alexander Murphy; running thence with said survey S. 8° E. 16 poles to a spotted oak; thence S. 2° E. 44 poles to a gum; thence South 70° E. 144 poles to a stake in said line and in a line of John Murphy's survey; thence with John Murphy's survey S. 20° W. 106 poles to a stake in a line of Isham Strunk's survey; thence with the same N. 10° W. 90 poles to a stake said Strunk's corner; thence with his line S. 31° W. 180 poles to a poplar and hickory; thence S. 76° W. 120 poles to a stake in a line of Enos King's survey; thence with same N. 23° W. 70 poles to a white oak James Strunk's corner; thence with his line to the beginning." It will be observed that the patent contains only 9 calls, but, as located by the surveyor, it has about 40 calls, and includes, not only the body of land indicated on the plot below given, but as much more lying west of it.

[1] The circuit court submitted to the jury the question of the location of the patent; but, as there is no dispute as to the facts, the proper location of the patent under the evidence is a question of law for the court. The following plot gives roughly the situation:

The beginning corner at a white oak, corner of a survey in the name of Alexander Murphy, is undisputed and is at 1 on the plot. The next line running from this corner S. 8° E., 16 poles, to a spotted oak, is also undisputed; this corner being at 2 on the plot. The next call S. 2° E., 44 poles, to a gum, is also undisputed, the gum being at 3 on the plot. The next call S. 70° E., 144 poles, to a stake in said line, takes us to the figure 4 on the plot. But it will be observed that this point is in a line of James Murphy's survey, and not in a line of John Murphy's survey, which is some distance south and east of this point. The next call of the patent is: "Thence with John Murphy's survey S. 20° W. 106 poles to a stake in a line of Isham Strunk's survey." If we run this line from 4 by the call of the patent, we strike a line of Isham Strunk's survey, but the distance called for in the patent gives out before we reach the line. The surveyors, instead of running from 4 to Isham Strunk's line followed the lines of other patents until they reached John Murphy's line, and then ran with his line to Isham Strunk's corner, and then followed his lines around. The proof shows that the surveyor who made the survey of the patent in fact ran only the lines from 1 to 2 and from 2 to 3, and we think it must be concluded that he thought he would reach John Murphy's land if he ran out from 3 144 poles; for it is evident that he did not intend to go to James Murphy's corner, because he calls for a stake in said line. The shape of the land as indicated in the plot accompanying the patent shows that he did not intend to include any land east of the line 4-5; and our conclusion is that the line should be run from figure 4 by the patent call to the figure 5, and that the patent does not include any land lying east of this line. The next call of the patent is: "thence with the same N. 10° W. 90 poles to a stake Strunk's corner." As shown by Strunk's patent, the line of that patent which is struck at 5 runs from a hickory and sugar tree, N. 62° W., 52 poles, to an ash and a poplar; thence N. 10° W., 40 poles, to an ash and a white oak. The ash and poplar are at 6 on the plot; the ash and white oak at 7. It will be observed that the call of the patent in contest is N. 10° W., corresponding with the call of the Isham Strunk survey, which is also N. 10° W., but that the distance is given as 90 poles, while there are two calls in the Isham Strunk patent, one for 52 poles and the other for 40 poles; the two making 92 poles. We conclude that the surveyor undertook to unite these two calls, and thus reached the distance as 90 poles, and that what he intended to do was to run with the Strunk line. This takes us to 7. The next call of the patent in contest is "thence with his line S. 31° W. 180 poles to a poplar and hickory." The calls of the Isham Strunk patent, however, run from 7 to 8 to 9 to 10 to 11 to 12; and the sum of the distances called for in these lines is 181 poles. The next call of the patent in contest is "S. 76° W. 120 poles to a stake in a line of Enos King's survey." This is a call of the Isham Strunk survey, and takes us to the point 13. It is evident that the surveyor intended to run with Isham Strunk's survey from the time he reached it until he reached the point 13; and our conclusion is that he undertook to unite the calls by adding the distances together. It follows that the survey in question must be run with Isham Strunk's line from the point 5 to the point 13. But, when we reach 13, we do not reach King's land, and, to reach his land, a large number of calls must be put into the patent making it to include on the west as much more land as it will include if closed from 13 on the patent calls. As the surveyor did not run these lines, we are satisfied that, when he called for a stake in a line of Enos King's survey, he simply made a mistake as to the location of the line of that survey, and that the patent must be closed by running the two closing lines from 13 to the beginning according to the patent calls as near as this may be done without interfering with the older survey. This would take us from 13 to 14 on the plot, and from 14 to the beginning. As thus run, the patent will contain over 100 acres of land lying in a boundary conforming to the general shape of the tract as indicated on the plot made by the surveyor.

[2] It is true the rule is that the calls of a patent for course and distance must give way to known or established objects found on the ground. But, after all, the rules that have been laid down on this subject are for the purpose of establishing the actual location of the lines and corners of the original survey, and they have little application where the lines were not run out in the original survey, but were simply laid down by the surveyor by protraction as was evidently the case in the patent before us. When the lines were not in fact run, we have little to guide us except the calls of the patent and the plot of the land accompanying the original survey. The plot accompanying the original survey is potent evidence in the determination of the general shape of the tract of land intended to be patented. To follow the lines of the other surveys in the case before us on the east to John Murphy's survey and on the west to King's survey, and then on around with still other surveys would be to make this tract include five times as much land as the grantee paid for and give the tract an entirely different shape from that which was evidently contemplated in the grant.

[3] While lines of a patent will be extended in order to reach a designated object, this will not be done where it is evident from all the facts that the surveyor simply made a mistake as to the location of the object; he supposing it to be at one place, when, in fact, it was at another. To run out this survey so as to reach on the east the lands of John Murphy and on the west the Enos King survey, we have not only to extend a line of the survey beyond any reasonable contemplation of mistake, but we have to put in a number of other lines on both sides of the survey. No rules of construction will justify such a departure from the calls of the patent and the plot accompanying the survey, where the lines were not in fact located on the ground, and the calls of the patent must control.

[4] Although the appellee's patent was inferior to appellant's and was void as the land had been previously granted, still, if he entered on his grant claiming to the extent of its boundary, he was in possession of all the land included in his patent; for his patent, though void, gave him color of title, and defined the extent of his possession. The circuit court should by his instructions under the evidence have located the Strunk patent as above indicated.

cult court should by his instructions under the evidence have located the Strunk patent as above indicated.

[5] If, on another trial, there is evidence of adverse possession by the defendant sufficient to take the case to the jury as to any part of the land, the court will by his instructions define the extent of possession under the facts shown by the evidence, so that only a question of fact will be submitted to the jury, and not both the law and the facts. Le Moyne v. Hays, 145 Ky. 415, 140 S. W. 552; Burt & Brabb Lumber Co. v. Sackett, 147 Ky. 232, 144 S. W. 84.

There is considerable evidence in the record in regard to the Copeland tract, or the Copeland survey as it is sometimes called, but no such survey is produced, and there is no proof of any marked boundary to which Copeland or those claiming under him held, as we understand the testimony.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial, and further proceedings consistent herewith.

LEGRANDE.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Dec. 12, 1912.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 217*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—ASSUMPTION OF RISK.

An employé of mature years who knew that a sufficiently lighted stairway used by her in going to and from the place of her work on the premises was steep, and not provided with any banisters, and that cleats were nailed on the side of each of the four top steps, and who made no complaint to her employer, and who was not assured or advised that the steps were safe, and who could by the exercise of reasonable care use the part of the steps unobstructed by cleats, assumed the risk of injury by falling down the steps, and could not recover for injuries so sustained.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 217*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—ASSUMPTION OF RISK.

An employé assumes the risks ordinarily incident to the business in which he is engaged, and, though the business may be hazardous and the surroundings not free from danger, yet, where he with knowledge of the conditions continues in the employment without objection, and injury results, the injury is the result of an assumed risk.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jefferson County, Common Pleas Branch, First Division.

Action by Josie Legrande against J. M. Robinson, Norton & Co. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Burwell K. Marshall, of Louisville, for appellant. O'Doherty & Yonts and Robt. J. Hagan, all of Louisville, for appellee.

LASSING, J. Josie Legrande had been for about two years prior to September 9, 1910, in the employ of J. M. Robinson, Norton & Co. She operated for said company a power machine, situated on the third floor of their factory building in Louisville. The steps leading up to this floor were steep. They were three feet wide. A solid wall was on either side, and there was no handrail. There was a cleat, or small wooden block, nailed on the side of each of the four steps next to the third floor, on the left-hand side going up. No one of these cleats extended out, according to the testimony of all the witnesses, more than three inches, and some of them put it from one and a half to two inches. The stairway was lighted by windows at the bottom on the second floor and at the top landing, so that one going up and down could readily see the way. On September 9th, at noon, while Josie Legrande was going down the steps, she fell, and sustained severe injuries. Allying that her fall was occasioned by the negligence of her employers in failing to furnish her a reasonably safe way or place to go to and return from her work, she filed suit to recover damages, and in her petition set up three particulars in which her employers were negligent, to wit: The stairway was steep, not supplied with banisters, and obstructed by the cleats or blocks of wood nailed on each of the four top steps at the left-hand side going up. She testified that she had been in the employ of the defendant company for 22 months, and that her employment had taken her up and down this flight of stairs at least twice a day during the time that she worked there; that she knew that the steps were steep and not provided with handrails; and that these small blocks or cleats were nailed or fastened in some way to the four top steps next to the wall on the left-hand side going up. Upon this showing the defendant insisted that it was entitled to a peremptory instruction. The trial judge declined to entertain this motion, submitted the case to the jury on the question of negligence, and plaintiff recovered a verdict for $500. To reverse the judgment predicated thereon the company prosecutes this appeal.

It is practically conceded that there was no error during the conduct of the trial in admitting or rejecting evidence. No complaint is made of the amount awarded by the jury, and the sole ground upon which reversal is sought is that the court erred in not peremptorily instructing the jury to find for the defendant.

[1] Rarely is a case presented where there is so little conflict in the testimony. Appellee, a woman of mature years, had been in the employ of the appellant company for more than 22 months. She, as well as her employers, knew that the stairway was steep; that it was not provided with any banisters on either side; and that these blocks or cleats were nailed upon the side of each of the four top steps. She testified that the stairway was sufficiently lighted. It is most earnestly insisted that this state of facts, as developed by her testimony alone, brings the case squarely within the principle announced by this court in B. F. Avery & Sons v. Lung, 106 S. W. 865, 32 Ky. Law Rep. 702, where the court said: "The doctrine which requires the master to provide and maintain a reasonably safe place in which his servant is to labor does not admit of that construction which excuses the servant from using his eyes, and the plainest precaution for his own safety. * * * When they can see and actually see the conditions, and without complaint or assurance undertake to do their work in these conditions, in the absence of statutory responsibility, they assume such risks as are incident to the conditions." We are of opinion that the point is well taken. There is no claim that appellee was not perfectly familiar with the surroundings. She knew of the existence of every defect, if they may be termed such, which, in her petition, she charges contributed to her injury. She made no complaint to her employer, nor was she, by any one connected with the defendant company, assured or advised that the steps were safe. So that in their daily use it must be presumed that she assumed the risks incident thereto. A very similar question was before this court in American Tobacco Co. v. Adams, 137 Ky. 414, 125 S. W. 1067. A recovery in that case was sought upon the ground that the employer had not furnished the employé a safe place in which to work. A jury returned a verdict for $1,500, and the company appealed. Appellee slipped and fell to the floor. He alleged that the floor had been permitted to become defective by reason of grooves, worn in it by the wheels of a truck that was used in the handling of the tobacco; that the roof was defective and leaky and permitted the water during the rainy periods, to accumulate in these ruts or grooves in the floor; and that this rendered the floor at that point dangerous and unsafe to employes in the discharge of their duties. Appellee had, for sometime, been familiar with conditions and had, in fact, sought to have the defects remedied. The place, at which he was working was sufficiently lighted for him to see the grooves and the accumulation of water therein. In holding that he could not recover, the court there said: "Every person of ordinary intelligence knows that a wet floor is slippery, and that one is more likely to fall than if the place is dry. A person under circumstances like these who is required to walk over a slippery floor in an employment like this which is free from any danger or hazard cannot recover merely because he slips and falls. The place was not intrinsically dangerous. The employment was not at all hazardous. The implements used were of the simplest character. The servant under facts like these will not be heard to say that he did not see or know the conditions that existed immediately under his eyes."

In the later case of Foreman v. L. & N. R. Co., 142 Ky. 63, 133 S. W. 964, the principle announced in B. F. Avery & Sons v. Lung, supra, was reaffirmed; the excerpt above copied being quoted with approval. In Interstate Coal Co. v. Deaton, 148 Ky. 160, 146 S. W. 396, a boy was injured while driving a loaded wagon into a doorway. The evidence showed that he was familiar with the surroundings and had driven in and out of the door in question eight or ten times a day for eleven days. The testimony further showed that on the occasion when he was injured he stopped just before he entered the door, and, although he testified that he did not, at the time, observe the cross-beam overhead, with which he came in contact and which caused his injury, the opinion says: "While he claims that he did not know of the danger, there are some things that one must know. He must know those things which are right before his eyes, and which he himself admits having seen. The cross-beam was right in front of him. He intended to drive under. He admits that he saw it, and bowed his head to escape being struck. He says that he was caught on the shoulder after he got his head under, and this was due to the fact that the front wheels rose upon the sill. From his own statement he was seated about the middle of the wagon. Therefore, the front wheels struck the sill before he bowed his head. Although inexperienced in driving a wagon, he had sufficient judgment and discretion to know that if, in approaching an object right before his eyes, he did not keep out of its way, he would be struck. His earliest instinct taught him this, and it must have been confirmed many a time before he reached the age of 17 years. It is never necessary to warn a servant of a danger which he knows and appreciates. * * * He was injured solely because he failed to lower his head sufficiently to escape striking the cross-beam, although he had plenty of room for that purpose. The accident, therefore, was due to his own lack of ordinary care, and for this appellant is not responsible."

[2] From the foregoing and numerous authorities, to the same effect, which might be cited, it is apparent that the rule in this state is well settled, that an employé assumes the risks and hazards ordinarily incident to the business in which he is engaged, and that, although this business may be of a hazardous nature and his surroundings not free from danger, if he, with full knowledge of the existence of such conditions and dangers, without objection, continues in the employment, and injury results, it has uniformly been held that such injury is the result of an assumed risk, rather than

of any actionable negligence on the part of his employer. This rule is applicable, with most peculiar force to the facts in the case at bar. The only negligence with which appellant is charged is that its employes were provided with a stairway that was unusually steep; that there were no handrails on the side; and that small cleats or blocks were nailed upon one side of the four top steps. Just how long these cleats had been there the evidence does not show. The stairway had been in this identical condition during the whole time that appellee had been employed there. She knew just how steep it was, she knew that there were no handrails, and she knew of the existence of these cleats. It was well lighted. She could see the cleats. Indeed, had she looked, she could not have failed to see them. The steps were three feet wide. The cleats covered not more than three inches on the right-hand side of each of the four top steps going down. There was left for her use about 33 inches, more than five-sixths of these steps, free and unobstructed by any cleat. Had she exercised the slightest care, she could have avoided stepping on them. Indeed, it is apparent that she must have walked practically against the right-hand wall of the building, as she went down the steps, or else she could not have stepped upon the cleat.

Practically this same question was before this court in Mann v. Moore, 68 S. W. 402, 24 Ky. Law Rep. 253. In that case Mann was engaged by Moore as a warehouseman. His duties took him frequently to the second floor of the bonded warehouse. Upon one occasion, while on the second floor, he went hurriedly to the first floor to answer a telephone call. In coming down the steps he fell, and was severely injured. Alleging that his injury was due to the negligence of his employer in failing to furnish him a reasonably safe place in which to work, he sued. The defendant denied liability and pleaded contributory negligence. Upon the trial there was a verdict for the defendant. Upon appeal here a reversal was sought chiefly upon the ground that the trial court did not properly instruct the jury. In considering the case the court found that the instruction complained of was practically a peremptory to find for the defendant, and in passing upon the question of the correctness of the instruction given said: "So the question is presented, Was there error in instructing the jury peremptorily to find for defendants at the close of the case? We are of opinion there was not. Indeed, the testimony of appellant himself shows that he knew, or by any kind of care or observation could have known, of the condition of this stair. He used it almost daily for about six months; in fact since it was built, and oftener than any other person. If the steps were so steep as to be dangerous, appellant must have discovered this fact in six months' constant use.

If the steps are so dangerous as to make appellee liable for injury, the appellant was guilty of the same degree of negligence in not making the discovery in six months' use. But it is said that the urgent call at the telephone required appellant to hasten, and for the time to forget the dangerous steps. We do not think that an ordinary call at the telephone is such an emergency as will excuse a lack of care for one's own safety. A telephone is no more than an ordinary call by one person to another to come for the purpose of conversation. There was no emergency shown in the call, and, if there had been, appellant had no notice of such emergency. He only heard the telephone bell ring. * * * The peremptory instruction should have been given at the close of appellant's evidence."

There is a striking similarity between that case and the case at bar. The only difference is in degree. The plaintiff there knew that the steps were unsafe, just as did appellee here. The court found that the plaintiff was familiar with the steps. He had used them constantly for six months. Appellee is shown to have been familiar with the steps in this case, having used them almost daily for 22 months. There was nothing in the present case to require appellee to go down the steps hastily. She could have taken her own time, and, if she went with such haste as to prevent her making a safe passage down the stairway, appellant was certainly not responsible therefor. Upon appellee's own testimony it is apparent that she was not entitled to recover, and the trial judge erred in not sustaining the motion for a peremptory instruction at the close of her testimony.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded for further proceedings consistent herewith.

LANDERS et al. v. LANDERS et al.
MOTLEY et al. v. SAME.

1. JUDGMENT (§ 953*)—EVIDENCE AS TO JUDGMENT—WEIGHT AND SUFFICIENCY.

In an action involving the title to land, evidence held to show that, in a prior action to which the person under whom defendant claimed was a party, the construction of a will devising the land was involved, and it was adjudged that such person had a defeasible fee, although the papers in the action had been destroyed by fire.

2. COURTS (§ 35*)—JURISDICTION—PRESUMPTIONS.

Where a commissioner's deed to a person having an undivided interest in land under a will conveying to him a part of such land during his natural life with remainder to the heirs of another, if the first taker died without children, recited that it was made pursuant to a judgment of the Circuit Court in an action pending therein, it would be presumed, where the papers in such action had been destroyed by fire, that the construction of such will was involved in that action, since, the circuit court being a court of general jurisdiction, every presumption in favor of its jurisdiction will be indulged.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Cent. Dig. §§ 88-45; Dec. Dig. § 35.*]

3. JUDGMENT (§ 686*)—CONCLUSIVENESS—PERSONS CONCLUDED.

A judgment in an action to which plaintiff's husband was a party, construing a will under which he claimed, which judgment had never been set aside or reversed, was conclusive against plaintiff as devisee of her husband.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 1209; Dec. Dig. § 686.*]

4. DOWER (§ 18*)—ESTATES SUBJECT TO DOWER—DETERMINABLE FEE.

A widow is entitled to dower in land in which her husband owns a defeasible fee.

5. WILLS (§ 782*)—ELECTION—PROVISION FOR SURVIVING WIFE.

A widow is not entitled to dower or a distributable share of her husband's estate where she fails to renounce the provisions of his will in her favor within 12 months from its probate.

6. WILLS (§ 782*)—ELECTION—PROVISIONS FOR SURVIVING WIFE.

A widow is not required to elect between her right of dower and a devise from her husband where the husband could not dispose of the property devised by will, and hence, where he had only a defeasible fee, a claim of ownership by her under the devise did not prevent her from afterwards claiming dower.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 2018-2033; Dec. Dig. § 782.*]

7. WASTE (§ 5*)—PERSONS WHO MAY COMMIT WASTE—OWNER OF DEFEASIBLE FEE.

The owner of a defeasible fee is not chargeable with waste, although equity will sometimes restrain him from committing equitable waste.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waste, Cent. Dig. § 4; Dec. Dig. § 5.*]

8. ESTATES (§ 6*)—BASE OR QUALIFIED FEE—RIGHTS OF OWNER.

The proprietor of a qualified or base fee has the same rights and privileges till the contingency upon which it is limited occurs as if he were tenant in fee simple.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Estates, Cent. Dig. § 6; Dec. Dig. § 6.*]

9. WASTE (§ 4*)—"EQUITABLE WASTE."

"Equitable waste" is such acts as at law would not be esteemed to be waste under the circumstances of the case, but which is so esteemed by a court of equity because of their manifest injury to the inheritance, although not inconsistent with the legal rights of the party committing them. It is a wanton and unconscientious abuse of the rights of the party in possession, ruinous to the interests of other parties; such acts as a prudent man would not do with his own property.

trix of Bryant Landers, and by Elizabeth Motley and others against L. D. Landers and others, in which Nealie Landers intervened as defendant. Bradburn & Basham, of Bowling Green, and J. H. Gilliam, of Scottsville, for appellants. G. D. Millikin and Sims & Rodes, all of Bowling Green, for appellees.

CLAY, C. These two actions have been consolidated, and will be considered in one opinion.

Isaac Landers died testate in the year 1854, leaving a widow, four daughters, and six sons, to wit, Bryant Landers, John Landers, Samuel Landers, Solomon Landers, Doc Landers, and Jacob Landers. After devising all of his property to his wife for life, he directed certain sums of money to be paid to his daughters, and, upon the death of his wife, that his land, consisting of about 900 acres, be divided equally between his sons. The widow, Patsey Landers, died in the year 1887. In the year 1873 John Landers, a son and devisee of Isaac Landers, died testate, unmarried and without issue. By his will he made certain provisions for his brothers and sisters, and directed that his brother Jacob Landers should have no part of his estate.

His will, in so far as it affects Bryant Landers, is as follows:

"To Bryant Landers, my brother, I give and bequeath, which is willed to me in my father's will which is one-sixth ($\frac{1}{6}$) part of all the lands belonging to my father at his death.

"I also give to him one-fifth part of one-sixth part of my father's land which was willed to my brother Solomon Landers now going to the heirs of said Solomon Landers which I bought of John W. Landers one of the heirs of the said Solomon Landers.

"I also give unto the said Bryant Landers my interest in my brother Samuel Landers' estate, is now dead, his interest in his father's land which is one-ninth ($\frac{1}{9}$) part of said land. If said Bryant Landers dies without heirs then my will is that it be equally divided between all my brothers and sisters of their heirs or descendants, except my brother Jacob Landers, or his heirs or descendants."

In 1910 Bryant Landers died testate and without issue, leaving a widow, Nealie Landers, who was appointed and qualified as his executrix.

In the first action plaintiffs, J. E. Landers and others, who were Bryant Landers' brothers and sisters and their descendants, sued Nealie Landers, individually and as executrix of Bryant Landers, deceased, to recover the sum of $4,792, the reasonable value of timber which it is alleged Bryant Landers cut and removed from the tract of land consisting of 170 acres, which represented the one-sixth interest of John Landers in the estate of his father, Isaac Landers, and which he devised to Bryant Landers. The petition charges that Bryant Landers took only a defeasible fee in the land in question under and by virtue of John Landers' will, and that, having died without issue, the tract in controversy passed to plaintiffs under John Landers' will; that in the division of Isaac Landers' land upon the death of his widow, Patsey Landers, the tract of 170 acres was allotted to Bryant Landers; that he held and occupied it up until his death, and that during his occupancy he unlawfully and without right cut and removed the timber in question. After filing a general demurrer to the petition, which was overruled, Nealie Landers individually and as executrix filed an answer pleading that Bryant Landers was the absolute owner of the land in controversy, and that, even if he was not, the claim of plaintiffs was barred by the statute of limitations. She further answered that, even though Bryant Landers had only a defeasible fee in the land in question, still he had the right to cut and remove the timber from the land without impeachment for waste.

The second action mentioned in the caption is a suit by Elizabeth Motley and others against L. D. Landers and others to sell a tract of 177 acres of land on the ground that the plaintiffs and defendants were the joint owners thereof, and the land could not be divided without materially impairing its value. It was charged in the petition that Bryant Landers took only a defeasible fee in the land in question, and that, he having died without issue, plaintiffs and defendants became vested with the absolute title thereto. In this proceeding Nealie Landers filed a petition and answer, asking to be made a party, and alleging that Bryant Landers was the absolute owner of the property under and by virtue of the will of John Landers, and that she was the absolute owner of the property under and by virtue of the will of Bryant Landers. The allegations of the petition and answer were denied by reply, and plaintiffs affirmatively pleaded that Bryant Landers had merely a defeasible fee in the property, which was defeated by his dying without issue. Subsequently Nealie Landers filed an amended answer in which she, without abandoning her claim of absolute ownership, pleaded alternatively that, in the event the court should declare that Bryant Landers had only a defeasible fee in the tract in controversy, she individually was entitled to dower in the property, or the cash value thereof out of the proceeds. Plaintiffs pleaded that having elected to take under her husband's will, and having claimed the property absolutely under and by virtue of his will, she was estopped from claiming dower therein, more than one year having elapsed between the time of probate of her husband's will and her acceptance of its provisions and the filing of her amended answer. To her request for a construction of the will of John Landers, and to her claim of absolute ownership, plaintiffs interposed a plea of res judicata. They alleged that in the year 18—, a suit was instituted by Bryant Landers and others against J. W. Landers and others in the Allen circuit court to obtain a construction of the will of Isaac Landers, and also the will of John Landers; that judgment was entered construing both of said wills, and that by the judgment in question it was adjudged that Bryant Landers took only a defeasible fee in the tract in controversy; that, pursuant to said judgment, commissioners were appointed to divide and allot the lands of Isaac Landers and John Landers; that division and partition was made by the commissioners, and the tract in controversy, being lot No. 3 in said division, was allotted to Bryant Landers for and during his natural life, with remainder to the heirs of John Landers, except Jacob Landers, in the event said Bryant Landers died without children; that pursuant to this allotment and division, and the orders of the court, a deed was made by the master commissioner, conveying the tract in question to Bryant Landers upon the terms and conditions above set out, which the said Bryant Landers accepted and put to record, and under which he had ever since held and occupied the land. It was further pleaded that this judgment had never been set aside or reversed, and was in full force and effect, and was conclusive on the parties and all those holding under them. Nealle Landers denied the allegations of the reply with reference to the plea of res judicata. In the action for waste, plaintiffs' petition was dismissed, and they appeal.

In the second suit, the plea of res judicata, as to the construction of John Landers' will, was sustained. The court, however, held that Nealle Landers had dower in the 177 acres of land. From that part of the judgment holding that Nealle Landers was entitled to dower plaintiffs appeal, and from that part of the judgment sustaining the plea of res judicata Nealle Landers prosecutes a cross-appeal.

[1] As the determination of the other questions involved depends upon the character of estate Bryant Landers took under the will of his brother, John Landers, we shall first proceed to a consideration of that question. The plea of res judicata, if good, dispenses with the necessity for considering the will of John Landers. It appears from the evidence that a few years ago the courthouse of Allen county was destroyed by fire, and that the records of the circuit clerk's office, including the papers in the suit of Bryant Landers and Others v. I. W. Landers and Others, in which it is claimed the will of John Landers was construed, were burned. A certified copy of the deed, however, which was made to Bryant Landers in that suit is in the record. The deed, however, which was made to Bryant Landers in that suit is in the record; the deed book in which it was recorded being only partially burned. The deed contains the following provisions: "Whereas, in the action of Bryant Landers, Dock Landers, Jacob Landers, Thomas W. Dodson, A. J. Dodson and Luther Dodson, Plaintiffs, against I. W. Landers, Isaac Landers, Sidney Landers, Patsy Moore (late Landers and her husband, Hozy Moore), Nahala Hunt (late Landers and husband R. N. Hunt), Laney Motley (formerly Landers), Elizabeth Motley (late Landers and her husband, E. C. Motley), Martha Kuykendol (late Dodson and husband Hardin Kuykendol), Isaac Dodson [balance of defendants' names written on the margin and was burned off], then pending in the Allen circuit court, an order was entered at the May term, 1887, directing F. G. Harlan, the master commissioner of said court, to execute a deed of conveyance to said Bryant Landers during his natural life with remainder to the heirs of John Landers, excluding Jacob Landers, in the event Bryant Landers died without heirs of his body, now, therefore: This indenture, made and entered into this 6th day of May, 1887, between the above named plaintiffs and defendants, by F. G. Harlan, commissioner of the said court, of the first part, and Bryant Landers of the second part, witnesseth, that for and in consideration of the premises, the parties of the first part, by F. G. Harlan, as commissioner aforesaid, by this writing do convey to said party of the second part during his natural life with remainder to the heirs of John Landers, Decd. excluding Jacob Landers in the event of said Bryant's death without children of his body, the following described property, to wit: [Here follows description of property and other provisions not necessary to be set out.]"

The deed shows that it was examined and approved in open court on the 7th day of May, 1887, by D. R. Carr, judge. The certificate of the circuit clerk on the deed shows that it was acknowledged by F. G. Harlan, commissioner, and was examined by the court, approved, confirmed, and so indorsed by the judge, and ordered to be transmitted, duly certified, to the clerk of the Allen circuit court for record, which was accordingly done. The certificate of the circuit clerk is dated May 10, 1887. Following the certificate of the circuit clerk is the certificate of the clerk of the county court to the effect that the deed in question was produced to him in his office on May 10, 1887, certified for record, and that the same, together with the certificate, had been recorded in his office. In addition to this evidence, Judge B. W. Bradburn testified that he had been a practicing attorney for 30 years or more.

He began the practice of law in Scottsville, Ky., in 1878. In 1886 or 1887 Bryant Landers and his brother, Doc Landers, and other brothers and sisters and their children, instituted a suit in the Allen circuit court for the construction of the will of their father, Isaac Landers, and their brother John Landers, and for a division of the land devised by the said Isaac Landers under his will. This suit was brought by Judge I. H. Goodnight of Franklin, Ky., and John M. Wilkins of Bowling Green, Ky., for Bryant Landers and the other plaintiffs. The judge who presided over the Allen circuit court at that time was Preston H. Leslie. When he testified, Goodnight, Wilkins, and Leslie were all dead. Bradburn was appointed guardian ad litem or attorney for nonresident defendants; possibly both. He examined the petition, and remembered distinctly that the suit was brought for a construction of the will of Isaac Landers and of John Landers. Judge P. H. Leslie was then the presiding judge, and rendered a judgment in which he determined that by the will of Isaac Landers his sons took one-sixth each in the land of their father, subject to the life estate of their mother. The court further adjudged that John Landers took a one-sixth interest in said lands, and that, under the will of John Landers, Bryant Landers took a defeasible fee, and that his interest in the John Landers estate in case Bryant Landers died without issue passed to his brothers and sisters and the descendants of those who died, except Jacob Landers and his descendants. In accordance with said judgment, commissioners were appointed to divide the lands of Isaac Landers into six shares or parcels. John Landers having died prior to the time of the division, the court directed the master commissioner to convey the one-sixth allotted to the estate of John Landers to Bryant Landers during his life, provided he died without bodily heirs, and then to his brothers and sisters and their descendants, except Jacob Landers and his descendants. In conformity to the judgment of the court the land was so deeded by the master commissioner. This judgment was never set aside or appealed from. After the judgment was so prepared, it was either read over to him in his presence or read by him. He remembered that the judgment was entered, and that the commissioners who divided the land filed their report. The report was confirmed, and the master commissioner directed to make deeds of conveyance according to said judgment. The deeds were so made and approved by the judge of said court. The deeds were certified to the clerk's office for record. The clerk recorded the same, and the deed filed with plaintiffs' reply is a correct copy of the original deed made by the master commissioner under the direction of the court. On cross-examination Judge Bradburn stated he was attorney of record for the plaintiffs in this case. Upon referring to the deed, he stated he was mistaken in stating that Leslie was the presiding judge, because it appeared from the deed that D. R. Carr was the presiding judge. He could not remember who the sheriff was at the time, or who the commissioner was. He could name but two of the three commissioners who divided the land. Did not remember what kind of pleadings he filed as attorney for nonresident or guardian ad litem, but supposed they were the usual kind of pleadings which would be filed by a young attorney in such a case. He also stated his practice had been large in the years subsequent to the suit in question, and nothing had occurred in the meantime to recall the suit, or to impress it on his mind.

W. H. Justice, the clerk of the Allen county court, testified that the copy of the deed above referred to was a correct copy of the original deed of record in his office; that the greater part of the records in the Allen county court were destroyed by the fire in 1892, but this particular deed was intact, with the exception of one or two words on the margin of the page of the deed book which had been charred, but this condition was not sufficient to render the deed unintelligible.

Judge D. R. Carr, who is quite old, testified that he was the presiding judge of the Allen circuit court at the time it is claimed that the action for the construction of John Landers' will was pending. He had no recollection of said suit.

[2] It will be observed that the deed in question is not only regular in all respects, but, after setting out the parties to the action, recites that an order was entered at the May term, 1887, directing F. G. Harlan, the master commissioner of the court, to execute a deed of conveyance to Bryant Landers during his natural life, with remainder to the heirs of John Landers, excluding Jacob Landers, in the event Bryant Landers died without heirs of his body. Thus the deed itself shows that it was made pursuant to the foregoing order. The Allen circuit court being a court of general jurisdiction, every presumption in favor of its jurisdiction will be indulged. There being the aforesaid order, directing not only what land should be conveyed to Bryant Landers, but how the land should be conveyed, it will be presumed that the court had before it the question of the construction of John Landers' will, and that the order was predicated on the will as construed by the court, rather than that the order was entered without the question of construction being before the court. While it is true that Judge Bradburn was mistaken in believing that P. H. Leslie was presiding over the court at the time of the pendency of the action, instead of D. R. Carr, and there are other matters about which his memory is at fault, he testified unequivocally to the fact that the construction of John Landers' will was involved in that action. Considering the deed itself in connection with the testimony of Judge Bradburn, and the further fact that Bryant Landers himself accepted the deed and put it to record and held the land under it for a number of years, we conclude that, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, the evidence is sufficient to show that in the action in question the construction of John Landers' will was involved, and that a judgment was entered adjudging that Bryant Landers take under the will of John Landers only a defeasible fee.

[3] Bryant Landers being a party to that action, and there being a judgment construing the will of John Landers, and that judgment never having been set aside or reversed, it is res judicata, and conclusive upon Nealie Landers, the devisee of Bryant Landers.

[4] The next question to be determined is: Is Nealie Landers, the widow of Bryant Landers, entitled to dower in the land in question? It is the well-settled rule in Kentucky that, where the husband owns a defeasible fee in land, the widow on his death is entitled to dower. Rice v. Rice, 133 Ky. 406, 118 S. W. 270. Counsel for plaintiffs recognize this rule, but insist that as Nealie Landers claimed the absolute ownership of the tract in controversy under and by virtue of her husband's will, and continued to do so for a period of two years, her election to take under the will precludes her from asserting dower in the tract in controversy.

[5] It is true that under our statutes and decisions the widow of a testator is not entitled to her dower and distributable share of her husband's estate where she has failed to renounce the provisions of his will within 12 months from the time of its probate. Kentucky Statutes, § 1404; Bayes, etc., v. Howes, etc., 113 Ky. 465, 68 S. W. 449, 24 Ky. Law Rep. 281; Morgan et al. v. Christian et al., 142 Ky. 14, 133 S. W. 982. The reason for the statute and the rule is that the positions of devisee and doweress are absolutely inconsistent. Subject to the exceptions in the statute, she must take either what the husband devises, or what the law gives her. Having elected to take under the will, she cannot thereafter assert a claim for dower.

[6] Manifestly the statute and the decisions based thereon apply only to property which may be the subject of a devise. Bryant Landers having only a defeasible fee in the property in question, his authority ended at his death. No heir of his could inherit any interest therein, and no creditor of his could subject the property. Nor could he dispose of it by will. As a defeasible fee is not a proper subject for disposition by will, it cannot be said that the widow in asserting dower therein is claiming in opposition to the will. We therefore conclude that her election to take under her husband's will did not preclude her from asserting dower in the tract in controversy.

[7] The next question to be determined is whether or not plaintiffs may recover damages from the estate of Bryant Landers for the timber cut and removed by him from the 170 acres of land devised to him by John Landers, and in which he owned only a defeasible fee. Our statute on the subject does not cover a defeasible fee so recourse must be had to the common law. In 2 Blackstone, p. 282, we find the following: "Let us next see who are liable to be punished for committing waste. And by the feudal law, feuds being originally granted for life only, we find that the rule was general for all vassals or feudatories. 'Si vassalus feudum dissipaverit, aut insigni detrimento deterius fecerit, privabitur.' But in our ancient common law the rule was by no means large; for not only he that was seised of an estate of inheritance might do as he pleased with it, but also waste was not punishable in any tenant save only in three persons, guardian in chivalry, tenant in dower, and tenant by the curtesy, and not in tenant for life or years; and the reason of the diversity was that the estate of the three former was created by the act of the law itself, which therefore gave remedy against them, but tenant for life or for years came in by the demise and lease of the owner of the fee, and therefore he might have provided against the committing of waste by his lessee, and, if he did not, it was his own default. But in favor of the owners of the inheritance the statutes of Marlbridge (St. 52 Hen. III, c. 23). and of Gloucester (St. 6 Edw. I, c. 5) provided that the writ of waste shall not only lie against tenants by the law of England (or curtesy) and those in dower, but against any farmer or other that holds in any manner for life or years. So that for above five hundred years past all tenants merely for life, or for any less estate, have been punishable or liable to be impeached for waste, both voluntary and permissive, unless their lease be made, as sometimes they are, without impeachment of waste, absque impetitione vasti; that is, with a provision or protection that no man shall impetere, or sue him for waste, committed. But tenant in tail after possibility of issue extinct is not impeachable for waste; because his estate was at its creation an estate of inheritance, and so not within the statutes. Neither does an action of waste lie for the debtor against tenant by statute, recognizance, or elegit, because against them the debtor may set off the damages in account; but it seems reasonable that it should lie for the reversioner, expectant on the determination of the debtor's own estate, or of those estates derived from the debtor."

[8] The proprietor of a qualified or base fee has the same rights and privileges over his estate till the contingency upon which it is limited occurs as if he were tenant in fee simple. Walsingham's Case, Plowd. 557—Chitty. In Weed v. Woods, 71 N. H. 581, 53 Atl. 1024, it was held that, where a deed reserves to a grantor a certain portion of the premises so long as a religious association may want it, the estate retained is a qualified or determinable fee; and during its continuance the grantor and his successors in title, while they retain possession, have all the rights of tenants in fee simple. Mr. Washburn in his treatise on Real Property (4th Ed.) vol. 1, p. 89, § 86, in speaking of the incidents of a determinable fee, says: "So long as the estate in fee remains the owner in possession has all the rights in respect to it which he would have if tenant in fee simple, unless it be so limited that there is properly a reversionary right in another—something more than a possibility of reverter belonging to a third person—when, perhaps, chancery might interpose to prevent waste of the premises." In Gannon v. Peterson, 193 Ill. 372, 55 L. R. A. 701, 62 N. E. 210, it was held that the opening of mines and the mining of coal by the owner of a determinable fee in property of which the coal constituted the chief value was not such waste as could be enjoined by the owners of the expectancy, who claimed under an executory devise—at least where it is not made to appear that the contingency which would determine the fee was reasonably certain to happen. In discussing the question the court said: "The authorities are uniform as to the definition, duration, and extent of a base or determinable fee. They are agreed that it is a fee-simple estate, not absolute, but qualified. Upon the death of the donee, his widow has dower, although the contingency may have happened that defeats the estate, and that within the general acceptance and meaning of the term the person seised of such an estate is not chargeable with waste."

[8] The only exception to this rule is that equity will sometimes restrain equitable waste. Equitable waste is defined by Mr. Justice Story to consist of "such acts as at law would not be esteemed to be waste under the circumstances of the case, but which, in the view of a court of equity, are so esteemed from their manifest injury to the inheritance, although they are not inconsistent with the legal rights of the party committing them." 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 915. The same author further says: "In all such cases the party is deemed guilty of a wanton and unconscientious abuse of his rights, ruinous to the interests of other parties." Lord Chancellor Campbell, in Turner v. Wright, 6 Jur. N. S. 809, 29 L. J. Ch. N. S. 598, defines equitable waste to be "that which a prudent man would not do with his own property." Even if an action for damages would lie for equitable waste, a question not decided, there is nothing in the record before us to show that Bryant Landers was guilty of such waste. It does not appear that he was guilty of a wanton and unconscientious abuse of his rights, or that he did that which a prudent man would not do with his own property. We therefore conclude that the action for waste was properly dismissed.

The judgment in the case of J. E. Landers, etc., v. Nealle Landers, etc., is affirmed. The judgment in the case of Elizabeth Motley, etc., v. L. D. Landers, etc., is affirmed, both on the original and cross appeals.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Campbell County.

Proceeding by John Shields, Jr., and others, against Matthias Higgins. From an adverse judgment, Higgins appeals. Affirmed.

Samuel C. Bailey, of Newport, for appellant. Samuel E. Anderson and Barbour & Bassman, all of Newport, for appellees.

HOBSON, C. J. Matthias Higgins as receiver of the Campbell circuit court by an order of that court was placed in charge of certain real estate in Newport belonging to the Shields' estate in January, 1904. He failed to make any report as receiver, and in February, 1911, this proceeding was instituted against him by certain of the parties in interest who charged in their petition that he had collected and had in his hands rents amounting to something over $2,500. Upon their motion, he was ordered to settle his accounts, and, pursuant to this order, he filed a report of his accounts as receiver showing that he had collected rents to the amount of $983.90, and that there was a balance in his hands of $24.58. Numerous exceptions were filed to this report by the parties in interest, and the court referred the case to a special commissioner to take proof and report. He reported that there was a balance in the hands of the receiver of $701.98. The receiver excepted to the report, but his exceptions were overruled by the court. The report was confirmed and judgment entered against him for the amount. He appeals.

[1, 2] The appeal brings up practically simple questions of fact. It involves the renting for seven years of a number of pieces of property in Newport. It was the duty of the receiver in discharging his trust to exercise such care in renting the property and collecting the rents as might reasonably be expected of an ordinarily prudent person under the circumstances. If he failed by negligence to collect rents he should have collected, he is liable therefor. It was his duty to keep an account of what he collected and what he paid out, and it was also his duty under section 402, Ky. St., to file a report at each regular term of the court showing what he had collected and the amount remaining in his hands. For seven years he made no report. When he came before the special commissioner, he produced a book in which he testified that he had kept the account, and there was evidence tending to show that the account in this book was not kept contemporaneously with the transactions. The book is not before us on the appeal, and there is no copy of it in the transcript. We give considerable weight to the judgment of the chancellor on questions of fact, and, under all the circumstances shown, we do not think we should disturb his judgment. It is complained by the receiver that three small credits were not given him for which he produced receipts. On the other hand, he was not charged with some rents which the plaintiffs insisted that he should be charged with. He had received from his predecessor $360, and this sum he had placed to his own personal credit in bank and appears to have used it. While the proof is not clear as to the rent money, the proof would indicate that he also used this money in his own personal matters, and did not keep it separate. He was charged no interest on the fund. He claims that he was not allowed commissions, but, in view of the way he transacted the business and the fact that he was charged no interest on the fund, we do not see that he has any cause of complaint.

[3, 4] Interest will be allowed against a receiver where he has used the fund himself or commingled it with his own funds (23 Am. & Eng. Encyc. of Law, 1100; Hinckley v. Railroad Co., 100 U. S. 153, 25 L. Ed. 591), and, where he has been guilty of negligence or misconduct, the court, if the circumstances warrant it, may deny him any compensation for his services (22 Am. & Eng. Encyc. of Law, 1105, and cases cited).

Judgment affirmed.

LOVELY et al. v. KENTUCKY UNION CO.
(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Dec. 12, 1912.)

TRESPASS (§ 67*)—UNAUTHORIZED CUTTING OF TIMBER—OWNERSHIP OF LAND—EVIDENCE.

In an action to recover damages for timber alleged to have been cut and removed from land owned by the plaintiffs, the evidence held sufficient to go to the jury on the issue of the plaintiffs' title to such lands.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Breathitt County.

Action by Delilah Lovely and others against the Kentucky Union Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed, with directions to award new trial.

Byrd & Howard and T. T. Cope, all of Jackson, for appellants. W. B. Dixon, of Louisville, and O. H. Pollard, of Jackson, for appellee.

CARROLL, J. This suit was brought by the appellants as plaintiffs against the appellee as defendant to recover damages for timber alleged to have been cut and removed by appellee from land owned by appellants. The petition described a boundary of land from which the timber was cut, and the title to this land was put in issue by the appellee; it claiming to be the owner of it. The case went to trial before a jury, and upon the conclusion of the evidence for the plaintiffs the court directed a verdict for the defendant, and this appeal is prosecuted to obtain a reversal of the judgment entered on the verdict.

There are no maps, plats, or surveys in the record, and this makes it exceedingly difficult to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion as to the merits of the controversy. The appellants did not exhibit with their evidence any deeds or patents but relied upon a possessory title, and it is the contention of appellee that they failed to show such possession as would entitle them to recover. As we have concluded to order a new trial in the case, it is neither necessary nor proper that we should comment on the character or quantity of the evidence except to say that, in our opinion, there was sufficient to take the case to the jury.

It appears from the evidence for appellants that Thomas Hagins, Delilah Lovely's father, died about 1852, and there is evidence to the effect that he owned or claimed to own a large body of land on Quick Sand creek in Breathitt county. After his death his land was divided among his children, one of whom was the appellant, Delilah Lovely, who, at the time of her father's death, was a mere child. There is some testimony in her behalf conducing to show that soon after her father's death she married, and that she and her husband settled on the land allotted to her in the division of her father's estate, and that the land so allotted included all or a part of the land in controversy, and that after she married she lived on this land for 25 or 30 years, and afterwards rented it to tenants who occupied it.

John Hagins, a brother of appellant, testifies that his father had been in possession of the land in controversy for many years and up to the time of his death, and that after his death, and when the land was partitioned between the heirs, he assisted in marking the boundary of the land allotted to appellants, and that this land embraced the land from which the timber sued for in this action was cut and removed. He also testified to other facts tending to show a right of recovery in appellants, and we think the evidence of this witness was sufficient to at least make out such a case for appellants as, in the absence of countervailing evidence, entitled them to go to the jury.

It is said, however, by counsel for appellees, that the evidence of this witness, which was in the form of a deposition, was not read on the trial. The record shows that objection was made to the reading of the deposition of Hagins, and that the objection was overruled, with an admonition by the court to the jury to disregard some statements made by the witness, and the deposition appears in the transcript of the evidence, which was approved and certified according to law.

We take the liberty of suggesting, if there is another trial of the case, that before it is had the land in controversy be surveyed, and that such other surveys be made and accessible title papers be filed as will enable the court hearing the case to form a more satisfactory opinion as to the rights of the parties than can be obtained from the record in its present condition.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to award the plaintiffs a new trial.

No cause of action for the recovery of a bank deposit arises until demand and refusal, and consequently the statute of limitations does not begin to run against a depositor until refusal of payment on demand; this being so though the bank failed to credit the depositor with a deposit in his passbook—that failure not impairing the right of the depositor to payment.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Whitley County.

Action by Lon Rogers, as assignee of the Corbin Banking Company, against J. F. Bryant, who counterclaimed. From a judgment for defendant on his counterclaim, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Stephens & Steely, of Williamsburg, for appellant. Tye & Siler, of Williamsburg, for appellee.

LASSING, J. The Corbin Banking Company commenced business in the city of Corbin in the year 1902, and continued its corporate existence until some time in January, 1910, when, in winding up its affairs, it transferred its banking building and good will to the Whitley National Bank, and its assets, in the way of notes, accounts, etc., to one Lon Rogers, who undertook the collection of these notes and accounts, and assumed the payment of the bank's outstanding obligations. Among the claims which passed to Rogers was one against Dr. J. F. Bryant for rent of offices in the banking building for nine months at $5 per month. Upon presentation, the doctor declined to pay same, upon the ground that the bank was indebted to him. This action on the part of the doctor resulted in the filing of a suit in the Whitley quarterly court by Rogers against him for $45. Shortly thereafter Bryant instituted suit in the circuit court against Rogers, in which he sought to recover $414.34, claiming that this amount was due him on account of a deposit of $389.34 which he had made with the bank, and for which he had been given no credit, and $25, alleged to have been charged to his account without right. The trial in the quarterly court resulted in a verdict in favor of Rogers. This was appealed to the circuit court, and the two cases were consolidated and tried together. The jury found in favor of the doctor on his claim for $389.34, and in favor of Rogers on his claim for $45, and the court entered judgment in accordance with this finding. Rogers appeals, and seeks a reversal upon three grounds: First, that the court erred in instructing the jury; second, that the verdict is not sustained by the evidence, and is flagrantly against the weight of the evidence; and, third, that the plea of limitation interposed by Rogers to the claim of the doctor for $389.34 should have been sustained.

[1] This claim for $389.34 arose in the following manner: Appellee alleges that he made a deposit in the bank for this amount and received from the cashier of the bank a duplicate deposit slip; and he produced this slip, the genuineness of which was not contested by appellant. The passbook of appellee shows that he never received credit on his account for this amount. Appellant explains the issuance of this duplicate deposit ticket and the failure of the bank to give appellee credit on his account for this amount in this way: The cashier of the bank testifies that on the day upon which this duplicate deposit ticket was issued appellee came to the bank and borrowed $400, executed a note therefor, and that this $389.34 represented the net proceeds of said note, after deducting therefrom the discount at 8 per cent. for four months; that the deposit slip was entered on the file at the time the transaction was had, but that during the day, and before the books were made up, appellee returned to the bank and notified the cashier that he did not need the $400, as the business transaction in which he contemplated using it had fallen through, and requested that the note be returned to him. He states that this was done, and that the deposit slip, which had been placed on file, was torn up and destroyed by him, and on that account no entry whatever was made of the matter, either on the books of the bank, or upon appellee's passbook. Appellee showed that the cashier of the bank had never, on any other occasion, conducted a business transaction for the bank in the way in which, he says, he did this with appellee. Appellee's book had been balanced several times while he was doing business with the bank; and he made no claim, when it was so balanced, that the showing made by the bank was not correct. It is argued from this that, as no complaint was made until after he was sued for the rent, it is apparent that this claim is the result of an afterthought. And it is insisted that this position is strengthened by the further fact that about the time the bank was going out of business, and, in fact, just before it ceased to do business, appellee paid an overdraft to the bank for something like $200, thus practically admitting that at that time he had no thought that the bank was indebted to him.

There would be much force in this line of argument, if the evidence supported the contention upon which it is based. We find that upon this point appellee testified as follows: "About January 3, 1910, I think it was—the bank was then going out of business—Mr. Bishop came and says, 'You have overdrawn your account over $200,' and I says, 'No, I don't think I have,' and he says: 'You are; and Mr. Rogers is going to take charge of the bank, and I have been nice to you, and we have always gotten along, and I want you to fix it.' And he insisted that I give him a check. I said, 'You have not made up my passbook properly,' and he still insisted that I give him a check; and he says: 'We will make up your passbook, and if it is not right we will pay you.' And under that condition I gave him a check for $200 on some funds my wife had in the bank."

Although the cashier testified, this statement of appellee, to the effect that at that time he was claiming there was an error in his account, was not contradicted. With the record in this state, it was the province of the jury to determine the rights of the parties. The instructions given by the court presented the issue in a way in which it could not have been misunderstood by the jury. It was not a difficult question; and the verdict, as returned by the jury, clearly shows that they understood the questions at issue. There was really no denial, on the part of the doctor, that he had occupied offices in the banking building for nine months, or that he was to pay $5 per month therefor; and the jury accordingly awarded to appellant this amount. There was abundant evidence to support this finding; and no just complaint can be made of the jury because it accepted the evidence of appellee upon this point as true, rather than that of appellant and his witnesses.

Other minor errors are complained of, in brief, by counsel for appellant; but upon the whole case we are satisfied that he was given a fair opportunity to present his case to the jury; and, no reversible error being presented in the record, the judgment must be affirmed, unless the plea of the statute of limitation is well taken.

[2] The duplicate deposit slip, issued to appellee by the cashier of the bank, showed that appellee had deposited in bank, on that date, the sum of $389.34. It is insisted for appellant that, as more than five years had elapsed from the date of the deposit before demand was made by appellee for this money, his right to recover is barred. This position is not sound. No cause of action arises for the recovery of a demand bank deposit until after it has been demanded and its payment has been refused. Clark v. Farmers' National Bank, 124 Ky. 563, 90 S. W. 674, 30 Ky. Law Rep. 738. The statute of limitation does not, therefore, begin to run against a depositor in favor of a bank until he makes demand for the money and payment is refused. Koelzer v. First National Bank, 125 Wis. 595, 104 N. W. 838, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 571, 110 Am. St. Rep. 870, 4 Ann. Cas. 1144; Howell v. Adams, 68 N. Y. 314. Appellee never, at any time until the suit was instituted, made demand for this money; and he states the reason why he failed to do so was that, by an oversight, he did not notice that he had not been given credit for this money on his bank book. In response to this explanation, it is insisted for appellant that appellee is not entitled to recover, because he should have discovered that, by fraud or mistake, the bank had failed to give him credit for this money before the lapse of more than five years from the date upon which he was entitled to have credit for same. This contention of appellant need not be considered, for the reason that there is no effort to recover on the ground of fraud or mistake. It was not necessary, so far as appellee was concerned, that the record of the deposit of this money should have been entered upon his passbook. Evidently he did not have his passbook with him at the time the deposit was made, and the duplicate deposit slip served to take the place of the entry in his passbook. The failure of the bank to enter this deposit upon its books or the passbook is no defense for its refusal to pay upon demand, if, in fact, the deposit was made by appellee in said bank; and of this question the jury was the judge. The plea of the statute of limitation presenting no defense to the cause of action, the trial court properly sustained a demurrer thereto.

Upon a consideration of the whole case, we find no ground for disturbing the judgment of the lower court; and it is therefore affirmed.

RIEGER et al. v. SCHULTE & EICHER et al.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Dec. 10, 1912.)

1. MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 164*)—LIEN OF SUB-CONTRACTORS AND MATERIALMEN.

Subcontractors and materialmen have a lien on a building to the extent of the amount for which the contractor was entitled to a lien.

2. MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 115*)—LIEN OF SUB-CONTRACTORS AND MATERIALMEN—PAYMENT TO CONTRACTOR.

Subcontractors and materialmen are entitled to a lien for the work done and material furnished in the erection of a building, although the owner thereof has paid the full contract price; the only limitation upon such right being that the sum total of their claims shall not exceed the contract price.

3. JURY (§ 13*)—RIGHT TO TRIAL BY JURY—LEGAL OR EQUITABLE ACTION — CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS.

Const. § 7, which declares that the right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate, does not guarantee the right to a jury trial of issues of fact arising in every equity case, but in those cases in which, at common law, a litigant was entitled to a jury trial; and in cases of purely equitable cognizance a trial by jury is not a matter of right, but is within the discretion of the chancellor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Jury, Cent. Dig. §§ 35-83; Dec. Dig. § 13.*]

4. JURY (§ 14*)—RIGHT TO TRIAL BY JURY—LEGAL OR EQUITABLE ACTIONS—ENFORCEMENT OF MECHANICS' LIENS.

Civ. Code Prac. § 12, provides that in an equitable action, properly commenced as such, either party may on motion have the case transferred for the trial of any issue concerning which he is entitled to a jury trial. Ky. St. §§ 2471, 2472, 2473, provide that a proceeding to enforce a mechanics' lien shall be an equitable one conducted as other proceedings in equity in similar cases, except as otherwise provided, and that, after 10 days from the filing of the petition, the clerk shall refer the case to a commissioner and deliver to him the pleadings and papers in the suit; that the commissioner shall hear all persons claiming liens against the property, with a right to the owner to contest any claim presented, and audit the claims and report the amount to each claimant with the evidence on which each claim is allowed. Held, that the purpose of the statute was to provide a speedy method of determining the validity of asserted liens against the property, and that questions as to whether alleged defects were properly chargeable to any of the lien claimants, and, if so, the extent to which their liens should be abated, were not intended to be tried by jury.

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1170*)—REVIEW—ERROR AFFECTING A SUBSTANTIAL RIGHT.

In view of Civ. Code Prac. § 756, providing that no judgment shall be reversed for error at the trial not affecting the substantial rights of the appellant, the Court of Appeals, though doubtful as to whether the chancellor erred in not transferring issues for trial by jury, will not direct a reversal if it finds the findings and judgment of the chancellor to be correct.

6. MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 111*)—LIEN OF SUB-CONTRACTOR — EFFECT OF CLAIM AGAINST CONTRACTOR FOR BREACH.

Subcontractors and materialmen who perform work on a building as required by the specifications, and furnish material to the contractor of the quality called for by the contract, are entitled to liens without regard to the character of work done by the contractor himself or other subcontractors or materialmen; the only limitation upon their right being that the total of all the liens shall not exceed the contract price.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. §§ 144-146; Dec. Dig. § 111.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Kenton County, Common Law and Equity Division.

Action by Schulte & Eicher and others against Elizabeth Rieger and others to enforce mechanics' liens. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

F. J. Hanlon, of Covington, for appellants. Frederick W. Schmitz and M. M. Durrett, both of Covington, and Fred B. Bassman and George Veith, both of Newport, for appellees.

LASSING, J. Elizabeth and Amelia Rieger entered into a contract with Adam Lahner by which he undertook to erect a building for them in Latonia, Ky., according to certain plans and specifications, for $4,730. He sublet a large part of the work, and bought the material used in the building from various firms and individuals. Lyman Walker, an architect, prepared the plans and specifications and superintended the building. The owners advanced to the contractor money from time to time, as the work progressed, until the building was completed, at which time they had paid to him $3,031.38. It appears that certain of the subcontractors and materialmen were not paid. They filed mechanics' and materialmen's liens against the property, and later instituted suits in which they sought to have the property sold and the proceeds applied to the discharge of the debts due them. Shortly thereafter, while these suits were pending, the Rieger sisters filed suit against the contractor in which they sought to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by them by reason of his failure to erect the building according to the plans and specifications under which he contracted to do the work. They set up the particulars in which the building failed to conform to the requirements of the plans and specifications, and sought to set off this claim of unliquidated damages for $1,643.50 against the liens which the subcontractors and materialmen were asserting against their property, and asked that the suit filed by them be consolidated with those filed by the subcontractors and materialmen, and the issues of fact be transferred to the common-law docket for trial by a jury. These motions were overruled. The answer of appellants to the claims asserted by the subcontractors and materialmen was, in all material respects, the same as the claim set up in their petition for damages against the contractor. Proof of claims was heard before the master, and in due time he reported his findings. In this report he sustained the claim of each of the subcontractors and materialmen. On exceptions to this report, the Rieger sisters again asked that the question of fact raised in the pleadings be submitted to a jury for its determination. This motion was overruled. Upon consideration of the case, on exceptions to the master's report, the court, with some slight changes, found that the report was correct, and subject to these minor errors, which were eliminated, the report was confirmed, and judgment entered, giving to each of the claimants a lien upon the property for the amounts so adjudged to him, and directed it sold in satisfaction thereof. The owners appeal, and seek a reversal upon two grounds. It is insisted for them, first, that they were entitled to a trial by jury of the issue made between them and the subcontractors and materialmen, and that the failure of the court to grant them a jury trial was a violation of that right guaranteed to them by section 7 of the Constitution, and expressly authorized by section 12 of the Code of Practice; and, second, that the finding of the chancellor on the disputed question of fact is not supported by the evidence, and his judgment should be reversed for this reason.

The record shows that there were nine subcontractors and materialmen who asserted claims for liens, amounting in the aggregate to about $2,070. The owners claim that the contract price of $4,730 should be abated by the sum of $1,643. This amount was based upon the following items: Damage suffered because the foundation was built some 12 to 16 inches higher than it should have been, $1,000; cost of four additional steps necessitated by the higher foundation, $10; two copings or gratings left out, $20; extra dirt left out, $14.70; cementing cellar erroneously left out of contract, $98.30; defective millwork, stair work, flooring, glass, plumbing, roofing, and electric work damaged, $500. It will thus be seen that if appellants' contention be sustained in toto, the contractor, if he had been paid nothing, would be entitled to a lien upon the building for $3,087; this being the contract price, less the amount which appellants claim is due them because of the damage in the construction of the building.

[1] The subcontractors and materialmen have a lien upon the building to the extent of the amount for which the contractor was entitled to a lien. Counsel for appellants seems to recognize this principle as correct, but insists that, inasmuch as the contractor was, during the progress of the work, paid something more than $3,000. his lien or right to a lien has been canceled; and hence the subcontractors and materialmen are not entitled to liens, although they had not been paid. This is not the law.

[2] The subcontractors and materialmen are entitled to a lien for the work done and material furnished in the erection of a building, although the owner thereof has been paid the full contract price. The only limitation upon the right of the subcontractor and materialman is that the sum total of their claims may not exceed the contract price. If the owner settles with the contractor, and leaves the claim of the subcontractor or materialman unsatisfied, under the plain provision of the statute, he is bound to pay them although the effect of this may be to require him to pay twice for the building. It is no defense to the claim of the subcontractor or materialman, who has complied with the requirements of the statutes and whose work and material are of the standard as to quality and kind called for in the contract, that the owner had paid the contractor. Hence there are really but two questions raised by the pleadings in this case. First, were the defects in the building, set up and relied upon by appellants, such as were properly chargeable to any of the subcontractors and materialmen who were asserting these liens; and, second, if so, to what extent should their liens be abated? These are the questions which counsel for appellants insists should have been submitted to the jury. The lien of a subcontractor or a materialman is a creature of the statute. In the absence of a statute, they have no lien unless there existed some contractual relation between them and the owner of the building.

[3, 4] An examination of the statute creating the lien discloses the fact that provision is made, not only for establishing and perfecting the lien, but also for the method to be pursued in enforcing it. It is an equitable proceeding, and it is apparent that the Legislature did not intend that the method of procedure, in cases arising under this act, should be the same as those prevailing in ordinary equitable actions. If so, there was no necessity for providing, in detail in the act, for the preparation of the case for trial; but it would have been sufficient to say, after providing for the creation of the lien, that, in the enforcement thereof, the procedure should be the same as in other equitable actions. The very fact that the Legislature provided for a different course is the best evidence that it was not contemplated that the mode of procedure governing ordinary equitable actions should control. If appellants were entitled to have the questions of fact raised by the pleadings determined by a jury, they were likewise entitled to have the witnesses, by whom the claims were either established or refuted, appear in person before the jury; a course which, it is apparent, the Legislature did not contemplate should be pursued, else the act would not have provided that the proof shall be taken before the commissioner. Section 2471, after providing that the action shall be in equity and conducted as other proceedings in equity in similar cases, has the following proviso: "Except as otherwise provided herein." Now this exception clearly has reference to the mode of procedure, for, further along in the act, we find that it provides: "After the expiration of 10 days from the filing of the petition, the clerk shall draw up an order referring the case to the master commissioner of the court and file the same with the petition, and deliver to the commissioner the pleadings and papers of the suit, and make a memorandum thereof in his minute book." This authority on the part of the clerk to refer the case, after the expiration of 10 days, to the master commissioner is not in accord with the practice in ordinary equitable actions. Section 2472 provides that the commissioner, upon receiving his commission, shall at once ascertain the names of the persons who have filed liens with the clerk of the county court against the property sought to be subjected, and shall fix a time and place for hearing proof, showing claims against the property. All persons holding liens against the property, of whatever kind or character, are thereupon required by the commissioner to present same, with the evidence supporting them. The act provides that the owner of the property, or any other person whose interest may be affected by the suit, may contest any claim presented; that is, the master commissioner is expressly authorized to hear proof in support of or against the validity of any claim presented. Section 2473 clothes the commissioner with ample power to bring before him witnesses whose testimony may be desired. The act further provides that, after having heard proof on all claims, it shall be the duty of the commissioner to audit the accounts and make a report, showing the amount due each claimant, the nature and character of the respective claims, and the evidence upon which each claim was allowed. The evident aim of the Legislature, in the enactment of this statute, was to provide a speedy method of determining the validity of claims asserted as liens against the property; and it is apparent that, in directing the evidence to be taken before the commissioner, the questions of fact arising out of disputes over the claims thus presented were not intended to be tried by a jury.

Appellants' counsel, being of opinion that he was entitled to a jury trial, did not at first appear before the master at his sittings, and introduced no evidence contesting the validity of the claims presented, nor was any exception filed to the report of the commissioner. The chancellor, upon perceiving the error into which counsel for appellants had fallen and with the evident purpose of doing full justice between the parties, set aside the confirmation of the report on claims and again referred the case to the master, giving each side a limited time in which to present their evidence. This order was entered over the objection of the claimants. In obedience to this order, the commissioner heard such evidence as was offered, and again reported his finding. There is no complaint that any evidence which appellant had bearing upon the question was not presented to the commissioner, or that they were not given ample opportunity to present their defense to these claims when the evidence was being taken by the commissioner. Their sole complaint is that they were entitled to have the value of this evidence weighed and determined by a jury, rather than by the chancellor. There is no merit in this contention. The Constitution does not guarantee to a litigant the right to a trial by jury of issues of fact arising in every equity case, but in those cases to which, at common law, he was entitled to a jury trial. This being an equitable action and properly commenced as such, the right of appellants to have the issues of fact raised in the pleadings transferred to the common-law docket for trial is controlled by section 12 of the Code of Practice, which provides: "In an equitable action, properly commenced as such, either party may, by motion, have the case transferred to the ordinary docket for the trial of any issue concerning which he is entitled to a jury trial. * * *" This raises the question, Are the issues which appellants sought to have tried by a jury such as, under the facts of this case, they were entitled to have submitted to a jury?

In Carder v. Weisenburgh, 95 Ky. 135, 23 S. W. 964, 15 Ky. Law Rep. 497, the distinction between that class of cases in which, under the constitutional guaranty, a litigant is entitled to have a jury trial, and that class in which he is not, is clearly drawn. It is there said: "If the equitable right depends upon the decision of legal issues, concerning which the party is entitled to a jury trial, the case, on motion, should be transferred as a matter of right to the common-law docket to be tried by jury. The court has not right to refuse such transfer unless the case be purely equitable, in which case it has discretionary power as to the transfer, and may, at its discretion, obtain the advisory aid of a jury in coming to a correct conclusion upon any question of fact involved in the issues to be tried. The Constitution of this state guarantees the right of jury trial. This means a trial according to the course of the common law, and secures the right only in cases where a jury trial was customarily used at common law; but in cases of purely equitable cognizance a trial by jury is not a matter of right, but it is addressed to the discretion of the chancellor." In the later case of Cominger v. Louisville Trust Co., 128 Ky. 697, 108 S. W. 950, 111 S. W. 681, 33 Ky. Law Rep. 53, 884, 129 Am. St. Rep. 322, this court disposed of a similar question in the following language: "The Constitution secures to a litigant the right of trial by jury only in cases where such right existed at common law." This case being purely equitable and the proceeding being unknown to the common law, the chancellor did not err in declining to entertain the motion to transfer the action to the common-law docket for a trial of the issues of fact by a jury.

[5] But, if we were less certain of our position upon this point, we would not direct a reversal of the case if, upon examination, we find the findings and judgment of the chancellor to be correct; for, under section 756 of the Code of Practice, no judgment should be reversed for error occurring during the progress of the trial that did not affect the substantial rights of the complaining litigant.

[6] This brings us to the second ground relied upon for reversal, to wit, that the judgment of the chancellor is not supported by the evidence. Appellants, in the preparation of the case for trial and in the introduction of evidence, based their defense upon the idea that these claimants were not entitled to recover because the contractor himself could not do so. It was not seriously contended that the particular defects in the building, set up and relied upon as supporting the claim for damages, are properly chargeable to the accounts of these particular claimants, and indeed the evidence shows that they are not. Appellants may have a just ground of complaint as to the contractor and others who furnished material or labor, but with those questions these litigants have no concern. The sole question for determination in this case is, Was the material furnished by these claimants of the quality called for in the contract, and did the work, performed on the buildings by the subcontractors, conform to the requirements of the specifications? If so, they were entitled to a judgment for the respective amounts claimed by them, without regard to the character of work done by the contractor himself or other subcontractors or materialmen. As stated, the only limitation upon their right is that the sum total of all the liens shall not exceed the contract price.

We have examined the record with care and find that, by a decided preponderance, the evidence supports the finding of the chancellor in every particular as to the claim of each of the appellees.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 278*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—SAFE PLACE TO WORK—DANGEROUS APPLIANCE.

In an action for the death of an employé, drowned while rowing a boat across a river, evidence held to show that the employer was not guilty of a breach of duty in failing to warn and instruct the servant, who was a skillful oarsman, of a dangerous appliance.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 279*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—NEGLIGENCE OF FOREMAN—NEEDLESS PLACING OF SERVANT IN PLACE OF DANGER.

In an action for the death by drowning of an employé while rowing a boat across a river, evidence held to show no failure of a foreman seated in the bow of the boat to exercise care to prevent the deceased from needlessly and recklessly placing himself in a place of danger.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Estill County.

Action by Elisha Stewart's administrator against the Ohio River Contract Company and others. From a judgment for defendants on a directed verdict, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. H. Lilly, of Irvine, Grant E. Lilly, of Richmond, and Clarence Miller, of Irvine, for appellant. Jouett & Jouett, of Winchester, and Riddell & Friend, of Irvine, for appellees.

CARROLL, J. [1,2] This action was brought by the administrator of Elisha Stewart against the Ohio River Contract Company, R. J. Armstrong, Robert Vandevender, and George Koehler to recover damages for the death of Stewart, who was drowned while attempting to cross the Kentucky river in a small boat. At the time of his death Stewart was between 15 and 16 years old, and was engaged as a day laborer by the contract company. Vandevender was the foreman of the company in charge of a crew of men, of whom Stewart was one, and Koehler was the owner of a small gasoline boat with which the boat Stewart was rowing at the time of his death came in contact. The petition averred that his death was caused by the joint and several negligence of the defendants. The action was dismissed as to R. J. Armstrong, and the record shows that a general demurrer of George Koehler to the petition was sustained, with leave to amend, and thereupon the plaintiff filed an amended petition against Koehler, in which he averred, in substance, that, when the boat being rowed by Stewart came near the gasoline boat owned and operated by Koehler, the stern wheel of the gasoline boat was in rapid motion, but Koehler did not by himself or employes keep a lookout to avoid injury to other craft using the river, although he knew that Stewart and his companions were in a small rowboat, and that this boat was close to his, and that he negligently and carelessly failed to keep a lookout for the boat rowed by Stewart, and negligently failed to stop the wheel of his boat in time to avert the danger to the small boat, which was struck by the revolving wheel. To this amended petition a demurrer was also sustained, and, declining to plead further, the petition against Koehler as amended was dismissed, to which exception was taken. After this the case went to trial before a jury, and upon conclusion of the evidence for the plaintiff the trial court directed the jury to return a verdict in favor of the defendants, Vandevender and the contract company. The correctness of this ruling is the only question before us on this appeal, as we do not understand counsel to complain of the ruling sustaining the demurrer.

The evidence shows that Stewart at the time of his death was an intelligent and able-bodied boy, between 15 and 16 years old, and that he had been working for the contract company as a laborer, getting a man's wages, for about four months before his death. The contract company was engaged in building a dam for the United States government on the Kentucky river, and on the day of the accident Stewart and other employes of the contract company, under Vandevender as foreman, were working on the south side of the river. At noon on this day several of the laborers, together with Stewart and Vandevender, crossed the river in a "John boat" for the purpose of eating dinner on the north side of the river. While they were engaged in eating dinner a fleet of logs, about 300 feet long and some 40 feet wide, passed through the lock, and was stationed in the river opposite the point where the men were eating their dinner, and between them and the place at which they worked on the south side. After they had finished their dinner, they started back to their work, and to avoid lifting the "John boat," which was attached to the north bank, across the fleet of logs, they concluded to row it down the north bank to the end of the fleet and thence across the river. At this time the fleet was stationary in the river, one end of it being attached by a cable to the lock through which it had just passed, and at the other end of the fleet, around which the laborers had to go in their little boat, there was a stern wheel gasoline boat in charge of Koehler. For the purpose of giving the laborers space in which to row their boat down the north bank to the end of the fleet, Koehler, with his gasoline boat, which was attached to the end of the fleet, pushed it out from the north bank, and Stewart and his companions started in the "John boat" down the river, between the north bank and fleet, for the purpose of crossing the river when they reached the end of the fleet. Stewart was seated near the center of the boat, rowing it, with his back to the prow, and facing Curt Edwards. Jim Stewart was in the prow of the boat, and Robert Vandevender was in the stern.

All of the witnesses testify that Stewart rowed down alongside the fleet, and, when a few feet below the gasoline boat, turned to go across the river. After the turn was made, or when it was being made, the revolving stern wheel of the gasoline boat struck the "John boat," causing it to sink. When this occurred, Stewart and some of the others jumped into the river, and Stewart was drowned. The uncontradicted evidence shows that Stewart was used to the river, in the habit of rowing this boat, and was fully competent to manage it. It is also shown, without contradiction, that when he undertook to row the boat across the river, as he had been accustomed to doing, he did so without instruction or direction from Vandevender or any one else. There is really no conflict in the evidence except on one point; and that is, whether the wheel of the gasoline boat was suddenly started when the "John boat" came close to it on its way across the river, or whether it was revolving from the time the "John boat" started. One witness testified that when the "John boat" made a turn to go across the river the wheel of the gasoline boat, which had been stopped, suddenly commenced revolving, and its revolutions drew the "John boat" under the wheel. Other witnesses say that the wheel of the gasoline boat was revolving before the "John boat" made the turn to go across the river.

There is no evidence whatever tending to show that Koehler was guilty of any negligence, and it is clear that the pleadings did not state any cause of action against him; but counsel contend that the case should be reversed as to the contract company and Vandevender, upon the ground that the contract company, as principal, and Vandevender, der, as its agent and foreman in control of Stewart, were guilty of negligence in permitting Stewart to row the boat, and in failing to warn him of the danger of going too close to the wheel of the gasoline boat, or coming in contact with it.

As before stated, Stewart in rowing the boat had his back to the gasoline boat, while Vandevender, who was seated in the stern of the "John boat," had his face to it, but there is no evidence that Vandevender directed or requested Stewart in any manner or form to row the boat, or gave him any instructions whatever as to the manner in which it should be rowed, although he did tell the men to get ready to go across the river when the dinner hour was over. All the evidence shows that Stewart was an experienced oarsman, accustomed to the river and to the use of this boat, and that he had been in the habit of rowing the men across the river in it, and so the course of the boat and the rowing of it was left entirely to Stewart. Nor is there any evidence that Vandevender knew anything about rowing a boat or had any experience with oars. If, as some of the witnesses say, the wheel of the gasoline boat was stopped when Stewart made the turn to go across the river, and it was suddenly started just as the "John boat" went by it, it can easily be understood how the accident happened, as Stewart, although he may have known he was going too close to the wheel if the wheel had been revolving, did not anticipate any danger from it when it was stopped. On the other hand, if, as some of the witnesses say, the wheel of the gasoline boat was revolving all the time, the accident can only be accounted for upon the theory that Stewart carelessly pulled the "John boat" too close to the revolving wheel. But, whichever one of these theories is correct, no blame can be attached to Vandevender or the contract company. Stewart was the sole responsible agent for the accident, which was due to the fact that Stewart let the boat get too close to the wheel of the gasoline boat.

Nor can it be said that Vandevender, who had no experience in rowing boats, was negligent in failing to instruct or warn Stewart, who was a skillful oarsman. Stewart must have known the exact location of the gasoline boat and the danger that would follow if he rowed too close to it, so that there was no occasion why Vandevender should have given Stewart any instruction or warning.

It is said, however, that the position of Vandevender in the boat gave him a clear and full view of the situation, and that it was his duty, if he saw, or by the exercise of ordinary care could have seen, Stewart about to go into a place of danger, to give him warning. The trouble with this theory is that there is no evidence that Vandevender or any one else knew, or could have known by the exercise of ordinary care, that Stewart was going to put himself in danger until it was too late to avert it by warning. The whole thing happened in a moment, and from a careful reading of the record we cannot escape the conclusion that the accident was due entirely to Stewart's thoughtless or careless act in rowing too close to the wheel of the gasoline boat, unless it be, as suggested, that the wheel was suddenly started.

We find no evidence in the record that would justify us in applying the well-established rule governing the duty of a master to warn and instruct the servant, or to exercise care to prevent him from needlessly or recklessly placing himself in a place of danger.

The judgment is affirmed.

CITY OF LATONIA v. CARROLL SAME v. HANNIGAN.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 513*)—SPECIAL ASSESSMENTS—INJUNCTION—DECREE.

Though defendant, in an action to enjoin collection of street improvement assessments of plaintiffs' lots, to the extent that they exceeded half the value of the lots, made no defense, except as to the value of the lots, after its demurrer to the petition was overruled, yet it being necessary for plaintiffs to plead and prove facts entitling them to the injunction, and their petition and the proof showing the lots to be corner lots, and that they were assessed for improvements on each street, the decree, disregarding the rule that such a lot may be assessed for half its value for the improvement of each street, and that, too, independent of the charge for sewer, and adjudging invalid the total of the assessments in excess of half the value of the lots, was necessarily erroneous, entitling defendant to a reversal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1188-1206; Dec. Dig. § 513.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Kenton County, Criminal, Common Law, and Equity Division.

Actions for injunction, one by Levina Carroll, the other by O. Hannigan, against the City of Latonia. Judgment for plaintiffs; defendant appeals. Reversed, with directions.

John E. Shepard and Stephens L. Blakely, both of Covington, for appellant. Leslie T. Applegate, Lewis L. Manson, and Walker C. Hall, all of Covington, for appellees.

CLAY, C. The questions involved in these two cases are the same, and will be considered in one opinion. During the time that the city of Latonia was a fourth-class city, appellees were the owners of corner lots located in that city. The city of Latonia made certain street, sidewalk, and sewer improvements abutting on and lying along the lots in question, and assessed and levied the cost thereof against the lots, as provided by the charter of cities of the fourth class. Appellees brought these actions against the city of Latonia to restrain it from collecting the assessments in excess of one-half the value of the lots. It was charged in the petition that the charter of the city of Latonia limited the amount that might be assessed against each lot to one-half the value thereof, and that it had unlawfully assessed their respective lots in an amount in excess of the sum allowed to be assessed by the statute. A demurrer to each of the petitions was overruled. The city of Latonia then filed an answer in each case, denying the value of the lots as set forth in the petition, and denying that it could assess against said lots only the amounts which the respective petitions alleged could be assessed. Proof was heard as to the value of the lots. On final hearing the chancellor adjudged all the improvement taxes in excess of one-half the value of the lots as fixed by him to be void. Since the filing of these actions, the city of Latonia has been annexed to and become a part of the city of Covington. To reverse the judgments entered by the chancellor, the city of Covington has prosecuted these appeals in the name of the city of Latonia.

The precise questions herein involved were before this court in the cases of City of Covington v. Schlosser, 141 Ky. 838, 133 S. W. 987, City of Covington v. Mason, and City of Covington v. Conners, 141 Ky. 838, 133 S. W. 987, where it was held that under a statute providing that the city had the right "to improve the streets or other public ways at the cost of the owners of ground fronting or abutting thereon," and that the cost of such improvements should not exceed one-half the value of the ground after the improvements were made, excluding the value of buildings thereon, the city had authority to assess against the owner of a corner lot an amount not exceeding one-half of the value for the improvement of each street, independently of the charge against the other street. It was also held that sewers are not included in the words "streets or public ways," and that the limitation upon the cost of improving streets or public ways, contained in the charter of cities of the fourth class, did not include sewer construction, and that for this an additional charge could be made under the statute, authorizing an assessment not exceeding one dollar per front foot of the abutting property for the construction of sewers. The only difference between the above cases and the cases under consideration is that in the former the attorney for the city made the affirmative defense that the lots were corner lots, and that the city had authority to assess said lots in an amount not exceeding one-half of its value for the improvement of each street, independently of the charge against the other street, and independently of the charge for sewers; whereas, in the cases at bar, the only defense made by the city, after its demurrers were overruled, was as to the value of the lots owned by appellees.

It is insisted by counsel for appellees that as no affirmative defense was made by the city, based on the fact that the lots were corner lots, and that as the petitions were good in part, and therefore not demurrable, there should be no reversal of these cases. As appellees, however, are seeking to enjoin the collection of improvement taxes on the ground that they were void, it was necessary for them to plead and prove facts showing that they were entitled to the relief asked. Their petitions show that the lots in question are corner lots, and that these lots were assessed for street and sewer improvements on each street. The same facts are shown by the proof. The chancellor, disregarding the rule that the city had the right to assess against the owner of a corner lot an amount not exceeding one-half of its value for the improvement of each street, independently of the charge against the other street, and independently of the charge for sewer construction, adjudged that all the improvement and sewer construction assessments in excess of one-half the value of each of the lots was void. That being true, it follows that the judgments are necessarily erroneous, and, being erroneous, they should be reversed at the cost of appellees.

Wherefore the judgment in each case is reversed with directions to proceed in conformity with this opinion.

GRANT v. SEELYE.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Dec. 12, 1912.)

LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 164*)—DANGEROUS OR DEFECTIVE CONDITION OF PREMISES—INJURY TO TENANT.

On leased premises there was a privy consisting of an excavation in the ground, and a frame structure above, resting at each of the four corners on a foundation, with a space of from four to five inches in front between the floor of the structure and the ground, showing only when the door was open; the excavation being about twelve inches from the front. While plaintiff, a child of nine, was running or walking toward it, her foot slipped and went into the opening between the floor and the ground, and she was thereby injured. Held that, as the condition of the building was not dangerous or defective, it imposed no liability on the landlord.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. §§ 630-641; Dec. Dig. § 164.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jefferson County, Common Pleas Branch, Second Division. Action by Hazel Seelye, by her next friend, W. S. Seelye, against Robert Grant. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

O'Neal & O'Neal, of Louisville, for appellant. Lee Hamilton, W. A. Heck, and Strother & Hamilton, all of Louisville, for appellee.

CLAY, C. The plaintiff, Hazel Seelye, an infant nine years of age, suing by her father and next friend, W. S. Seelye, brought this action against the defendant, Robert W. Grant, to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from an accident occasioned by the dangerous and defective condition of the premises which the defendant had leased to W. S. Seelye. It was charged in the petition that W. S. Seelye had rented the premises in question under a contract and agreement on the part of defendant to maintain the house and premises in good and proper repair; that he permitted the privy or vault in the back yard of said premises to be and remain in a dangerous and defective condition, and failed to repair same according to the contract of rent; that this condition was unknown to plaintiff, but known to the defendant, or could have been known to him by the exercise of ordinary care; that while going to the privy or vault plaintiff's left foot went into the unguarded and defective vault, thereby causing her to fall and sustain permanent injuries to her leg. By amended petition plaintiff set up the dangerous, defective, and unsafe condition of the vault, and pleaded that at the time of the rental of the premises the defendant concealed the dangerous and defective condition thereof from the lessee, W. S. Seelye, and the plaintiff, Hazel Seelye. Defendant's demurrer to both the original and the amended petitions being overruled, he filed an answer in four paragraphs. The first paragraph denied the allegations of the petition. In the second and third paragraphs he set up the original lease between him and W. S. Seelye, and pleaded that, under the lease, the lessee himself agreed to keep and return the premises in good order and repair, and that the lessor was not to be liable for any damage done, or injury resulting from any failure on his part to keep the premises in repair. In the fourth paragraph he pleaded contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff. Trial was had, and the jury returned a verdict in favor of plaintiff for $300. Judgment was entered accordingly, and the defendant appeals.

The evidence shows that plaintiff's parents were tenants in a small piece of property owned by defendant, located on Almstead avenue, Louisville, Ky. They held said premises under a lease dated July 2, 1910. In the rear of the premises is a privy or vault. The privy consists of a vault built in the ground, and a frame structure above. The frame structure rests at each of the four corners on a foundation. It was built this way to prevent the floor from rotting, and for purposes of ventilation. In front there is a space of from four to five inches between the floor of the frame structure and the ground. The vault itself is set back about twelve inches from the front. When the door is closed, there is no opening between the floor and the ground, and, when it is opened, there is an opening of four or five inches beneath the floor, and within the space covered by the door. The evidence for the plaintiff is to the effect that on September 10, 1910, she started to the privy. She was either running or walking at the time, and, when she reached the privy, her foot slipped and went into the opening between the floor of the privy and the ground. Her leg was badly injured, and she was compelled to remain in the house for eight months on account of the injury. While plaintiff's father and mother both testify that plaintiff's leg had never been injured before, the affidavits filed on motion for new trial, based on the ground of newly discovered evidence, show that she was paralyzed to a certain extent in the limb which it is claimed was injured. Plaintiff's father says that they moved into the premises on Saturday afternoon. On Sunday the defendant came around to collect his rent. He then called defendant's attention to the opening between the floor of the privy and the ground, stating at the time that he had small children, and he was afraid they would be injured unless the opening was closed. Defendant agreed that, if plaintiff's father and mother would remain on the premises, he would remedy the defect.

Counsel for defendant earnestly insist that the trial court erred in refusing to give a peremptory in defendant's favor. Passing the question of defendant's liability, even if a dangerous condition of the premises had been shown, we conclude that the condition of the privy was not such as to impose any liability on the defendant for the injuries which plaintiff received. The opening complained of was only four or five inches high. The opening was entirely lateral. The only way that one could get his foot or leg into the opening was to slip, as plaintiff did, or get into a reclining position and place his foot into the opening. Manifestly, if there had been a lattice in front of the privy, such as may be frequently found on premises like those in question, and there had been a gate, the bottom of which was four or five inches from the ground, and plaintiff had slipped and fallen under this gate, it could not be pretended that the condition of the gate was dangerous, and that the landlord should respond in damages. Indeed, such openings may be frequently found under steps, chicken coops, fences, porches, benches, and the like. They are not dangerous in the sense that injury to persons using the premises may be reasonably anticipated to result from their presence. The only danger is when one falls, as did the plaintiff. In this sense nearly every structure is dangerous. If the sill of the privy in question had extended to the ground, it would have been equally dangerous under the same circumstances, for, having slipped and fallen, the plaintiff's leg would have struck solid material instead of the opening, and might have been broken instead of bruised. Being of the opinion that the condition of the privy was not dangerous or defective, and the defendant is not liable in any event for the injuries which plaintiff received, we conclude that the court erred in failing to direct a verdict in favor of the defendant.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

CAMPBELL et al. v. OFFUTT.

1. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 106*)—CONSIDERATION—LEGALITY.

Defendant agreed to pay a share of the expenses of a candidate for an office in consideration of his appointment by such candidate, if elected, to the position of revenue agent. He then agreed with an attorney to employ him as attorney, if appointed, and pay him a percentage of the fees of his office, in consideration of his payment of one-half of such election expenses. The attorney procured the money to carry out the agreement by executing a note. Such attorney having died, plaintiffs paid the note, and received a note from defendant for the amount accompanied by an agreement that, if appointed, he would employ them as his attorneys, in which case the note would be void. The candidate was not elected, and plaintiff was not appointed. Held that, the consideration for the note being an illegal agreement, the note was unenforceable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bills and Notes, Cent. Dig. §§ 219, 225-232; Dec. Dig. § 106.*]

2. CONTRACTS (§ 124*)—ILLEGALITY OF OBJECT—PUBLIC POLICY.

An agreement by a person seeking appointment to a public office to employ certain persons as his attorneys, if appointed, and pay them a part of the income of the office, is contrary to public policy, and void.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. §§ 576-585; Dec. Dig. § 124.*]

3. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 106*)—CONSIDERATION—LEGALITY.

Where attorneys advanced money to a candidate for office, and received his note accompanied by an agreement that the note would be void if, upon his appointment, he employed such attorneys, and they subsequently advanced another amount upon the same consideration and for the same purpose, the note given for this second amount was void, although not mentioned in the collateral agreement.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bills and Notes, Cent. Dig. §§ 219, 225-232; Dec. Dig. § 106.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jefferson County, Common Pleas Branch, Third Division.

Action by W. G. Campbell and another against R. L. Offutt. Judgment for defendant and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Hardin H. Herr, of Louisville, for appellants. Edwards, Ogden & Peak, of Louisville, for appellees.

HOBSON, C. J. [1] Appellants W. G. Campbell and A. B. Young, who are attorneys practicing law as partners, brought this suit against R. L. Offutt to recover on two notes executed by him to them, one dated January 30, 1907, and due one year after date, the other for $66.66, dated May 27, 1907, and due eight months after date. Offutt pleaded and showed in substance that the notes originated in this way: In 1906 Henry Bosworth was a candidate for the Democratic nomination for Auditor of the state of Kentucky at a primary election held on November 3d of that year. Offutt entered into an agreement with Bosworth, through H. B. Hines, by which he was to pay a certain portion of Bosworth's expenses in the primary election, in consideration of which Bosworth was to appoint him as revenue agent of the state of Kentucky for the state at large. After this agreement was made with Bosworth, Offutt made an agreement with Dan P. Young, an attorney living in Louisville, by which Young was to pay one-half of the amount he was required to pay Bosworth, and Young was to be employed by him as his attorney and receive a certain per cent. of the fees of the office for his services. The amount which he was called on to pay Bosworth was fixed at $400, and Young, with another person, executed his note to the Western National Bank of Louisville for $200, and paid the money to Offutt, and he paid it with $200 of his own money to Bosworth's agent. After this had been done, and while the note for $200 was still in the bank, Young died. After his death, R. L. Offutt made an arrangement by which in consideration of their paying the note in bank he agreed to employ appellants as his attorneys as revenue agent just as he agreed to employ Dan P. Young. They paid the $200, and he executed the note for $200 to them. Subsequently it was learned that his share of the campaign expenses was $133.33 more than he had paid, and he thereupon paid one half of this, appellants paying the other half and he executing to them a second note for $66.66 on May 27, 1907. On the same day the note for $200 was executed a written contract was made between the parties setting out their agreement.

The note and the contract are as follows:

"Jan. 30, 1907. One year after date I promise to pay to the order of Campbell and Young, attys, two hundred and no/100 dollars for value. R. L. Offutt."

"Louisville, Ky., Jan. 30, 1907. This agreement made and entered into this day and date above written witnesseth for and in consideration of a note made on the above date, signed, executed and delivered by R. L. Offutt to Campbell and Young, attorneys, the said firm of Campbell and Young bind themselves to pay the amount of $200.00 to the Western National Bank in satisfaction of a note held by said bank against Daniel P. Young and R. L. Offutt. It is admitted by the parties to this agreement that the execution of said note was to meet the assessment against said R. L. Offutt in the Democratic primary held Nov. 3, 1906, whereby the said R. L. Offutt is to receive on Jan. 1, 1908, the appointment of revenue agent for the state at large, and contingent upon said appointment agrees and binds himself to employ as his attorney the said firm of Campbell and Young; the said attorneys agree to do the legal work connected with said office and to accept as payment in full for their services an amount equal to one half of the income of said office. In the event this said appointment with the subsequent employment of Campbell and Young is made, the note held by Campbell and Young against R. L. Offutt and of the above written date shall be null and void. Campbell & Young, per Campbell. R. L. Offutt."

On these facts the case was submitted to a jury who found for the defendant, and the plaintiffs appeal.

We deem it necessary to consider only one question in the case, and that is whether the contract is one which the law will enforce. It is insisted for appellant that he makes out a prima facie case when he produces his notes, and shows that they were given for money paid, and that he is not affected by the illegal contract between R. L. Offutt and Daniel Young if the contract was illegal. But this case does not come within the principle relied on. The note of January 30th and the written contract of the same date must be treated as one transaction, and the two papers must be read together.

[2] The written contract discloses the fact that Offutt, in consideration of the payment of certain money by Campbell and Young, agreed to employ them as his attorneys when appointed state revenue agent, they to do the legal work connected with the office, and to accept as payment in full for their services an amount equal to one-half of the income of the office. Such an agreement is contrary to public policy, and is void. If Offutt had secured the office and had refused to employ Campbell and Young as his attorneys to attend to the business of the office and they had sued him upon this contract, no court would have enforced it, or given damages for its breach. The law requires of a public officer that he shall use his best skill and judgment for the protection of the public interest, and an agreement before his appointment to divide the fees of the office with an attorney, if sustained might seriously cripple the public service; for in this event the public would secure the services of an attorney in some instances who would offer the best terms to the official to secure the employment. It is not material here that Offutt failed to get the office by reason of the fact that Bosworth was not elected Auditor, and it is not material that the attorneys would in fact have discharged their duties faithfully and well. The agreement, being one which the law will not tolerate, cannot be enforced. The consideration of the transaction is the illegal agreement, and, as the notes rest upon an illegal transaction, they cannot be enforced.

[3] No sound distinction can be drawn between the $200 note and the smaller note for $66.66; for, although the written contract is silent as to that note, it is manifest from all the facts that it was executed upon the same consideration as the larger note and for the same purpose; the deficiency in the amounts paid to cover the expenses having been discovered after the contract of January 30th was drawn up. If appellants had simply paid the money without taking the notes of Offutt for it, they could not recover it. The fact that they took his notes for it adds nothing to their rights; for the notes are without consideration. Love v. Buckner, 4 Bibb, 506; Davis v. Hull, 1 Litt. 9; Price v. Caperton, 1 Duv. 208; Field v. Chipley, 79 Ky. 260, 42 Am. Rep. 215; Lucas v. Allen, 80 Ky. 681; Schneider v. Local Union, 116 La. 270, 40 South. 700, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 891 and note, 114 Am. St. Rep. 549, 7 Ann. Cas. 868; Livingston v. Page, 74 Vt. 356, 52 Atl. 965, 59 L. R. A. 336, 93 Am. St. Rep. 901, and cases cited.

Appellants rely on Commonwealth v. Sheeran, 145 Ky. 361, 140 S. W. 568, 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 289; but that case involved only the question whether such a contract was a sale of the office or a deputation thereof within the purview of section 8740, Ky. St., and in that case we said that the question of the validity of the contract was not before us.

We therefore conclude that the circuit court should have instructed the jury peremptorily to find for the defendant. This conclusion makes it unnecessary for us to consider other questions made in the case.

Judgment affirmed.

TYSON'S ADM'X v. ILLINOIS CENT. R. CO. et al.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Dec. 12, 1912.)

JUDGMENT (§ 829*)—FEDERAL COURT—CONCLUSIVENESS IN STATE COURT—ERRONEOUS JUDGMENT.

A judgment by the United States Circuit Court, from which no writ of error has been taken, rendered in that court after it has sustained its own jurisdiction and refused to remand the action, cannot be collaterally attacked in a state court as one absolutely void for want of jurisdiction, and, until reversed by a proper proceeding in the United States Supreme Court, is binding upon the parties, and must be given force when set up in an action in the state court.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Muhlenberg County.

Action by Joseph Tyson's administratrix against the Illinois Central Railroad Company and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Index

B. F. Procter, of Bowling Green, Belcher & Sparks, and T. O. Jones, all of Greenville, and Paul C. Gaines, of Frankfort, for appellant. Trabue, Doolan & Cox, of Louisville, C. L. Sivley, of Chicago, Ill., and Taylor & Eaves, of Greenville, for appellees.

NUNN, J. In February, 1906, appellant filed her petition in the Muhlenberg circuit court against the Illinois Central Railroad Company and one or two individuals who were residents of that county asking damages for the negligent killing of her husband. She alleged, in substance, that her husband's death was caused by the joint and concurrent negligence of all the defendants. At the March, 1906, appearance term of the court, the railroad company filed its petition for a removal of the case to the United States Circuit Court for the Western District of Kentucky. The petition charged, in effect, that the joinder of the resident defendants with the railroad company was for the purpose only of depriving the railroad of its right to remove the case from the state circuit court to the United States Circuit Court, and was therefore fraudulent. The state court overruled the motion to remove, proceeded to try the case, and in September, 1906, rendered a judgment in favor of the plaintiff therein for $5,000. An appeal was prosecuted from that judgment to this court which in March, 1908, reversed the lower court, and remanded the case for another trial. During the prosecution of the case in the state circuit court and the Court of Appeals, the railroad company had a transcript of the record in the Muhlenberg circuit court, as it existed at the time its motion to remove was overruled, made and filed in the United States Circuit Court on November 27, 1905, and had the case docketed in that court. It appears that the case was continued from term to term in the United States Circuit Court by consent, but without consent as to jurisdiction, as appears of record, until November 28, 1908, at which time it appears that the case was tried before a jury which rendered a verdict against the plaintiff, appellant herein, and her action was dismissed. On a return of the case by this court to the state circuit court, the railroad company filed an amended answer in which it pleaded the proceedings and orders made in the case in the United States Circuit Court, and that judgment was rendered in its favor in that court, and had made and filed with its amended answer a copy of the judgment and all the proceedings in that court. Appellant filed a demurrer to this amended answer, which the court overruled, and, as she failed to plead further, dismissed her action.

Appellant admits that the judgment rendered by the United States Circuit Court, it being pleaded in the amended answer, defeats her right of recovery in this action, provided the case of C. & O. Ry. Co. v. McCabe, Administratrix, 213 U. S. 207, 29 Sup. Ct. 430, 53 L. Ed. 765, is followed. She contends, however, that it has been modified by the following cases: Enos v. Kentucky Distilleries & Warehouse Co., 189 Fed. 342, 111 C. C. A. 74; Stevenson v. Illinois Central R. R. Co. (C. C.) 192 Fed. 956; Illinois Central R. R. Co. v. Sheegog, 215 U. S. 308, 30 Sup. Ct. 101, 54 L. Ed. 208; Chicago, B. & Q. Ry. Co. v. Willard, 220 U. S. 419, 31 Sup. Ct. 460, 55 L. Ed. 521. She contends that these cases modified the McCabe Case, supra, with respect to the force and validity of the orders of a United States Circuit Court made in a case of which it has no jurisdiction. This is apparently true to some extent, but the following part of the opinion in the case of C. & O. Ry. Co. v. McCabe, etc., supra, has not been overruled nor modified by any of the opinions referred to, to wit: "Conceding that, except for the principle of comity, the state court may decide the question of jurisdiction for itself, in the absence of an injunction from the federal court in aid of its own jurisdiction, or a writ of certiorari requiring the state court to surrender the record under the act of 1875 [Act March 3, 1875, c. 137, § 7, 18 Stat. 472 (U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 512)], is the state court obliged to give effect to the judgment of the United States Circuit Court, from which no writ of error is taken, and rendered in the federal court after it has sustained its own jurisdiction and refuse to remand the action? In view of the fact that the question is a federal one, and that the state court is given no right to review or control the exercise of the jurisdiction of the federal court, we think that such federal judgment cannot be ignored in the state court as one absolutely void for want of jurisdiction, and that such judgment, until reversed by a proper proceeding in this court, is binding upon the parties, and must be given force when set up in an action." According to the authorities cited by appellant, if a writ of error had been prosecuted from the judgment of the United States Circuit Court to the Supreme Court of the United States, the judgment by that court would certainly have been reversed, but none was taken. Conceding that the United States Circuit Court acted erroneously, that it had no jurisdiction, it was within its province to consider whether or not it had jurisdiction, and it assumed it and rendered the judgment referred to. The only question is: Can this court ignore that judgment? The opinion in the case of C. & O. Ry. Co. v. McCabe, etc., supra, expressly says we cannot.

For these reasons, the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

BARGER v. BARGER (two cases).

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Dec. 13, 1912.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1109*)—DEATH OF PARTY—OPERATION—TIME OF TAKING EFFECT.

A judgment relates to the date of submission, so that the death of either party after submission is not material.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 781*)—DISMISSAL—WANT OF ACTUAL CONTROVERSY.

Where a wife appealed from the judgment in her action for divorce and alimony, and pending her appeal the defendant died, leaving the widow entitled to rights in his estate on renouncing the provisions of the will, so that only a moot question is presented, the appeal would be dismissed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3122; Dec. Dig. § 781.*]

3. DIVORCE (§ 194*)—APPEAL—COSTS.

Where a wife, appealing from the judgment in her action for divorce, has no means of her own, the costs of the appeal, upon dismissal after the husband's death, must be paid out of his estate.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Cent. Dig. § 580; Dec. Dig. § 194.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Clay County.

Action for divorce and alimony by Elizabeth Barger against A. J. Barger. From the judgment, plaintiff appeals. Dismissed.

A. D. Hall, of Manchester, for appellant. O'Rear & Williams, of Frankfort, for appellee.

HOBSON, C. J. These appeals were submitted September 27th. Since then appellee, A. J. Barger, has died. A motion is now entered to dismiss the appeals to which appellant, Elizabeth Barger, objects.

[1] The rule is that the judgment relates to the date of submission, and that the death of either party after submission is not material.

[2] But this is an action by the wife for divorce and alimony. The defendant having died, only a moot question is now presented. The widow is entitled to the rights in the estate of her deceased husband which the statute confers on her if she renounces his will which she may do as provided by law.

[3] The cost of the appeals must be paid out of the husband's estate, as she has no means of her own.

Appeal dismissed, at the cost of appellee.

McCAIN v. JOINER.

1. QUIETING TITLE (§ 44*)—ACTIONS—EVIDENCE.

In a suit to quiet title, evidence held insufficient to warrant a finding that the land which plaintiff claimed was included in a 99-year lease.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1009*)—REVIEW—FINDINGS OF FACT—EQUITY CASES.

In a suit to quiet title, findings of fact by the chancellor on conflicting evidence will be deferred to upon appeal.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Trigg County.

Action by J. W. B. Joiner against John H. McCain. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. H. Hooks and Kelly & King, all of Cadiz, for appellant. Max Hanberry, of Cadiz, for appellee.

CLAY, C. Plaintiff, J. W. B. Joiner, brought this action against defendant, John H. McCain, to quiet title to an acre and a half of land lying in the southeastern part of Trigg county. The defendant denied plaintiff's title, and pleaded title in himself. He also asked damages for the cutting of certain timber by plaintiff, and on final hearing the chancellor gave judgment in favor of plaintiff. Defendant appeals.

It appears that plaintiff and defendant own adjoining tracts of land. Between the two tracts is a lane which has been used by plaintiff and defendant and their grantors and the traveling public generally for 35 or 40 years. At one point the lane makes an oblique turn, and the tract of land in controversy lies in the angle thus made. Plaintiff owns several tracts of land which were conveyed to him by his father in 1888. Plaintiff claims title to the tract in controversy both by record and by adverse possession. The deed to him from his father conveys "tract No. 4, containing one acre and a half, more or less, in the southwest corner of tract No. 1." Tract No. 1 adjoins the tract in controversy, which lies on the southwest and between it and the lane. The proof shows that the tract in controversy has been in cultivation and under fence ever since plaintiff acquired title. Prior to that time it was under fence and in cultivation by his father for 25 or 30 years. Defendant claims that the description in the deed to plaintiff from his father is too vague and indefinite to be valid. Whether or not this be true, we deem it unnecessary to decide, for plaintiff himself has had adverse possession of the tract in controversy for more than the statutory period.

[1] Defendant, however, insists that the evidence shows that plaintiff held under a 99-year lease, and that his holding was not, therefore, adverse. Defendant and one other witness say that plaintiff admitted that he held under a lease, while another witness claims to have seen a 99-year lease, but was unable to say that it covered the land in controversy. This lease, it is claimed, was in possession of plaintiff's brother. A subpoena duces tecum was issued for the latter directing him to produce the lease in question. The record is silent as to the result of this investigation. Certain it is that the lease was not produced, and we are not inclined to hold that the existence of the lease was proved, in view of the vague and unsatisfactory evidence on the question, and of the improbability that all the other tracts of land were conveyed by deed, while the tract in controversy, consisting of only an acre and a half, and that of very little value, was leased for a period of 99 years.

[2] It is by no means clear that defendant's deeds cover the land from which it is claimed plaintiff cut certain timber, and there is no evidence that defendant held that portion of the land by adverse possession. The evidence upon this and other questions being conflicting, and such as to leave the mind in doubt, the case is one which makes it peculiarly appropriate that we should follow the conclusion reached by the chancellor. Byassee v. Evans, 143 Ky. 415, 186 S. W. 857; Wathen et al. v. Wathen, 149 Ky. 504, 149 S. W. 902; Austin et al. v. National Bank of Scottsville, 150 Ky. 113, 150 S. W. 8. Judgment affirmed.

BREEDEN v. COMMONWEALTH

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Dec. 13, 1912.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 595*)—CONTINUANCE—MATERIALITY OF EXPECTED EVIDENCE.

In a prosecution for shooting and wounding with intent to kill, evidence expected to be shown by defendant's absent witnesses, to the effect that they saw the person shot at the time of the shooting, and that he either had his hand in his pocket, or was attempting to take it out, when defendant fired, that a few days before the shooting he told them that he was going to kill the defendant on sight, which threat was communicated to defendant, was material.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1323-1327; Dec. Dig. § 595.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 600*)—CONTINUANCE—ADMISSIONS TO PREVENT CONTINUANCE.

Cr. Code Prac. § 189, provides that on application for a continuance at the same term at which the indictment is found, for the absence of a material witness, where defendant makes affidavit as to the facts which such witness will prove, the continuance shall be granted, unless the attorney for the commonwealth admits that the facts are true. Defendant, put on trial at the same term at which he was indicted, filed affidavits in proper form for a continuance for absent witnesses, who would testify to material facts, and the commonwealth's attorney refused to admit the truth of the facts offered to be proved. Held, that the refusal of a continuance was reversible error.

3. HOMICIDE (§ 310*)—ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO KILL—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS ON SHOOTING IN AFFRAY.

In a prosecution under Ky. St. § 1166, for shooting with intent to kill, an instruction on the offense of shooting in sudden affray, defined by Ky. St. § 1242, and which is a degree of the offense of shooting with intent to kill, was proper.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 657-661; Dec. Dig. § 310.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1173*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—DEGREE OF OFFENSE.

Under Cr. Code Prac. § 239, which provides that if there be a reasonable doubt of the degree of the offense which defendant has committed he shall only be convicted of the lower degree, the failure to so instruct, when the evidence is calculated to raise such a reasonable doubt, is reversible error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3164-3168; Dec. Dig. § 1173.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Whitley County.

John Breeden was convicted of malicious shooting and wounding with intent to kill, and he appeals. Reversed.

Tye & Siler, of Williamsburg, for appellant. James Garnett, Atty. Gen., and O. S. Hogan, Asst. Atty. Gen., for appellee.

CLAY, C. Defendant, John Breeden, shot and wounded Alvis Sharp. He was indicted by the grand jury of Whitley county for the offense of malicious shooting and wounding with intent to kill. He was tried and convicted and given an indeterminate sentence in the penitentiary of from one to five years. From the judgment of conviction, he appeals.

According to the evidence for the commonwealth, Alvis Sharp was going down the street with his hands by his side, when the defendant, Breeden, stepped out from behind a post and fired at him four times. Two of the shots took effect. According to the evidence for defendant, Sharp had threatened to kill the defendant on sight, and these threats had been communicated to the defendant. The defendant did not know Sharp was in Kentucky, and at the time of the shooting was on his way home. While walking down the street, he saw Sharp a few feet away. Sharp had his hand in his pocket and was trying to get it out, and, believing that Sharp intended to kill him, defendant fired at him.

[1, 2] The indictment was returned at the September term, 1911, of the Whitley circuit court. The trial took place at the same term. The defendant filed an affidavit for continuance on account of the absence of several witnesses. The affidavit is in proper form, and shows due diligence. It shows that two or three witnesses, if present, would testify to the fact that they saw Sharp at the time of the shooting, and that he either had his hand in his pocket, or was attempting to get it out, when the defendant fired. It shows that three or four other witnesses would testify to the fact that a few days before the shooting Sharp told them he was going to kill the defendant on sight, and that they communicated this fact to defendant. Of the materiality of this evidence, there can be no doubt. The court forced the defendant into trial without requiring the commonwealth to admit as true the facts which the affidavit stated the absent witnesses would testify to.

By section 189 of the Criminal Code, it is provided that "when the ground of application for a continuance is the absence of a material witness, and the defendant makes affidavit as to the facts which such witness would prove, the continuance shall be granted, unless the attorney for the commonwealth admit upon the trial that the facts are true." By an amendment to section 189, adopted May 15, 1886 (Acts 1885-86, c. 1145), it was provided that upon such application "the attorney for the commonwealth shall not be compelled, in order to prevent the continuance, to admit the truth of the matter which it is alleged in the affidavit such absent witness or witnesses would prove, but only that such witness or witnesses would, if present, testify as alleged in the affidavit," with a further provision that the commonwealth is permitted to controvert the statements of such affidavits by other evidence, etc. It is further provided that the provisions of the amendment section shall not apply to a motion for continuance, made at the same term at which the indictment in the action is found.

In interpreting the foregoing provisions of the Code, we have frequently held that the commonwealth's attorney will not be entitled to force the defendant into trial at the indictment term without admitting the facts which the defendant's affidavit for continuance shows could be proved by the absent witnesses to be true. Wiggins v. Commonwealth, 104 Ky. 765, 47 S. W. 1073, 20 Ky. Law Rep. 908; Hardesty v. Commonwealth, 88 Ky. 537, 11 S. W. 589, 11 Ky. Law Rep. 43; Pace v. Commonwealth, 89 Ky. 204, 12 S. W. 271, 11 Ky. Law Rep. 407. In this case the commonwealth's attorney refused to do this. The court therefore erred in refusing the defendant a continuance.

[3] The defendant was indicted under section 1166, Kentucky Statutes, for the offense of shooting and wounding another with intent to kill. The court gave an instruction on this offense, and also on the offense of shooting in sudden affray, defined by section 1242, Kentucky Statutes, which is a degree of the offense defined by section 1166. This was proper. Williams v. Commonwealth, 102 Ky. 381, 43 S. W. 455, 19 Ky. Law Rep. 1427.

[4] While the court gave a general instruction on reasonable doubt, as required by section 238, Criminal Code, he failed to give the instruction required by section 239, Criminal Code, which is as follows: "If there be a reasonable doubt of the degree of the offense which the defendant has committed, he shall only be convicted of the lower degree."

We have frequently held that, where there is evidence introduced which might be calculated to raise a reasonable doubt of the degree of the guilt of the accused, the jury should be instructed in the language of this section, and the failure to do so is reversible error. Williams v. Commonwealth, 80 Ky. 313; Demaree v. Commonwealth, 82 S. W. 231, 26 Ky. Law Rep. 507.

In several instances the court erred in rejecting testimony of certain witnesses to the effect that Sharp, a few days before the shooting, stated to them that he would kill the defendant on sight, and that these threats were communicated to the defendant.

For the reasons indicated, the judgment is reversed, and cause remanded for new trial consistent with this opinion.

SHIELDS' ADM'RS v. ROWLAND.

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1060*)—PREJUDICIAL ERROR—MISCONDUCT OF COUNSEL.

In an action for assault and battery, where the plaintiff's attorney, over an adverse ruling, persisted in asking questions of several witnesses as to sickness caused plaintiff's wife and baby upon seeing him, the judgment for an amount of damages which may be attributed to sympathy caused thereby will be reversed.

2. WITNESSES (§ 350*)—EXAMINATION—SCOPE—CONVICTION OF OFFENSE.

Though it is proper to ask a defendant in an action for assault and battery if he had been convicted of a felony, he having testified that he had not, further questions as to a charge upon which he had been indicted, tried, and acquitted were improper.

3. DAMAGES (§ 181*)—EVIDENCE—FINANCIAL STANDING—PUNITIVE DAMAGES.

Defendant could properly be examined as to his financial condition, where, under the pleadings, an instruction on punitive damages could have been given, even though the court instructed that no punitive damages were authorized.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. §§ 473, 474, 499; Dec. Dig. § 181.*]

4. ASSAULT AND BATTERY (§ 42*)—"PUNITIVE DAMAGES"—EVIDENCE.

In an action for assault and battery, evidence held to require a submission to the jury of the question of punitive damages, which are damages allowed, not as a compensation, but as a punishment for a wrong, willfully and maliciously done.

5. ASSAULT AND BATTERY (§§ 38, 39, 40*)—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

In an action for assault and battery, plaintiff may recover such a sum as will compensate him for the mental or physical suffering, or both, which are the proximate result of the injury, and, if the assault was willful, malicious, and unjustified, the jury may also award punitive damages in their discretion, not exceeding in all the sum claimed in the petition.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assault and Battery, Cent. Dig. §§ 53-55; Dec. Dig. §§ 38, 39, 40.*]

6. ASSAULT AND BATTERY (§ 13*)—INSTRUCTIONS—SUPPORT IN EVIDENCE.

The mere fact that the assaulting party during the fight retreated a few steps before seizing a weapon does not amount to a withdrawal, so as to make the other party guilty of a fresh assault in following him up.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assault and Battery, Cent. Dig. § 11; Dec. Dig. § 13.*]

7. ASSAULT AND BATTERY (§ 34*)—EVIDENCE—ABUSIVE LANGUAGE.

Though abusive language will not justify an assault, it is admissible in mitigation of punitive damages.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assault and Battery, Cent. Dig. §§ 47-50; Dec. Dig. § 34.*]

8. ABATEMENT AND REVIVAL (§ 69*)—DEATH OF PARTY—DISMISSAL.

Where, pending appeal, the defendant in an action for damages for assault and battery dies and the case is reversed, the action should be dismissed under Ky. St. § 10, stating what personal injury actions shall survive the death of a party.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Spencer County.

Action by C. M. Rowland against A. M. Shields. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant's administrators, defendant having died, appeal. Reversed and dismissed.

John S. Kelley, of Bardstown, and S. K. Baird, of Taylorsville, for appellants. W. H. Fulton and Frank E. Daugherty, both of Bardstown, for appellee.

LASSING, J. C. M. Rowland instituted suit in the Nelson circuit court against Dr. A. M. Shields, in which he sought to recover damages for assault and battery. The case was transferred to the Spencer circuit court, where, upon a trial before a jury, the plaintiff recovered a verdict for $750. Judgment was entered upon the verdict, and the motion and grounds for new trial was overruled. Thereafter the defendant died, and his personal representatives perfected and prosecute this appeal, and seek to have the judgment set aside upon several grounds, chief of which are, first, misconduct of counsel for appellee during the trial; second, error of the court in admitting incompetent evidence; and, third, error in instructing the jury.

The facts out of which the litigation grew are as follows: Appellee, a blacksmith by trade, was doing a general blacksmith business in Chaplan, in the east end of Nelson county. Shields, the decedent, was a practicing physician in the same town. Appellee had been doing Shields' blacksmith work, and upon a day early in January, 1910, was doing some work for him on a buggy. Dr.

Shields went to the shop and complained of the manner in which it was being done. He and appellee walked out of the shop, under a shed adjoining it, and had some words about the business. They differ as to how the controversy arose. From the testimony of the witnesses, none of whom saw the beginning of the fight, it is not altogether clear how it began. Appellee testifies that, when the doctor complained that the work was not satisfactory to him, he told him, if it was not, to take his work and go elsewhere, that thereupon the doctor struck him in the face, and in this way the altercation commenced. The doctor testified that he said to appellee that one of his horses had been improperly shod, that a crooked shoe had been put on the horse, and that it had lamed him, and thereupon appellee called him a damned liar, and then he struck him. Immediately following this, according to the decided weight of the evidence, appellee knocked the doctor down as many as three times; and, after he had knocked him down the third time, the doctor drew his knife and advanced upon appellee, whereupon appellee seized a pair of bolt tongs and struck at him, but missed him. Appellee thereupon seized a piece of iron, but, for some reason, failed to strike the doctor with the iron, and backed into the office door, inside of which was a horse clipping or other machine, over which both fell. At this time the doctor was cutting at appellee with his knife, but, before any serious damage had been done, bystanders separated them, and the altercation ended. The doctor testified that appellee cut him with a knife upon both of his hands during the altercation. Appellee denies this, and states that he had no knife; and no witness other than the doctor testifies to his having a knife, although two or three of the witnesses testify that following the altercation they saw wounds upon the doctor's hands, which looked like they might have been made by a knife or sharp instrument, and also rents in his clothing, which appeared to have been made by a knife. There is evidence introduced to the effect that the clothing which the doctor exhibited to these witnesses shortly after the difficulty was not the same which he had on at the time of the altercation. The injury to appellee consisted of a gash on the side of the neck, which little more than drew the blood. It was an inconsequential injury. Immediately following this difficulty the suit for damages growing out of the assault was filed.

[1] Upon the trial appellee's counsel attempted by several witnesses to show that following the difficulty appellee went into his house, where his wife, who had shortly theretofore given birth to a baby and was sick in bed, upon seeing her husband and learning of the difficulty, became so nervous and frightened that she became sick and her flow of milk ceased, in consequence of which their young baby did not receive sufficient nourishment, and its growth and general health were greatly retarded and injured. Counsel for appellants strenuously objected to this line of interrogation, and the court sustained the objection; but, in spite of this fact, counsel for appellee proceeded with this line of interrogation until the jury could not have failed to understand that the effect of the injury inflicted by the doctor upon appellee had resulted in making the latter's wife sick, and materially injured the health and retarded the growth of the baby. The injury to appellee was slight; and, as the court did not authorize the jury to award punitive damages, we are unable to understand upon what theory $750 could have been awarded, unless it was, in a measure, to compensate appellee for the injury which resulted to his wife and baby through the nervous shock received by her when she discovered that her husband had been injured. Evidence of this character was evidently offered by counsel for appellee for the purpose of increasing the damage. He could have had no other possible end in view; and, when the trial judge had sustained the objection to this line of interrogation, counsel should not have pursued it further. We would not hold, if these questions had been asked but a single witness, that it was a reversible error; for counsel may have felt that, if the sickness of his client's wife and the injury to his child's health resulted from a nervous shock brought on by the sight of appellee's injury, at the hands of the doctor, he was entitled to recover for this as an element of damage. But, when the court had ruled against him and held that this evidence was not competent, it was error for counsel to proceed, in spite of the ruling of the court, in trying to bring these matters to the attention of the jury. Where the admonitions of the court are disregarded and his rulings, which should at all times guide counsel in the conduct of the trial, are ignored and a judgment is recovered which may, in part, be attributed to an advantage gained by an improper line of interrogation, it should not be permitted to stand. There are two ways in which courts can control counsel and keep them within proper bounds in the conduct of trials. One is by summarily punishing the offending counsel; and the other is to deprive him of the fruits of victory won while pursuing improper methods. The trial court, when he ruled that this line of interrogation was improper, should have, by mandatory process, enforced obedience to his ruling. Inasmuch as he failed to do this and the verdict of the jury may have been influenced by this improper line of interrogation, the trial court should have awarded appellants a new trial upon this ground. Marcum v. Hargis, 104 S. W. 693, 31 Ky. Law Rep. 1117; L. & N. R. Co. v. Reaume, 128 Ky. 90, 107 S. W. 290, 32 Ky. Law Rep. 946; L. & N. R. Co. v. Payne, 133 Ky. 539, 118 S. W. 352, 19 Ann. Cas. 294.

[2] The next ground of complaint is that the court erred in the admission of incompetent evidence. Counsel for appellee, when examining the doctor, asked him if he had not been convicted of a felony, to which question objection was made. This was a proper question, and the court correctly held it to be such; but, when it was shown by the answer that he had not been convicted of a felony, his further interrogation relative to a charge, upon which he had been indicted, tried, and acquitted, was error, and the evidence upon this point should not have been permitted to go to the jury.

[3, 4] It is next insisted that the court erred in permitting the doctor to be interrogated relative to his financial condition. This objection is based upon the idea that appellee was not entitled to an instruction authorizing an award of punitive damages. The point would be well taken if no instruction authorizing punitive damages was in fact authorized; but we are of opinion that the trial court erred in holding as a matter of law that appellee was not entitled to an instruction authorizing punitive damages, if, as a matter of fact, the doctor made an unprovoked, willful, and malicious assault upon appellee. Indeed, we know of no case where an instruction authorizing punitive damages could with more propriety be given than in a case of this character. Punitive damages are allowed, not as a compensation for injury, but as a punishment for a wrong, willfully and maliciously done. If the allegations of the petition are true, appellee was entitled to an instruction authorizing an award of punitive damages. Hence the court did not err in permitting the introduction of evidence bearing upon the financial standing of appellants' intestate.

The only remaining question is the complaint that the court did not properly instruct the jury. No serious objection can be raised to instruction No. 1. It presents the law of the case, both from the standpoint of the claim as asserted by appellee and the defense as interposed by the doctor. Instruction No. 2 did not fully present the measure of damages.

[5] Upon this point the court should have told the jury: "If you find for the plaintiff, you will award him such sum as you believe from the evidence will compensate him for the mental or physical pain or suffering, one or both, if any, endured by him as the direct and proximate result of his injury; and, in addition to actual damages, if you find from the evidence that the assault was willful, malicious, and without justification, you may, in your discretion, award him punitive damages, not exceeding in all, however, the sum of $2,000, the amount claimed in the petition."

[6] Instruction No. 3 was unauthorized.

The court seems to have been influenced in giving this instruction by the idea that there was at some time during this combat, a cessation of hostilities; and that there was evidence tending to show that appellee withdrew from the contest. We do not so view the evidence. From the testimony of all the witnesses, including the principals to the affray, it is apparent that there was but one difficulty. It was a continuous fight from start to finish. When so viewed, the instruction should not have been given. Just what effect this instruction had on the verdict of the jury cannot be determined. The jury may have believed the doctor's version of the difficulty, that appellee, in fact, assaulted him, and that he acted only in self-defense; and yet, under this instruction, they would have been warranted in finding against the doctor; if they regarded appellee as retreating, after he had knocked the doctor down the third time, a few steps just before he seized the bolt tongs. When viewed in this light, it is apparent that this instruction may have been highly prejudicial. It should not have been given.

[7] There was evidence to the effect that before the doctor struck appellee, if he did strike the initial blow, appellee had used toward him abusive and insulting language, such as was calculated to provoke an assault. Now, while evidence of such language cannot be given in justification of an assault, it was proper that it should have gone to the jury as a circumstance to be received by the jury in mitigation of exemplary or punitive damages, in the event the jury found against the doctor in any sum in excess of the actual damage, to which the evidence showed he was entitled. The court should have in appropriate language told the jury the purpose for which this evidence was admitted.

[8] For the reasons indicated, the judgment is reversed, with directions to the trial court to enter an order dismissing the petition, inasmuch as under section 10, Ky. St., as construed by this court in Anderson v. Arnold, 79 Ky. 370; Lewis' Adm'r v. Taylor Coal Co., 112 Ky. 845, 66 S. W. 1044, 23 Ky. Law Rep. 2218, 57 L. R. A. 447, it is an action which does not survive, and cannot be prosecuted against the personal representatives of a deceased wrongdoer.

CAMPBELL COUNTY v. WRIGHT.

(Supreme Court of Tennessee. Nov. 30, 1912.)

1. COURTS (§ 246*)—COURT OF CIVIL APPEALS—JURISDICTION OF CONSTITUTIONAL QUESTIONS.

Under Acts 1907, c. 82, § 7, providing that the jurisdiction of the Court of Civil Appeals shall extend to all cases brought up from courts of equity or chancery courts, except cases, among others, involving the constitutionality of statutes, and to all cases tried in the circuit and common-law courts in which appeals or writs of error may be applied for, such court has no jurisdiction of a constitutional question, whether it arises on an appeal from circuit or common-law courts or the equity courts.

2. COURTS (§ 246*)—COURT OF CIVIL APPEALS—JURISDICTION OF CONSTITUTIONAL QUESTIONS.

Under Acts 1907, c. 82, § 7, excepting cases involving the constitutionality of statutes from the jurisdiction of the Court of Civil Appeals, and Acts 1909, c. 192, providing that, where the Supreme Court or Court of Civil Appeals is of the opinion that jurisdiction of an appeal is in the other court, it shall be its duty to transfer the cause to such other court, which shall cause it to be entered on its trial docket and try and dispose of it, the only jurisdiction of the Court of Civil Appeals over an appeal involving a constitutional question is to transfer the case to the Supreme Court.

3. CERTIORARI (§ 28*)—SUPREME COURT—REVIEW OF JURISDICTION.

Where the Court of Civil Appeals erroneously assumed jurisdiction of and determined an appeal involving a constitutional question, instead of transferring it to the Supreme Court, as required by statute, its error in failing to enter the order of transfer gives the Supreme Court jurisdiction to review the appeal by certiorari.

Certiorari to Court of Civil Appeals.

Action by W. H. Wright against Campbell County, originally brought before a justice of the peace. A judgment of the circuit court, affirming a judgment for plaintiff, was reversed by the Court of Civil Appeals, and the suit dismissed, and the case is brought to the Supreme Court by certiorari. Judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals reversed, and judgment rendered for plaintiff, in accordance with the judgment of the circuit court.

Owens & Taylor, of La Follette, for plaintiff. John Jennings, Jr., of Jellico, for defendant.

PER CURIAM. This action was originally brought before a justice of the peace of Campbell county to recover for services performed by the defendant in error as registrar of the La Follette precinct of the First district of Campbell county. The service was alleged to have been rendered prior to the August election in 1910. Judgment was recovered before the justice of the peace, and from this an appeal was prayed to the circuit court of the county, where the judgment was affirmed to the amount of $16.50 and the costs of the suit. From this judgment the county prayed an appeal to the Court of Civil Appeals, where the judgment of the circuit court was reversed, and the suit dismissed. The case was then brought to this court by the writ of certiorari.

It was stated in the opinion of the Court of Civil Appeals that no question was made in that court about the value of the services, but that the only question was as to the constitutionality of chapter 419 of the Acts of 1911. It was said in that opinion that the act referred to was held unconstitutional in the circuit court, and therefore the defendant in error was permitted to recover there. The Court of Civil Appeals, on the contrary, held the act constitutional, and for that reason denied the defendant in error any recovery. So it appears that the only matter for consideration in the Court of Civil Appeals, and the only thing that was examined and determined, was the question of the constitutionality of the act of the Legislature referred to.

We are of the opinion that in undertaking to dispose of the constitutional question that court acted beyond its powers. Chapter 82, Acts of 1907, which created that court, declares in section 7: "That the jurisdiction of said Court of Civil Appeals shall be appellate only, and shall extend to all cases brought up from courts of equity or chancery courts, except cases in which the amount involved, exclusive of costs, exceeds one thousand dollars, and except cases involving the constitutionality of the statutes of Tennessee, contested elections for office, state revenue, and ejectment suits, and to all civil cases tried in the circuit and common-law courts of the state, in which appeals in the nature of writs of error, or writs of error may be applied for for the purpose of having the action of said trial court reviewed. In all cases in which appellate jurisdiction is herein conferred upon said Court of Civil Appeals, the appeals and appeals in the nature of writs of error from the lower court shall be taken directly to said Court of Civil Appeals; and said court, or any judge thereof, is hereby given the same power to award and issue writs of error," and writs of "certiorari and supersedeas, which the Supreme Court has heretofore had in such cases, returnable to said Court of Civil Appeals. The practice in such cases in said court shall be the same as is now prescribed by law for the Supreme Court. In all cases in which appellate jurisdiction is not conferred by the terms of this act upon said Court of Civil Appeals, appeals therefrom shall be direct to the Supreme Court, and in such cases, writs of error, certiorari, and supersedeas shall be issued by and made returnable to the Supreme Court, as is now provided by law; and in such cases the Supreme Court shall have exclusive jurisdiction, and shall try and finally determine the same, and shall not, after this act takes effect, assign the same for trial by the said Court of Civil Appeals."

By chapter 192 of the Acts of 1909 it was provided that in all appeals taken from either the chancery, circuit, or county courts of this state to the Supreme Court, or to the Court of Civil Appeals, if the court to which any such case should be appealed should be of opinion that the jurisdiction to try and determine the same was not in said court, but in the other appellate court, it should be the duty of said court, if it should be the Court of Civil Appeals, to transfer the cause to the Supreme Court for trial, and that the Supreme Court should cause any such case so transferred to it to be entered upon its trial docket, and try and dispose of the same as though the appeal had been directed to the Supreme Court; and in like manner, if the Supreme Court should be of opinion that the jurisdiction to try and determine any such case appealed to it was with the Court of Civil Appeals, it should be the duty of the Supreme Court to transfer any such case to the Court of Civil Appeals for trial, which latter court should cause any such case to be entered upon its docket, and try and dispose of the same, as though the case had been appealed directly to that court, and that no writ of error or other process should be necessary to give the court to which any such cause had been transferred jurisdiction either of the parties or of the subject-matter of the litigation.

[1] Under section 7 of chapter 82 of the Acts of 1907, supra, it is clear that the jurisdiction of constitutional questions is withheld from the Court of Civil Appeals. It is true that this particular subject is not repeated in the sentence of that section which confers jurisdiction upon the Court of Civil Appeals of cases coming from the circuit courts of the state; but there could have been no reason why that court was denied jurisdiction of this class of subjects in cases coming from the chancery court, if it was to exercise such jurisdiction in cases appealed to it from the circuit court. We are of the opinion that, under a true construction of section 7, it was intended by the Legislature to withhold entirely from the Court of Civil Appeals jurisdiction of constitutional questions. Railroad v. Bryne, 119 Tenn. 278, 325-329, 104 S. W. 460.

[2] In the present case, there is no question, as we have stated, except the constitutional question, and the Court of Civil Appeals had no jurisdiction except to transfer the case to this court, under the act of 1909 above reproduced. We think, also, the better opinion is that this course should be taken by the Court of Civil Appeals whenever it appears in any case in that court that any question involving the constitutionality of an act of the Legislature is bona fide made and relied on therein.

[3] The question now to be determined is whether the present case is properly before us, although no order of transfer was made. We are of the opinion that it is, because of the error of the Court of Civil Appeals in failing to enter an order making the transfer required by the act of 1909; that is, its error in failing to enter the proper judgment to get the case off its docket.

EASTER v. EASTER et al.

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 2.
Nov. 13, 1912. Rehearing Denied
Dec. 10, 1912.)

1. TRUSTS (§ 86*)—RESULTING TRUSTS—BURDEN OF PROOF.

One seeking to establish a resulting trust in real estate on the ground that his money went into the purchase thereof, while the legal title was taken in the name of another, has the burden of proving clearly and convincingly the fact.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Cent. Dig. § 128; Dec. Dig. § 86.*]

2. TRUSTS (§ 89*)—RESULTING TRUSTS—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Evidence held not to establish a resulting trust in real estate, on the theory that plaintiff's money went into the purchase of the property, legal title to which was taken in the name of defendant.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jackson County; Walter A. Powell, Judge.

Action by Warren W. Easter against Charles R. Easter and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed, with directions to enter judgment for defendants.

McCune, Harding, Brown & Murphy, of Kansas City, for appellants. Ed El. Aleshire and S. S. Gundlach, both of Kansas City, for respondent.

BLAIR, C. Warren W. Easter, the plaintiff, and defendant Charles R. Easter are brothers, and defendant Elizabeth R. Easter is the latter's wife. For about 10 years the brothers were partners in the restaurant business, and this suit was begun by plaintiff to recover an interest in a certain lot in Kansas City the title to which was taken May 11, 1901, in the name of defendant Elizabeth, but which plaintiff contends was bought with partnership funds and for the partnership. From a decree vesting title as to an undivided one-fifth of the property in the plaintiff and defendant Charles R., as partners, both defendants have appealed.

Counsel do not differ materially as to the law of the case, the real controversy being as to the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings that partnership funds were employed in the purchase. Since the principal question to be determined is purely one of fact, it becomes necessary to review the evidence in the case.

The partnership between the brothers began in 1892, and they conducted the business until some time in 1895, when it was sold on deferred payments which the purchaser soon found himself unable to meet, and the partnership again resumed the business and prosecuted it continuously until in 1902. The evidence does not show the profits of the business to have been very large prior to the sale mentioned, though there is evidence the firm made some money. In 1894 Charles R. Easter married the defendant Elizabeth R. Easter, who appears to have had some knowledge of the restaurant business and to have been both capable and economical. Some time after resuming business in 1895 the two brothers began to save a little money, and by June, 1899, had accumulated $105 each by means of payments separately made on building and loan stock. In June, 1899, the two purchased the interest of another brother in property at Lexington, paying $50 each and executing a note for $75 for a balance. At this time plaintiff withdrew all his money from the building and loan, and Charles R. borrowed $50 from the association, withdrawing the balance two months later. The business was prosperous thenceforward, and May 11, 1901, the property here involved was purchased; the title being taken in the name of Elizabeth R. Easter, and the purchase price of $7,000 being paid as follows: $500 in cash; $2,000 in property conveyed to Elizabeth R. Easter by her mother for use in effecting the purchase; and the balance was secured by a first and second deed of trust for $3,500 and $1,000, respectively. The owner of the property had no dealings with plaintiff; the whole of the business, including his contract to erect a two-story building on the lot he sold, being transacted by Elizabeth R. and Charles R. Easter. An error in the estimate of the width of the lot resulted in a credit of $300 on the note secured by the second deed of trust, and the balance of $700 was paid, as due, in monthly installments of $75; the greater portion of the amount being paid between May 11, 1901, and May 15, 1902. These payments were made by Mrs. Easter, usually; none of them being made personally by plaintiff.

From the beginning plaintiff was addicted to the use of intoxicants, and the evidence is clear that he spent some time and considerable money in indulging his appetite for drink. Apparently disinterested witnesses testified that for a long time he was constantly under the influence of liquor, and he admits the habit, but denies expending any considerable amount of money in indulging it. At any rate, in 1899 his condition had become such that he thought it proper to take what is commonly called the "Keeley Cure," and did so. Thereafter he began drinking again, and his health seems subsequently to have been very poor.

In 1902 plaintiff, who is usually called "Wirth" by the witnesses, executed to defendant Charles R. Easter a bill of sale of the stock and fixtures "together with the good will of such restaurant business heretofore conducted at 420 West Ninth street, Kansas City, Mo., under the name of 'Easter Bros.' It being the intention of said Warren W. Easter to convey to said Charles R. Easter all his interest in and to the above-described property and business." This instrument was dated July 30, 1902, and the recited consideration was $500. The consideration was paid, the evidence shows, in semimonthly installments of $15.

Plaintiff testified he and his brother had no settlements and made no division of profits at all during the time the partnership existed, but that Charles R. simply kept all the firm's money after the expenses were paid; that until 1899 the profits were small and were absorbed by rent paid which amounted to $70 per month. He was unable to state what profits the firm was making at the time the removal to the new building (1901) occurred, the nearest approach being: "Well, we were doing a very good business, a very good business, and, so far as the volume goes, I do not know; it might have been over $100 a month, probably, clean cash." He further testified the firm had $600 or $700 on hand in May, 1901; that he and Charles R. Easter agreed to purchase the lot at 420 West Ninth street and have the title put in the name of Charles' wife. He testified positively he personally participated in the negotiations for the lot, but it clearly appeared he did not do so. He was unable to tell by or to whom the money was paid, from what source it came or what the amount of it was, and finally admitted he did not know that it was paid at all. He said that both he and his brother had access to the money drawer, that each took money as he wished, leaving a ticket in the money drawer, and that a book account of what each received was kept by the firm. The book was not produced, nor was any effort made to secure its production, so far as the record shows. There is so much of contradiction, uncertainty, and clear mistake in plaintiff's testimony that it may be properly characterized as quite incoherent.

Lawrence Easter, another brother, testified that defendant Charles told him at one time in 1895 or 1896 the firm had building and loan stock to the amount of "possibly $400 to $600, something like that, $500, I don't remember the amount," accumulated in "a few years, a year and half," and that after 1902 plaintiff wanted to go back to the restaurant, but Charles R. would not permit it, stating that Wirth "was breaking down in health and had plenty and didn't have to work." Witness declared he frequently asked Charles R. to take Wirth back with him. He further stated that in 1901 he had heard Charles R. say the firm was making $300 to $400 per month, but acknowledged Charles R. offered to sell the business to him for $700. James Drummond testified that in 1906 Charles R. Easter said to him that: "Weezle and Jessie was continually after him to let Wirth go back in the business. Now Wirth don't have to work. He has plenty to take care of him, and I intend to see he is taken care of as long as he lives."

Mrs. Drummond and Mrs. Whitsett (sisters of the Easters) testified Mrs. Easter told them in February, 1903, that if anything happened to her husband Wirth "would get his part just the same." Walter Whitsett, a brother-in-law, testified that Charles R. Easter, speaking of the proposed purchase of the lot in question, told him he and Wirth were talking about buying it, but he (Easter) "had a hard time to get Wirth's consent to it; he was scared to risk his money in it, and thought they might lose everything they had, and he discouraged him every time he approached him about the matter"; that Charles R. also told him "they had talked it over and concluded to have the deed put in his wife's name for their own convenience. Witness also said Charles R. had told him he and Wirth were to put $2,000 to $3,000 into the purchase of the lot at the first.

There was also evidence from these and other witnesses as to other alleged admissions, but they were inferences of the witnesses, as appeared in each instance, and lacking in probative force.

Charles R. Easter and his wife both testified that the $500 cash payment made on the lot was composed of $250 of Mrs. Easter's money, paid her by her mother for the board of Cora La Rose, Mrs. Easter's younger sister, and $250 which belonged to Charles R. Easter personally. They denied the admissions attributed to them, and detailed the manner in which they purchased the lot in question, and in respect to this were corroborated in the main by the former owner. The subsequent payments were made, they said, from the rent from the building, about $125 per month, and Charles R.'s share of the profits from the restaurant business. As to Wirth Easter's dissolute habits they were corroborated by Cora La Rose, by a bartender, and another disinterested witness. They offered in evidence the cashbook of a building and loan association showing that Wirth and Charles R. Easter had $105 each with the association in 1899 and that the money was withdrawn by each of them in the summer of that year. They produced a list of payments made to Wirth Easter, subsequent to the date of the bill of sale in evidence, totaling seven hundred and some dollars. It appeared from their evidence and that of plaintiff that the firm of Easter Bros. paid no rent to Elizabeth or Charles R. Easter. Defendants testified this was the result of a promise to plaintiff that they would buy the lot and put up the building and charge the firm no rent if he (plaintiff) "would brace up and quit drinking" and attend better to business. The rental value of the room occupied by the restaurant was about $25 per month. According to the evidence for defendants, no books, as between the partners, were kept; the profits being divided when there were any. For some time after the dissolution of the partnership and after the payment of the $500 due plaintiff according to the terms of the bill of sale, Charles R. Easter continued to furnish some money to plaintiff directly or pay it to his brothers or sisters for caring for him, but in 1905 refused to provide for him further. Two of the sisters, according to their testimony, attempted to get him to take plaintiff back, but he refused. It appears Charles R. also contributed to the support of another brother.

[1] The question in this case is whether the cash payment of $500 made on the lot purchased in 1901 was partnership money. In order to establish a resulting trust in this case it must be shown that partnership money went into the purchase of the lot. On plaintiff rests the burden to make this appear so clearly, cogently, and convincingly as to leave no reasonable doubt on that head. Counsel do not differ as to this.

[2] Has plaintiff met the requirements of the rule? We think not. That the partnership had funds at the time is not sufficient. They must be shown to have gone into the property. To meet the denial of defendants and the fact that plaintiff personally took no part of any kind in the negotiations and had no interest in the property turned in on the purchase of the lot, resort is had to testimony as to statements made by Charles R. Easter in contemplation of the purchase and admissions said to have been made by him and Elizabeth R. subsequent thereto. As to the former they clearly appeared, in several instances, to have been unconsciously amplified by inferences drawn by the witnesses from the mere fact that a partnership in the restaurant business existed between the brothers. In other instances the alleged declarations might as clearly indicate an intent of Charles R. Easter and his wife to purchase as an intent of the partners to do so.

So far as the admissions coming after the purchase are concerned, what has just been said applies to some of them, and others have no direct reference to the property in question. Mrs. Elizabeth Easter's statement in February, 1903, is explicable as a reference to the unpaid balance due plaintiff under the bill of sale. Mr. Whitsett's testimony shows that plaintiff was objecting to the purchase, was afraid to participate in it, and was opposing it. It also appears from his testimony that the plan at that time, the one plaintiff was considering, was that Easter Bros. were to put $2,000 to $3,000 into the property in order to get the lot and get a building erected thereon. The actual purchase made was not in accordance with this plan. It is beyond dispute that $2,000 of the $2,500 payment made at the time of purchasing the lot consisted of property belonging to Elizabeth Easter's mother in which plaintiff had no sort of interest, and we think it satisfactorily proved that $240 of the remaining $500 was money of Mrs. Easter derived from payments made her by her mother in consideration of her caring for her sister, Cora La Rose. This leaves but $260 in which plaintiff could have an interest. Clearly, then, the plan under consideration at the time Charles R. Easter talked with Whitsett, taking Whitsett's testimony as true, was not the one adopted in the purchase.

Further, plaintiff's unexplained conduct in signing the bill of sale (and we agree with the trial court he did execute it) without giving any attention to the interest he now claims in the realty, and the fact he seems never to have concerned himself about it until the property had greatly increased in value, are not in full accord with his position in this case. He apparently took no part at any time in the management of the property or the collection of the rents—gave it no attention whatever, so far as this record shows. Plaintiff's own testimony is valueless. It may be possible his incoherency, lack of memory, and self-contradiction are due to the effects of his unfortunate habits; but, whatever their cause, they cannot themselves constitute evidence in his favor. The record does not indicate any willful misstatement of facts by any witness, but rather that those for plaintiff have mingled inferences with unguarded and ambiguous statements of defendants and have permitted themselves to assume from the partnership in the restaurant business a partnership in everything.

In view of these facts and the rule to which we have already adverted, this judgment ought to be and is reversed, and the cause remanded, with direction to the trial court to enter judgment for defendants.

PER CURIAM. The foregoing opinion of BLAIR, C., is adopted as the opinion of the court. All the Judges concur.

DULCE REALTY CO. v. STAED REALTY CO.

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 2.
Nov. 13, 1912.)

1. EASEMENTS (§ 3*)—PRIVATE WAY.

Where there was a partition creating an easement in an alley in favor of all the parcels conveyed, such easement became incident and appurtenant to such parcels, and passed as appurtenant thereto in subsequent conveyances by or without the word "appurtenances," so long as such estates existed as distinct estates, unless it was abandoned or extinguished in some way.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Easements, Cent. Dig. §§ 8-12; Dec. Dig. § 3.*]

2. BOUNDARIES (§ 21*)—OWNERSHIP OF FEE.

Where deeds in partition reserving an easement in a private alley to the different parcels did not expressly convey the fee of the alley to any one, it is presumed that, as in case of a public way, the owners of the abutting property hold the fee to the center, so that an abutting owner had no title in the opposite half thereof, unless it was established by the statute of limitations as the mere destruction or abandonment of the easement would not give such a title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Boundaries, Cent. Dig. § 131; Dec. Dig. § 21.*]

3. EASEMENTS (§ 30*) — EXTINGUISHMENT — NONUSER.

An easement acquired by a deed cannot be lost by mere nonuser.

4. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 80*) — EXTENT — COLOR OF TITLE.

A quitclaim deed from the owners of land abutting on a private alley and purporting to convey such alley is not sufficient as color of title, where it described the strip as "known as a private alley," as it is a confirmation of the alley rather than an impeachment.

5. EASEMENTS (§ 9*)—HOSTILE CHARACTER—SUFFICIENCY.

Where the beginning of the possession of a private alley by an owner of property abutting one side of it was originally with the permission of the owner of the property abutting the other side, who owned the fee to the center, and such possession was under no adverse claim of right until shortly before the commencement of suit to compel the removal of a building constructed thereon, and to enjoin the threatened construction of another, there was no claim of right sufficient to support a title by limitations.

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court, Moses N. Sale, Judge.

Injunction by the Dulce Realty Company against the Staed Realty Company. From a decree for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

This is a proceeding in the circuit court of the city of St. Louis to enjoin the construction of a building on an alleged private alley, and to compel the removal of one already constructed. Pending the suit and before the trial, the building in contemplation by the defendant at the beginning of the suit was constructed. There was a decree for plaintiff requiring the demolition of both structures, and restraining any future obstructions to the alley. Defendant has appealed.

The land in controversy is located in city block 190, bounded north by Chestnut street between Eighth and Ninth streets. In 1854 the Lucas heirs were the owners of all the property abutting on the alleged alley. In that year they made partition by deeds to each one of them for separate parcels of the land. In all those deeds the land included in the alleged alley in controversy was described as "a space supposed to be five feet wide left by all concerned for an alley." The plaintiff now owns 40 feet fronting on Chestnut street and running south 80 feet 6 inches to a private alley 10 feet wide which runs east to Eighth street. The defendant owns two tracts. One tract was acquired in 1891, and is 84 feet fronting on Chestnut street running south 31 feet; the east line of it being the west line of the alley. The other tract acquired by defendant in 1894 fronts 26 feet 2 inches on Ninth street, and runs east 125 feet to the alley, the east end of it being south of and adjacent to the other tract of defendant. The relative positions of those tracts with reference to the alley are shown on the following plat:

In that partition the land east of the alley was assigned to Henry S. Turner and wife, and the chain of title thereto down to the plaintiff is as follows: April 28, 1856, Turner and wife conveyed it without mentioning the alley to Henry L. Patterson, who on May 1, 1856, conveyed to James H. Lucas, describing it as bounded "west by an alley five feet wide." On April 6, 1872, James H. Lucas conveyed it to Robert J. Lucas as trustee for Joseph D. Lucas, describing it as bounded "south by alley and west by Gardiner and others." On November 16, 1875, Robert J. Lucas, as trustee, conveyed it to Joseph D. Lucas by the same description as in the last deed. There is no explanation in the evidence as to why those two deeds described the land as bounded "west by Gardiner and others." In 1903 Joseph D. Lucas died, devising all his property to his wife, who, on November 29, 1904, conveyed it to Wm. Bunning, and by a quitclaim deed of the same date she conveyed a strip five feet wide corresponding to the 5-foot alley to said Bunning, describing it by metes and bounds, but not stating that it was an alley, and also a strip corresponding to the 10-foot alley, but not describing it as an alley. On November 29, 1904, Bunning conveyed the property east of the alley to Hannah R. Daugherty, and also by a quitclaim deed conveyed the 5-foot and 10-foot strips to Daugherty, not calling them alleys. On May 16, 1907, Daugherty conveyed the property east of the alley to the plaintiff, and also conveyed with it the two strips by quitclaim deed, as it was described in the deed to him. All the deeds in the plaintiff's chain of title to the land east of the alley conveyed the land with its appurtenances. The chain of title from the Lucas heirs to the land west of the alley was not put in evidence. On January 30, 1885, Robert S. McDonald conveyed the land fronting 84 feet on Chestnut street immediately west of the alley, running south 31 feet, describing it as bounded east by a private alley, to Robert N. Noonan, trustee for Josephine Noonan. On January 3, 1889, the Noonans conveyed it to Alfred D. Ryan, trustee for his wife, describing it as bounded east by a private alley, and on February 11, 1891, the Ryans conveyed it by the same description to John Staed, Patrick M. Staed, and Patrick J. Staed, and on the same day the Ryans conveyed to the Staeds by quitclaim deed for the expressed consideration of $5 "a parcel of land in block 190 of said city of St. Louis, being known as a private alley and fronting on the south line of Chestnut street about 5 feet more or less, by a depth southwardly of about 31 feet, the west line thereof being 125 feet east of the east line of Ninth street, and bounded on the north by Chestnut street, west by property conveyed to Staed et al., by deed dated February 11, 1891, and east by Lucas." At the time of the conveyance to the Staeds, there were two-story brick buildings fronting on Chestnut street on both sides of the alley, the walls being five feet, three and a fourth inches apart. The west building extended south 31 feet, and the wall next to the alley was without openings, except a window near the south end in the second story. The wall on the east side of the alley was without openings, and extended further south than that on the west side. On both sides of the alley fences ran south from the corners of those buildings to the 10-foot alley. Those fences remained there until shortly before this suit began. The alley was open in 1891 from Chestnut street to the 10-foot alley. There was no opening or gate in the fence on the east side of the alley.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

In 1892, the north end of the alley for a distance of about 21 feet was inclosed by wooden framework and doors on the north and south and with a roof and floor, and the room thus formed, hereinafter called the "cigar store," was occupied most of the time by cigar men, and a part of the time by a bootblack and by a brick man. It rented at $10 a month up to the time of the trial. On April 18, 1894, the Staeds conveyed to the Staed Realty Company land described as follows: "A lot of ground in city block 190 of said city of St. Louis, beginning at a point in the south line of Chestnut street 41 feet east of Ninth street; thence east along south line of Chestnut street 84 feet to west line of private alley; thence south along west line of private alley parallel to Ninth street 31 feet to the northeast corner of property now or formerly of Wolff et al.; thence west parallel to Chestnut street 84 feet to the southeast corner of property of Robert S. McDonald; thence north parallel to Ninth street 31 feet to the point of beginning." No deed to the defendant was in evidence for the 26 feet 2 inches fronting on Ninth street; but on October 24, 1894, the defendant executed a deed of trust describing it as follows: "A lot of ground in said city block 190 containing a front of 26 feet 4 inches, more or less, on the east line of Ninth street, by a depth eastwardly of 125 feet, more or less, to a private alley five feet wide. Bounded on the west by Ninth street, east by a private alley, south by a lot now or formerly of S. J. Fisher et al., and north by a line 31 feet south of the south line of Chestnut street."

On April 8, 1901, the defendant executed a deed of trust on property described as follows: "A lot of ground in block 190 of said city of St. Louis, fronting 26 feet and 2 inches on the east line of Ninth street, by a depth eastwardly of 125 feet, more or less, to the west line of a private alley 5 feet wide, and bounded on the north in part by property also conveyed in said deed, and in part by property formerly of R. S. McDonald, and on the east by a private alley, and on the south by property formerly of Minnie L. Siegrist, and on the west by Ninth street; and also a lot of ground in said block having a front of 84 feet on the south line of Chestnut street, by a depth southwardly of 31 feet, more or less, to the northern line of property first described in said deed. Bounded on the north by Chestnut street, on the east by said private alley 5 feet wide, on the south by the property first described in said deed, and on the west by a line 41 feet, more or less, east of the east line of Ninth street."

On May 6, 1907, the defendant executed a deed of trust on property described thus: "Parcel 1. That part of city block numbered 100, beginning in the south line of Chestnut street at a point 41 feet, more or less, east of the southeast corner of Ninth and Chestnut; thence east on the south line of Chestnut 84 feet, more or less, to a private alley 5 feet wide; thence south with the west line of said private alley 31 feet, more or less, to the northeast corner of property formerly owned by M. A. Wolff, and now owned by Staed Realty Co.; thence west and parallel with Chestnut street 84 feet more or less, to the southeast corner of premises now or formerly owned by R. S. McDanold; thence with east line of said last mentioned premises 31 feet to the place of beginning. Parcel 2. That part of said city block 100 beginning on the east line of said Ninth street at a point 31 feet, more or less, south of the southeast corner of said Ninth and Chestnut streets, running thence eastwardly 125 feet, more or less, to the west line of a private alley 5 feet wide, at a point thereon which is the southeast corner of parcel 1, above described; thence southwardly with the west line of said private alley 26 feet 4 inches, more or less, to the property now or formerly of Minnie L. Siegrist; thence westwardly with the north line of said property of Siegrist 125 feet to the east line of Ninth street; thence northwardly with the east line of Ninth street 26 feet 4 inches to the place of beginning."

Mr. John Staed testified for defendant as follows: "Mr. Farley, the real estate agent, occupied this property east of this five feet, and was a tenant of Mr. Lucas. That is the property now owned by the Dulce people and occupied by Waide & Willis. For a great many years Thomas Farley, real estate agent, occupied that as his office. Q. During all that time did that property belong to Joseph Lucas? A. I suppose so. I do not know who it belonged to, but I think he was Lucas' agent." Cross-examination: "Q. This construction that covered that five feet on the front there on Chestnut street is that brick or stone, or what? A. You can look at it there and see. I think it is wood myself. I never examined it very sharp. My brother got it built. I didn't build it. Q. Isn't it a fact that Farley built it there? A. Not that I know. I am sure he never did build it. I would know something about it if he did. Q. Who was in charge of the Staed Realty Company's affairs 15 years ago? A. Well, my brother was the leading man, and I was secretary and treasurer then. I paid all the bills. Q. The Staed Realty Company didn't own this property originally, this 84 feet; it was owned by you and your brother and a number of others? A. It was the same stockholders as we have now. Q. It was owned by you severally? A. Yes, sir. Q. Who was managing that property then—handling it? A. I got the money out of the rents and paid the bills. I have been always getting the rents and tending to that property. We had Mr. McMenamy collect some rents and Mr. Brennan collect some and Mr. Farley. Mr. Farley just collected for that cigar place. That was all he collected. He collected $10 a month and gave it to me. He gave me $10 a month during a period of 12 or 13 years I suppose. He charged a commission of 3 per cent. Q. Why did he collect for that and the others collect for the balance of your property? A. Well, Brennan had been collecting for the other offices there, and my opinion is that Mr. Farley asked me to give him some of our collections, and we commenced with that, I think. Q. He collected that because he had built that shack, had he not? A. No; he did not build the shack. I don't think so. My brother told me he got the shack built. That is all I know about it. Q. You say your brother told you he built the shack there? A. Yes, sir; I paid for it. I was treasurer and paid all the bills at that time. Q. Who did you pay for it? A. My opinion is, I gave him the money to pay the men who built the shack there. I don't remember who built it. It is such a long time ago I have not any account of it now. My brother attended to that part of the business which I have to attend to now since he died. He attended to the building associations and several things of that kind. We managed it between us. We didn't have any fixed thing about it. We were all one, you might say. Q. I will ask you this question. I will ask you whether or not it was your intention when you took possession of that property and all the time you have occupied it to claim it as owner, or whether you did claim it as owner? (Objected to by plaintiff.) A. My intention was, of course, that it was our property. They had neither a door or window or anything else to show they had any claim to it. They had an alley to the rear of their own lot."

Mr. Levy, a tenant of the defendant and a real estate man, testified that the side walls of the cigar store were the brick walls of the adjoining buildings, and that there was a fence 10 feet high across the alley 31 feet south of Chestnut street which has been there for 16 years. He also testified there was a fence on the west side of the alley and a fence from the brick building on the east side of the private alley that ran out into the 10-foot private alley.

It was the custom of the revenue department of the city to assess private alleys to the adjoining owners. Up to 1900 defendant paid taxes on 87 feet 9 inches on Chestnut street front and 125 feet deep fronting on Ninth street. After that it paid on 89 feet fronting on Chestnut street. At the time the cigar store was built there was an ordinance requiring a building permit from the building commissioner before any building could lawfully be erected, and further providing that no permit should issue for a frame or wooden building in that district, and making it a misdemeanor to violate that ordinance. No such permit was issued for the construction of the cigar store. Just prior to and at the time of, the bringing of this suit, the defendant was excavating for the purpose of constructing a building on the east end of its tract which fronts on Ninth street, with the intention on the part of defendant of constructing that building on the alley with its east wall flush with the east line of that alley. Pending the suit and before the trial such building was constructed one story high.

Daniel Dillon, of St. Louis, for appellant. Richard A. Jones, of St. Louis, for respondent.

ROY, C. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. It may help us to understand the questions involved if we first determine what the rights of the owners of the property abutting on the alley were prior to the beginning of the controversy. The Lucas partition deeds created an easement in the alley in favor of those parties, and such easement was appurtenant to the several tracts of land and passed to the grantees through the mesne conveyances down to the parties to this controversy, unless it has been abandoned or extinguished in some way. Washburn on Easements, § 13, says: "The owner of an easement in another's land has neither the general property in nor seisin of the servient estate, though he may, by holding a fee in the estate to which such easement is appurtenant, have an estate of inheritance in the easement. And from being something impalpable, of which a seisin cannot be predicated, easements are classed with incorporeal hereditaments, and are so designated in the definitions thereof." Where, therefore, one grants or reserves a right of easement over one parcel of land in favor of another, such easement, by such act of creation or annexation, would become incident and appurtenant to such estate respectively, and pass as appurtenant in after conveyances by, or even without, the word "appurtenances," so long as such estates should subsist as distinct estates in different proprietors.

[2] 2. At the time of that partition the Lucas heirs owned all the land, including that in the alley. The deeds did not expressly convey the fee in the alley to any one. It is a well-known rule that, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, it will be presumed that the owners of property abutting on a public way hold the fee to the center of the way. In Holmes v. Bellingham, 7 C. B. N.

S. 329, decided by the English Court of Common Pleas in 1859, Chief Justice Cockburn said: "The same principle which applies in the case of a public road, and which is the foundation of the doctrine, seems to me to apply with equal force to the case of a private road. That presumption is allowed to prevail upon grounds of public convenience, and to prevent disputes as to the precise boundaries of property; and it is based upon this supposition, which may be more or less founded in fact, but which at all events has been adopted, that, when the road was originally formed, the proprietors on either side each contributed a portion of his land for the purpose. I think that is an equally convenient and reasonable principle whether applied to a public or to a private road; but in the latter case it must, of course, be taken with this qualification, that the user of it has been qua road and not in the exercise of a claim of ownership." That case was cited with approval in Dill v. Board of Education, 47 N. J. Eq. 421, 20 Atl. 739, 10 L. R. A. 276. It is thus seen that the defendant has no title in any event to the east half of the alley, unless it has established title by the statute of limitations. The mere destruction or abandonment of the easement would not give defendant title to the east half of the alley.

[3] The easement was acquired by deed and the cases are practically unanimous to the effect that an easement so acquired cannot be lost by mere nonuser. Dill v. Board of Education, supra; Structural Co. v. Distilling Co., 189 Mass. loc. cit. 153, 75 N. E. 85; Wiggins v. McCleary, 49 N. Y. 346. The deed made in trust for Joseph D. Lucas by James H. Lucas in 1872 and the trustee's deed to Joseph D. Lucas made in 1875 do not mention the alley, and state that the land therein conveyed was bounded in the west by the land of Gardiner et al. There is no other evidence of any kind in the case that Gardiner owned the land west of the alley or claimed the alley. On the other hand, all the evidence in the case shows that the alley was there and undisputed by anybody at the time those deeds were made. We are justified in regarding those recitals as to Gardiner et al. as being made by some inadvertence.

3. In 1891, when the Staeds became the owners of the land on the west side, Joseph D. Lucas owned on the east side of the alley. Lucas, as his name indicates, is supposed to have been one of the family who created the alley; and he had owned his land for 19 years. The Staeds were notified by their deeds that the alley was there. It was open from Chestnut street to the 10-foot alley on the south. All concerned knew of it, and no one was hostile to it.

[4] It is claimed now that the quitclaim deed from the Ryans for the 5-foot strip gave the Staeds "color of title." If so, it was decidedly "off color," for it stated that the strip was "known as a private alley." We construe that deed, not as an impeachment of the alley, but as a confirmation of it, and we think it was so considered at the time it was made, by the parties thereto.

[5] Such being the condition of the alley and the attitude of the parties towards it in 1891, we are interested in discovering how the cigar store got in there in 1892. Did the Staeds put it there with the intention to permanently hold the strip as their own? We are justified in drawing the inference that they were experienced in real estate matters. They knew the requirements as to building permits, and as to the illegality of wooden structures in that district. They do not seem to have regarded that structure as of sufficient importance to require a conformity with the law as to it. It must have cost very little to construct it, and it rented for $10 a month. Lucas is dead. Patrick M. Staed, a former sheriff of St. Louis, who attended to the building of it on the part of the Staeds, is dead. Mr. John Staed, who testified for the defendant, did not even know who built it. He said: "My brother told me he got the shack built. That is all I know about it. I was treasurer and paid all the bills at that time. My opinion is I gave him the money to pay the men who built the shack there." On the other hand, Mr. Farley was a real estate man, had an office in the Lucas property, and was Lucas' agent. The Staeds had a real estate man, who, as their agent, collected all their rents except for this cigar store. The rent on that for about 12 years was collected by Farley, Lucas' tenant and agent. On that question Mr. John Staed testified: "Q. Who was managing that property then—handling it? A. I got the money out of the rents and paid the bills. I have been always getting the rents and tending to that property. We had Mr. McMenamy collect some rents and Mr. Brennan collect some, and Mr. Farley. Mr. Farley just collected for that cigar place. That was all he collected. He collected $10 a month, and gave it to me. He gave me $10 a month during a period of 12 or 13 years, I suppose. He charged a commission of 8 per cent. Q. Why did he collect for that and the others collect for the balance of your property? A. Well, Brennan had been collecting for the other offices there, and my opinion is that Mr. Farley asked me to give him some of our collections, and we commenced with that, I think." The fact that Farley was Lucas' tenant and agent and collected the rent on the cigar store while the rents of the Staed property were collected by another agent is a strong circumstance in favor of the inference that the cigar store was not built in opposition to Lucas, but with his consent and permission, at least. On the other hand, Mr. Staed stated only his "opinion" and what he "thought" as to what the facts were. Immediately following 1892 the west part of the alley was assessed to the Staeds, but not all of it until 1900. In 1894 the deed was made to the Staed Realty Company. It has been suggested that the reason the alley was mentioned in that deed was because the conveyancer followed former deeds by copying. In the statement of facts the descriptions in the various deeds of trust thereafter executed by the defendant are given. A comparison of those descriptions will show that the conveyancer did not always follow copy, but did always clearly call for the alley. In addition to those facts, the defendant acquired the south tract fronting 26 feet 2 inches on Ninth street in 1894. Its deed was not put in evidence, but about the same time it executed a deed of trust on its new purchase which called for the alley. If that alley got into that deed of trust purely as the result of copying, those experienced real estate men interested in the defendant company were surely the victims of their conveyances.

The claim is made by the appellant that the evidence shows that the part of the alley covered by the new building was prior to the construction of that building included in the defendant's yard. The evidence does not support such contention. Some parts of it are capable of that construction, but the whole of it taken together, including that of defendant's witnesses, shows that there was a fence between that part of the alley and defendant's yard. Up to the time when defendant prepared to build that new building just before this suit was begun, it had never pretended to claim that part of the alley.

We are driven to the conclusion from the facts that the beginning of the possession of the cigar store by the Staeds was originally with the permission of Lucas, and that such possession was not under any adverse claim of right until very shortly before this suit was brought. No possession can result in title by limitations, unless the same is under a claim of right or color of title. Bowman v. Lee, 48 Mo. 335; Fugate v. Pierce, 49 Mo. 441; Dalby v. Snuffer, 57 Mo. 294; Bradley v. West, 60 Mo. 33; Baber v. Henderson, 156 Mo. 566, 57 S. W. 719, 79 Am. St. Rep. 540; Heckescher v. Cooper, 203 Mo. 278, 101 S. W. 658.

The judgment is affirmed.

In examining the trial court's conclusions on the facts in an action to set aside a deed of trust, the reviewing court could consider the lapse of time, the discrepancy between the present testimony and that given on a former trial, and the fact that the changes made in the testimony conformed to the needs of the parties introducing the witnesses, as determined by the former decision.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Lafayette County; Sam Davis, Judge.

Suit by the First National Bank of Plattsburg against Bessie M. Renick and others. From judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

John A. Cross, of Lathrop, and J. W. Boyd, of St. Joseph, for appellants. W. S. Herdon, of Plattsburg, and Culver, Phillip & Spencer, all of St. Joseph, for respondent.

BLAIR, C. This is a suit to set aside a deed of trust executed June 25, 1898, by Emanuel S. Fry to his three children to secure notes amounting, with interest, to about $30,000. On the same day the deed of trust was executed, Fry conveyed all his other property, and the present plaintiff instituted an action against him, attaching the 220 acres of land covered by the deed now assailed. In that action there was judgment for defendant on the plea in abatement and for plaintiff on the merits. On plaintiff's appeal the judgment on the plea in abatement was reversed and the cause remanded, and on retrial the attachment was sustained. The land now involved was bought by plaintiff at execution sale under the judgment. The opinion of this court in that case (168 Mo. 492, 68 S. W. 348) states the facts as then proved, and it was there held the trial court might well have directed a verdict sustaining the attachment. On the trial of this case the principal evidence for defendants was given by the same witnesses who testified for defendant Fry in the attachment proceedings.

The action of this court in reversing the judgment and remanding the former case was in part predicated upon the conclusion that there was no evidence in the record (168 Mo. loc. cit. 514, 68 S. W. 348) tending to show there was any consideration for the notes secured by the deed of trust now sought to be set aside. The record disclosed that the notes mentioned depended for their consideration upon a note for $6,000 executed in 1874 by Emanuel S. Fry to his then wife for one-half the sale price of Virginia lands given the wife by her father. In that case it appeared the note was executed without any previous agreement respecting it, after the husband had reduced the proceeds of the lands to his possession. The evidence in the former case chiefly consisted of depositions, and these were offered in the present case in proof of the character of the testimony of the principal witnesses in the former case; they being also the principal witnesses in this case. As to what the character of that testimony was in the attachment proceedings, reference, for the sake of brevity, is made to the decision of this court in the attachment proceedings. In that case, on retrial, the circuit court directed a verdict sustaining the attachment, and no appeal seems to have been taken.

[1] It also appeared in evidence in the present case that in other cases instituted by other creditors of Fry the depositions of some of the witnesses had been taken, and that in no instance, prior to the institution of the present suit, had the testimony as to the facts indicating a want of consideration for the original $6,000 differed materially from that in the attachment proceedings first mentioned.

The evidence now discloses that some of the witnesses have a recollection of the circumstances under which the $6,000 note was executed and delivered entirely different from that they had when their testimony was previously taken. Under these circumstances the trial court refused to believe them and found for plaintiff, and defendants appealed.

[2] In First National Bank of Plattsburg v. Fry, 168 Mo. loc. cit. 513, 68 S. W. 354, it was said of the very transaction involved in this case that, "when the rights of creditors are involved, transactions like this between husband and wife are to be scrutinized with the most jealous care." It was further pointed out that the presumption was that the deed from Deyerle and wife to Mrs. Fry, and that from Fry and wife to Chapman, were acknowledged February 28, 1874, and that the presumption was these deeds were delivered on the day they were acknowledged, and therefore two days before the execution of the note from Emanuel S. Fry to his wife, which bore date March 2, 1874. Since defendants' position is that the trial court was wrong in finding from the evidence that the $6,000 note was without consideration, it becomes necessary to examine the evidence in this record.

That the character of the evidence before the trial court may be understood, excerpts therefrom may prove enlightening. J. D. Deyerle, one of defendants' principal witnesses, had testified in 1898 that the deed to Fry and wife from Deyerle, and the deed from Fry and wife to Chapman, were both acknowledged on the same day, and delivered on the day they were acknowledged. In 1907 he testified that the deeds were not delivered until two or three days after they were acknowledged. During his cross-examination the following occurred: "Q. You say to-day, nine years later, that you were mistaken when you made these answers to these questions, and you also say that you can give no reason for saying why your memory to-day is better than it was nine years ago: is that right? A. Only by my recollection, sir. Q. Now, the fact in the matter was this, Mr. Deyerle: You gave your testimony in 1898, and you know this case was tried after that, don't you? A. Yes, sir; I heard it. Q. You know from Mr. Fry that it was tried? A. Yes, sir. Q. Mr. Fry told you that the case went to the Supreme Court of Missouri, didn't he? A. Yes, sir. Q. And he told you that the Supreme Court of Missouri had reversed the decision, didn't he? A. Yes, sir. Q. And Mr. Fry told you that the Supreme Court, in reversing that decision, had held that there was no consideration for the note that was given by him to his wife, the $6,000 note referred to in your testimony, unless it could be shown that an agreement existed between him and his wife, before the note was executed, that the note was to be given in consideration of her deeding this land to Mr. Chapman, joining in the deed to Mr. Chapman. He told you that, didn't he, in substance? A. I don't exactly know the circumstances; something to that effect. Q. And he told you it was necessary to get evidence to that end, didn't he? (Objected to by counsel for defendants, because the defendants are not bound by any conversation he had with E. S. Fry.) Q. He told you that it was necessary to get evidence to that effect to show that this agreement existed between him and his wife before the deeds were executed, didn't he, in substance, sir? A. No, sir. Q. He didn't tell you that? A. No, sir. Q. Then they took your deposition over, didn't they? A. Next time they came. Q. That is the time that Mr. Fry came here and told you about what the Supreme Court had decided? A. Yes, sir. Q. When it became necessary to take your deposition over the second time, the Supreme Court had decided the case, hadn't it, sir? (Objected to as hearsay testimony.) A. I don't know. Q. You know it from what Mr. Fry told you? A. That they had reversed the case back? Q. And he told you the facts you said he told you? A. Yes, sir. Q. And then your deposition was taken the second time? A. Yes, sir. Q. And then when they took your deposition over the second time you changed your testimony from what it had been on the first trial? A. Yes, sir."

With reference to the same matter, the delivery of the deeds, etc., the same witness further testified: "Q. Didn't you say to me, on cross-examination, that Mr. Fry had explained to you that the Supreme Court of Missouri had reversed the judgment in the case of the Bank v. Fry, and explained to you why they had reversed it? Did you not make that admission yourself on your cross-examination? A. Yes, sir; I believe I did. Q. That is true, isn't it? A. Yes, sir. Q. Now, I say that it was after the time that Mr. Fry had explained to you the decision that you first made the statement that the two deeds we have been talking about were not delivered until three days after they were acknowledged? A. Yes, sir. Q. You had never made any such statement as that before? A. No, sir. Q. At that time you made the statement that they were delivered on the same day they were acknowledged, and you now say you were mistaken when you made that statement? A. Yes, sir. Q. When did your father make the deed to you for your share of this land? A. I have forgot that date now, sir. Q. About what time? A. The Franklin county land, you mean that division? Q. Yes. A. I think, sir, about six months after. Q. That is your recollection now that it was six months after? A. Yes, sir. Q. Don't you know it was two years after? A. No, sir. Q. Didn't you state in your deposition it was the 2d day of November, 1876? A. My deed? Q. Yes. A. I don't remember, sir. Q. You do not remember whether that was correct or not? A. Made the deed to me? Q. Yes, sir; you don't remember if that is correct or not? A. No, sir. Q. Why can't you remember a transaction of that kind, which was a business transaction in which you were interested, but you can remember the statement made by your sister to your brother-in-law 33 years ago—a transaction in which you were not particularly interested? A. I cannot say, only from my memory. Q. There was nothing particular to impress this transaction on your mind, was there? A. No, sir. Q. Now, what did your father say to you when he made the deed to you of your portion of the land? A. Just made me the deed; turned it over to me. Q. Don't you recall what he said to you at the time? A. No, sir. Q. And were you present when he made the deed to your sister, Mrs. Chapman, for her portion of the land? A. Yes, sir. Q. Do you remember what he said to her at that time? A. No, sir; I can't remember, sir. Q. The deed to Mrs. Chapman for her portion of the land and the deed to you for your portion of the land was made after the deed was made to Mrs. Fry for her portion of it? A. Yes, sir; it was. Q. Yet you don't recall what occurred when these deeds were made? A. Not exactly. Q. Yet you were personally interested in this matter? A. Yes; as far as my own deed. Q. You cannot recall those things, and you do recall the conversation between your sister and her husband when the deed was made to her? A. Yes, sir. Q. What else occurred on that day besides these transactions? A. You mean when the deed was made? Q. When the deeds were delivered and your sister remarked to her husband, 'Where is the note?' and her husband turned to you and asked if you could get him a blank note, etc., what other conversation occurred there on that day? A. I cannot recall, sir. Q. You don't recall anything else that occurred on that day? A. No, sir."

Henry S. Deyerle's deposition had been twice previously taken and in neither instance had he testified to any conversation between Fry and his wife indicating a previous agreement between them that Fry was to give his note to her in consideration of his receipt of the purchase money and notes for the Virginia lands. In this case he testified to such a conversation, but was unable to explain why he remembered it 33½ years after the transaction, when he failed to remember it on the occasions when his deposition was taken 6 and 10 years before his testimony in the present case was given.

The substance of the testimony of Henry S. Trout, so far as it was competent and admissible, was that on February 27, 1874, the day the deeds were drawn, he heard Mrs. Fry direct the conveyancer to make the notes or bonds Chapman was to give for the deferred payments payable to Emanuel S. Fry, saying she "had an understanding and agreement with him which was satisfactory to her as to the amount of the purchase money." According to Trout, this was Mrs. Fry's language, and he claimed to have a distinct recollection of it. His testimony was given 33 years after the alleged occurrence, and followed a conversation with E. S. Fry in regard to the matter. The witness remembered scarcely anything else which occurred at or near the date of the drafting of the deed. He was unable to remember the date of Mrs. Fry's marriage, though assigning his cousinly interest in her affairs as the reason the conversation to which he testified was impressed upon his memory. He was 65 years of age when his testimony was taken.

C. W. Chapman, testifying 33 years after the fact, claimed to remember seeing his grandfather, Benjamin Deyerle, hand to Mrs. Fry something at some time during the spring of 1874, and say to her that they were the papers to the Franklin county land. He did not remember that Mrs. Fry said anything at all on that occasion, though it was at that time, according to J. D. Deyerle, Mrs. Fry asked for and received the $8,000 note from her husband.

Emanuel S. Fry's deposition had been taken several times before the trial in this case. In his deposition taken in 1898, 24 years after the event, he testified concerning the happenings at the time of the allotment of the Virginia lands by his wife's father thus: "A. The land was all together, and it would have to be divided—about forty or forty-five hundred acres of land—into four different lots between four different children. Each one was to have one-fourth of the land, of course, I was to have my wife's, as she was one of the children. After talking a while, Mr. Chapman remarked, says, 'I will give you $12,000 for your part [my part] of the land.' I told him I didn't know anything about the price of land in that country; and Mr. Deyerle was sitting there in his seat. Of course, I didn't live out there, and didn't know the worth of land there. I just remarked to him I would leave it to Mr. Deyerle, knowing that I didn't know anything about what that land might be worth, property like that, whether I should take it or not—take the $12,000 or not. The old gentleman said—he just remarked: 'Fry, I believe that is a good price.' I told him 'All right.' Mr. Deyerle gave his decision. He said 'All right'; he would give it. I thought it was right, what they said; and they were to write out the deed—old Mr. Deyerle. Young David Deyerle was there."

In his testimony in this case he details an alleged conversation in which he, his wife, and his wife's father participated, in which the wife took the part he had assigned himself in his previous testimony, and in which she also stated that he (Fry) had agreed to give her his note for $6,000 for one-half the purchase price of the land. Trout, who was present, remembers the conversation quite differently.

Fry had previously testified, also, when asked, "Then why did you give her [his wife] your note?" as follows: "A. Because I thought it was right. Mr. Deyerle deeded it to both of us. He remarked, 'Had we better draw this deed to you?' She said: 'No; let Mr. Fry have half of it.' I had the deed recorded, wrote up, and I gave her my note for half of it."

In this case he details a conversation at the time of the delivery of the deeds, in which he makes it appear that the reason for his executing the $6,000 note was the alleged agreement at the time of the division of the land—a conversation which, it appears, he had not recalled until after this court handed down its opinion in the attachment proceedings.

The significance of the changes in the testimony of Fry and the Deyerles is considerable, when it is recalled that they were made after this court had held the $6,000 note without consideration because of its delivery, without previous agreement, after Fry's reduction to possession of the purchase money and notes given by Chapman for the land, and after Fry had advised these witnesses of the decision and of its purport.

In addition, neither Fry nor his children had ever treated the notes to the latter as an existing liability. He was made their guardian and curator about 1885, regularly settled his accounts as such, and as they became of age took from each of them a receipt in full of all sums in his hands due from him to them; and at no time during the pendency of this guardianship did he charge himself with the notes alleged to have been successively executed to them in renewal of the $6,000 note, though regularly making the usual affidavit to the effect that in his settlements he had charged himself with all moneys and property in his possession belonging to them. Further, Fry kept accounts against his children for sums advanced to or for them, charging them with a total of about $4,000, but crediting none of these charges on the notes to them. Had these credits been entered as of the dates they were charged in the account kept by Fry, the notes secured by the deed of trust here in question would have been most materially reduced. Again, the attitude of the children, after the deed of trust was executed and recorded, but ill consisted with the idea that they regarded the notes as valid and justly enforceable obligations. The land has been rented mainly to Mrs. Emanuel S. Fry (a second wife), and the proceeds and more, in excess of taxes and interest on the prior mortgage, have been expended in Fry's litigation with his creditors, though this is the first case in which the alleged interests of Fry's children have been directly assailed.

[3] In view of the rule heretofore mentioned and the character of the evidence in this case, as indicated above, the finding of the chancellor on the evidence, to the effect that the $6,000 note was executed without consideration, ought not be overturned. The lapse of time, the discrepancy between the testimony formerly given and that given at a later period, the fact that the changes made so exactly conformed to the needs of appellants, as pointed out by this court in its former decision, the fact that Emanuel S. Fry, who is the most active personage in all this litigation, reported the reversal to the Virginia witnesses and explained to some, at least, of them exactly what was needed to meet the decision, and that then he and these witnesses again gave their testimony with the very substantial changes necessary to support appellants' contention in this case, all these things are to be borne in mind when examining the accuracy of the trial court's conclusion as to the facts. The judgment should be and is affirmed.

KINCER v. KINCER et al.

(Supreme Court of Missouri. Division No. 2. Nov. 13, 1912. Rehearing Denied Dec. 10, 1912.)

1. DEEDS (§ 196*)—EXHIBITION—FATHER TO SON—UNDUE INFLUENCE—PRESUMPTIONS—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Where a father, nearly 93 years of age, nearly blind, and confined to his bed, conveyed all his real estate to the son with whom he was living and by whom he was being cared for, for a nominal consideration, and there were other children to whom no advancements were made, it will be presumed that the deeds were the result of undue influence, and the burden was on the grantee to show the contrary.

2. DEEDS (§ 211*)—VALIDITY—UNDUE INFLUENCE.

Evidence held to require a finding that deeds executed by a father to his son were the result of undue influence and invalid.

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; Moser N. Sale, Judge.

Action by Pearl Kincer against John Kincer and others to set aside certain deeds of real property. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

Martin Kincer on December 7, 1906, made two quitclaim deeds for two different tracts of real estate in the city of St. Louis to his son John Kincer. The father died January 13, 1908, and the plaintiff, his granddaughter, sued to set aside those deeds on the ground of undue influence. From a decree dismissing her bill, she has appealed.

Martin Kincer was 93 years of age when he died. He had been blind in one eye since early life, and the vision of the other eye had gradually faded until he was nearly blind. He was so deaf that it was necessary to get close to him and shout almost in his ear to make him hear. In January, 1903, he fell and broke his hip, and was thereafter confined to his bed until his death. It was necessary for him to take "physic," as a result of which his bed was sometimes made unclean. After the execution of the deeds in question, and in August, 1907, there was an inquiry in the probate court as to his sanity. The jury went to his house and asked him his reasons for making the deeds to John. He answered that he had done so because John had taken care of him for a number of years and had promised to take care of him as long as he lived. The jury unanimously found that he was of sound mind. The deeds were ordinary quitclaim deeds, expressed to be made in consideration of $10, and without any reservations or conditions. He had lived for many years in north St. Louis, and had been engaged in the wood business, and at one time had a grocery store. He had been out of business for 30 years. At the time of his retirement, he owned a double brick building at 2810 Broadway, in part of which he lived, and rented the other to a tenant. He also owned property on Ninth street, on which were three tenements, all rented for residences. Whether they were in separate buildings, or all in one building, does not clearly appear from the evidence. Up to the time of his death, the rents on that part of the property not occupied by himself and his son John were about $70 a month, running back for many years. His wife had died about 1888. His eldest son Abner, 64 years of age at the time of the trial, was married at 21 and went to himself; his father furnishing him $500 to go into the grocery business which was soon sold, and the money was repaid. Abner separated from his wife, who lived in one of his father's houses, paying rent with reasonable promptness. Abner's son, Arthur, testified that, soon after his grandfather was hurt, his aunt Amelia, the wife of his Uncle John, came to his mother's house, who was confined in bed, just recovering from an operation, and notified his mother that she would have to pay more rent or move. They had been paying $12, and it was raised to $14. There was no evidence of ill will between Abner and his father. Martin, Jr., another son, married in 1882 and was on a farm for five years, then came back to St. Louis. He seems never to have prospered. He was assisted in various ways by his father to the extent of about $2,500. He died in 1900, leaving a widow and six or seven children, three of whom are minors. There is no showing in the evidence that there were other than kind feelings between his family and his father. Sarah, a daughter, married young and died, leaving one son, Martin Cranford. Neither he nor his mother ever had any advancements, and there is no showing of ill will between Martin Kincer, Sr., and them. Mary, another daughter, was twice married, and subsequently lived with another man under questionable relations. She at various times received assistance from the father not amounting in all to more than $100. She testified in behalf of the defendant and stated that about 1895 her father told her that he had given the three oldest brothers all he ever intended to give them, and that he was not going to give her anything because she did not behave herself. In her evidence the following occurred: "Q. Do you know whether or not he made any advancements or had given anything to your other brothers? A. Yes, sir; I have heard him say so time and again, and I know of him advancing money to my brother Marty. Q. Do you know of his advancing money to any of your other brothers? A. No, sir; only what he said himself." William, the third son, married early in life and went to himself, always living in close vicinity to his father. About 1882 he built a house next door to his father and lived there until his death in 1900. About the time of John's marriage, the sister Mary came home to her father's, and the father wanted the use of Will's buggy to bring up Mary's trunk, and it was refused. The father built a spite fence between him and William, and William's children put up a flag by the fence with the word "rats" on it. In a few years the fence was taken down. There was more or less intermittent visiting between William's family and his father. There were never any advancements made to William or his family. He left a widow and four children, of whom the plaintiff is one. They are all self-sustaining, but earn their living by work; one of them being a member of the police force. John, the youngest son, and the principal defendant herein, was 51 years old at the time of the trial. He lived in his father's home all his life. He was married about 1890. He has had five children, or whom three are living. Immediately after John's marriage, his father gave him all the household goods, and John testified that after that time his father never had any personal property. There was evidence tending strongly to prove that John was never in any business prior to the making of the deeds except to do the repair work for his father and occasionally odd jobs for neighbors.

In the proceeding in the probate court concerning the sanity of his father, John's deposition was taken, and it was read on the trial by the plaintiff. In that deposition he said, speaking of his father: "Q. When did he own any personal property? A. He did before I was married. Q. And you are positive that within the last 10 years he has not owned a bit of personal property? A. Not a penny. Q. Nothing at all? Did he have any horses or wagons, or anything of that nature? A. No, sir. Q. Have you been engaged in business ever since you were married? A. No, sir. Q. Have you been engaged in business for the last 10 years? A. No, sir. Q. And since you were married you say he has had no personal property? A. No, sir; not since the day after I was married. Q. Since that time he has had no personal property at all? A. No, sir. Q. From the very first day you were married, he has owned no personal property at all? A. The second day he didn't; the first day we didn't get settled down. Q. When you were married, where did you settle down? A. Right there in the house. Q. 2810 North Broadway? A. Yes, sir. Q. On the second day after you were married, what did he give you? A. The household goods; household property. Q. What did he ever do with the real estate that he owned? A. What did he ever do with it? Q. Yes. A. I bought it down here on the 7th day of December, 1906. Q. You bought it from your father? A. Yes, sir. Q. What did you give him for it? A. $10. Q. Did you give him the actual money? A. Yes, I gave it to him, and he turned around and gave it to the little boy; said he didn't have any use for it. Q. What little boy? A. My son."

And also in regard to the real estate and his own employment he said: "Q. How did he happen to transfer to you? A. Because he said he couldn't be bothered with people running to him, and he wanted me to take it and do just as I pleased with it; sell it or keep it, just as I pleased. He wanted me to sell at once, but I told him I wouldn't; that I would keep it as long as he lived. Q. And you never asked him to turn it over to you? A. No, sir; he had often said he wanted me to take the property; that he wanted me to have it, and he couldn't be bothered with it. Q. When did he say that? A. Since he was in bed; anyway, since he got hurt, and before that; I kept telling him 'No.' Q. Up until December, 1906, this property has been bringing in a rental of about $70 a month, hasn't it? A. Somewhere around there; that is, if we got it all. Q. That is, it averaged around there? A. Yes. Q. That would be about $700 or $800 a year? A. Yes. Q. And that has been going on for the last 10 years? A. Yes. Q. What became of all that money? A. Used it for repairs, for streets, all sorts of things; all work necessary to be done around—lumber, bricks, anything needed for repairs for the streets. Q. Do you mean to convey the idea that all the money taken in in rent has been used in repairing the buildings and in fixing up the streets? A. Not all of it; most all of it. Q. None of that money has been used to support the old gentleman? A. None to amount to anything, only once in a while we have some spare money and buy him something with it; sometimes get him some underclothes, such as that. Q. None of that money has been used to maintain your family? Your own household? A. It might be a little; not much of it; very little. Q. You have collected that money yourself? A. Yes, sir. Q. For your father up to the time of this transfer? A. Yes, sir. Q. Have you kept any record of what you took in? A. No, sir. Q. How long have you been in the business? Have you been in business during all of the last 10 years? A. I have been working around at building, patching up—odd jobs and so on. Q. What do you mean by that? A. Carpenter work. Q. How long have you been in saloon business? You say you are in the saloon business now? A. Yes, sir; going on six months. Q. Prior to that time you were in the carpenter business? A. Yes, sir. Q. You have followed the carpenter business, with the exception of the last six months, for the last 10 years? A. No, no; not for the last 10 years. Q. How long have you followed the carpenter business? A. About two years. Q. Prior to that time what did you do? A. Patched around for the neighbors, and did my own work; patching up around on the property where it needed it. Q. How long did you work around that way? A. About 20 years, I guess; maybe 25 years. Q. In that way, how much did you make a month? A. A month? Q. Yes. A. I can't tell about that; when I worked at carpenter work I got $23 a week, when I worked steady. Q. Working for yourself? A. Not working around; when I worked steady. Q. I don't mean when you were working steady. You say for about 10 years you were working around at patching for yourself? A. For the old man. Q. For your father? A. Yes, sir. Q. How long did that last? A. Up until the day I got it for myself. Q. And since you have been engaged in the saloon business also? A. No, sir. Q. Then the only real income you ever did make was at carpenter work? A. Yes. Q. And that's about three years ago? A. Yes. Q. You worked how long at the carpenter business steady? A. About a year, I guess, off and on. Q. How much did you make a week? A. About $23 a week; I worked off and on for a year; I guess I made about eight months out of it all. Q. So for eight months that you worked as a carpenter you got $23 a week? A. Yes, sir. Q. And you have now been in the saloon business about six months? A. Yes. Q. Have you made a large amount of money in the saloon business? A. No; I don't even make good wages out of it. Q. There is not much doing, then, in the saloon business? A. No; there's not much doing in the saloon business. Q. When were you married; what did you have outside of what your father gave you? A. I didn't have anything except my clothes and some few little things. Q. And 10 years ago, what property did you have? A. Nothing more than I had before. Q. Did your wife, when you were married, have any money? A. No, sir. Q. And as a matter of fact, with the exception of the eight months that you worked as a carpenter, you have really lived out of your father's rents, have you not? A. No, sir. Q. How did you live then, if you didn't live out of the money received from the rents? A. I used my own money for food bills and such things as that. Q. It appears from your statement that for almost nine years you worked for your father? A. I worked for him as long as he was able to be around and take care of his business. Q. Where did you get the money to live on? A. Where did I get it? Q. Yes. A. Well, I got along with what little I made working around, and what little he gave me. Q. That's the point I want to bring out, that, as a matter of fact, you and your wife have lived off the income of the property? A. No, we didn't; I made money working around, patching and so on. Q. So you don't mean to convey that you have not made any money for the last nine years. A. I made money working around for the neighbors and other people, patching up and fixing up things for them. Q. How much money a week or month did you make working around in this way? A. I can't tell you; I don't know exactly; all I know is I done the old man's work and my own work and I worked for the neighbors, patching up and fixing up for them at odd times, whenever I had anything to do. Q. Estimate in your own way how much you made a week? A. About $8 or $10, sometimes $6, sometimes as much as $20; I can't tell you just how much I did make. Q. How large a family have you? A. I have three children. Q. How old is the oldest child? A. Going on 19—no, going on 18. Q. How young is the youngest one? A. Eleven years old. Q. Have you dead children too? A. Yes, sir. Q. How many? A. Two. Q. You have had five children altogether? A. Yes, sir. Q. Now, for the past 10 years, your father's estate has been under your management and control? A. Yes, sir. Q. And during this period of time you have had charge of everything? A. Yes, sir. Q. Now, for the past five years, he has not been out of the house, directing and taking care of anything? A. No, sir."

Yet, after testifying as above in the deposition he testified on the trial as follows: "Q. You were questioned in your deposition regarding your employment during your entire life: Did you ever work? A. Yes, sir. Q. What occupation? A. Railroad, carpentering, and machinist. Q. What railroad did you work for? A. St. Louis, Kansas City & Northern, now the Wabash. Q. How long did you work for them? A. Pretty nearly 18 or 14 years."

It his deposition, the defendant stated that his father gave to the notary, Mr. Hauschulte, at the time the deeds were acknowledged, his reasons for making the deeds as follows: "Q. Did Mr. Hauschulte come down to the house? A. He came down to the house; yes. Q. And he saw your father attach his mark to this deed? A. Yes, sir. Q. And it was after that that you gave him the $10? A. I gave him the $10 while Hauschulte was having the deeds made out. I told Mr. Hauschulte to come down to the house; that the old man wanted to see him. When he come there at the house, the old man told him that he wanted me to have the property; that he wasn't able to handle the business; people running there to rent it or to buy it, and he couldn't handle it and didn't want to be bothered with it. He said he wanted me to have it and do as I pleased with it, and told Mr. Hauschulte to make out the deeds. Q. So Mr. Hauschulte went to make out the deeds? A. Yes. Q. But while he was making out the deeds you gave the $10 to your father? A. Yes, sir. Q. And then he gave it to the little boy? A. Yes, sir. Q. And then Mr. Hauschulte brought down the deeds? A. No, he sent for me—he sent for me and I went to his office, and he said he would have the deeds there in a couple of days. And when he fetched them there, the old man signed them."

During the examination of Mr. Hauschulte, the following occurred: "The Court: He didn't say anything concerning the reason why he was transferring all of this property to John? A. No, sir." While not asked especially about it, Mr. Hauschulte's evidence clearly showed that he drew the deeds at John Kincer's direction, and that he did not see John's father about it until the deeds were acknowledged. In his testimony at the trial, in regard to his father's reasons for making the deeds, John Kincer said: "Q. What did your father say to you about that? A. He said to me, 'John, about the will, we had better make a deed and be sure that the will don't get destroyed, for them people next door,' he said, 'are mean enough to do anything.' That is exactly what he said. 'They are dirty enough to do anything,' he said. 'Them people will do anything to make away with that will, and the best thing we can do is to call Hauschulte and let him make a deed so they won't bother you.' Q. What did you say? A. I said I thought the will was just as good as the deed, and he said they might make away with it and it get destroyed, and he said, 'You tell Mr. Hauschulte to come up in the morning and I will make out a deed,' and I went next morning and told Mr. Hauschulte."

The first will was made about 1895, and the second on September 25, 1903. Mr. Hauschulte wrote them both. He could not state what the contents of the first will were. He stated that it was destroyed when the last was written, and the last one was left in his charge until the death of the testator. Mr. Maune, who witnessed both wills, testified that their contents were the same.

It was conceded at the trial that Martin Kincer, Sr., kept a book in which he set down the amounts furnished his children by him. That book shows about $2,500 furnished Martin, Jr., most of which was before 1896. After that the amounts furnished him gradually diminished until they ceased in 1898, and the book did not show anything furnished any of the children after that year. That book did not show that any of the children except Martin, Jr., and Mary had received anything. John and his wife had charge of the father and personally cared for him until his death, and they were kind and attentive to him.

McShane & Goodwin, of St. Louis, for appellant. Walther & Muench, of St. Louis, for respondents.

ROY, C. (after stating the facts as above). We have no difficulty in finding that Martin Kincer was sane when the deeds were made. But that is all that can be said in support of the deeds in controversy. Owing to his old age and afflictions, he was a prisoner in his own house. He was kindly treated, but John had full dominion over his body and over the management of his property and its income.

[1] The law raises a presumption that the deeds were the result of his undue influence over his father, and calls upon him to explain that they were not the result of such undue influence. In the absence of such explanation, the presumption becomes absolute. The defendant has utterly failed to make a satisfactory explanation.

[2] The claim is made that the other children were a burden to their father, and that John was the only one who was a comfort to him. None of the other children was very successful in life. Martin was almost constantly in need of assistance, and got more or less of it down to about 1898. Mary had received about $100. Abner, Sarah, and William were under no pecuniary obligation to their father in the way of advancements. All the other children had, early in life, passed out of the home nest. John alone remained at home. There is no escaping the conclusion from the evidence that his father financially supported him all his life; that support being supplemented to a very limited extent by John's income from odd jobs. That is clearly shown by his own evidence. In comparison with what he received, even Martin, Jr., got very little. The storms beat heavily upon the heads of his brothers and sisters, but John was always safely sheltered "in his father's house." From a financial standpoint, there was no cause for such conveyances. The income of the property was more than sufficient to pay for his support and care, even after his affliction.

In Martin v. Baker, 135 Mo. loc. cit. 505, 36 S. W. 372, property was transferred to a child in consideration of support. The income of the property was sufficient for that purpose. The court said: "That the contract thus secured was most unreasonable and unfair cannot be doubted. From the character of the contract, the relationship of the parties, and the mental condition of the grantor, considered alone, we would be bound to draw the inference that improper influences were brought to bear in securing the deed." In that case there was a provision for a forfeiture in case of a failure to support the grantor. Not so here. No rights were reserved. John could have sold the property at once; and then, with one reckless investment of the proceeds, all might have been over and the grantor a pauper. In the making of those deeds, only John was cared for. The father and his other children were ignored. It is claimed that the deeds were made because of coolness between the grantor and the family of his son William and because of the bad conduct of Mary. The coolness that existed 20 years before was caused by the fact that the father did not think that William was at that time kind enough to Mary. He surely did not disinherit Mary on account of her misbehavior, and also disinherit William's family because William was not kind to Mary. In any event, that furnishes no reason why he should repudiate his other children.

John acquired the entire management of his father's property about 10 years before the latter's death, and it was just about that time that the father ceased to aid any of his children. The book of advancements shows that fact. His father was not then crippled, and needed no special care, yet his income was all appropriated by John; he of course, paying the necessary expenses. At that time there was a will, which was written about 1896. We presume that it was different from the will of 1903, because it is not reasonable to presume that it would be destroyed and replaced by a duplicate of it. After being injured in January, 1903, he made a will in September of that year, giving everything to John, and then followed the making of the deeds in 1906. The defendant gave several different explanations as to why those deeds were made. In his deposition he stated that his father made the deeds to him because he did not want to be bothered with it. On the trial he stated that the reason his father gave for making the deeds was because the people next door were mean enough to do anything, and that they might make away with the will. That is a very different reason from the other, and moreover it is irrational. The will was in the keeping of Mr. Hauschulte, and there was no reason to suppose that William's family could get control of it.

The law does justify a parent in favoring one child over another in the gift of property. It permits him to obey the dictates of his affections in that matter; and such parental affection is no mark of undue influence. Those are rules guarded with great care by this court, but they stand side by side with the presumption above spoken of. If the parent is free, he may prefer one child over another of equal merit, giving no reason therefor. But whenever one of his children has the care and management of his property, any preference given to such child during such relation must be shown to be of the utmost fairness. Street v. Goss, 62 Mo. loc. cit. 229. In that case it was said: "There exists, therefore, no necessity to show fraud or imposition practiced upon him who bestows the confidence; but simply to show that, during the pendency of such intimate relations, the conveyance in question was made." In Hall v. Knappenberger, 97 Mo. loc. cit. 511, 11 S. W. 239, 10 Am. St. Rep. 337, it was said: "If, in such circumstances, a gift of any considerable value be bestowed by the one who reposes confidence upon the one in whom confidence is reposed, such gift is presumptively void. The burden is cast upon the recipient of the gift; and it belongs to him to show the absolute fairness and validity of the gift, and that it is entirely free from the taint of undue influence." In this case, in addition to being his father's agent, John was his nurse. It was held in Dingman v. Romine, 141 Mo. loc. cit. 475, 42 S. W. 1087, that there is no relation between men more calculated to make the will of one subservient to that of the other than the relation of patient and nurse. That relation existed between John and his father in addition to the fiduciary relation.

We cannot do otherwise than stamp with our disapproval the transaction here involved, and we reverse the decree and remand the cause, with directions to enter a decree in favor of the plaintiff.

DAMAN v. REMME et al.

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 1.
Nov. 30, 1912.)

1. DEEDS (§ 120*)—TITLE CONVEYED—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Evidence held to support a finding that the grantee in a warranty deed conveying in fee the legal title to the entire property described, though the beneficial interest of the grantor was only an undivided third interest, acquired the beneficial interest in the entire property, in view of the agreements of the parties in interest.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1011*)—FINDINGS—CONCLUSIVENESS.

A finding on conflicting evidence will not be disturbed, though the Supreme Court doubts its correctness.

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; Virgil Rule, Judge.

Action by William Daman against Charles T. Remme, executor, and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

This is an action at law, instituted in the circuit court of the city of St. Louis, by the plaintiff against the defendants for the partition and sale of certain real estate situate in said city, particularly described in the pleadings.

The facts of the case are few, and all but one of them, which will be presently noted, are undisputed.

A trial was had which resulted in a judgment for the defendants, denying partition, and after taking the proper preliminary steps therefor the plaintiff appealed the cause to this court.

The undisputed facts are as follows: The plaintiff and his son, John Daman, some years prior to the institution of this suit, bought the lot in controversy for the sum of $2,000, paying $1,000 of the purchase money in cash, the balance thereof remaining a lien thereon, and for their common convenience the title thereto was taken in the name of John; that subsequently the plaintiff and his said son sold an undivided one-third interest therein to the defendant Charles T. Remme, the legal title still remaining in John; that after selling the first one-third interest to Chas. T. Remme they improved the property by constructing thereon three dwelling houses, and placed all of them in the hands of said defendant, who collected the rents, paid the taxes, interest, and repairs; that in order to pay for the construction of the houses three loans, secured by mortgage, aggregating $7,500, were placed upon the property; that the property, at the date of the trial, including the improvements, was worth between $10,000 and $12,000; that some four years thereafter John sold his remaining interest in said lot to said defendant, and by deed in proper form conveyed to the latter the legal title to the entire property, including (without authority to so do, as is claimed by plaintiff) the one-third interest therein which plaintiff claims still belongs to him.

This claim of ownership by plaintiff is denied by defendants; they declaring that the defendant Chas. T. Remme purchased said one-third interest from the plaintiff in the manner to be presently stated. That fact is the disputed question in this case, as before mentioned.

In order to sustain the issues on behalf of the plaintiff, he testified in his own behalf, in substance, as follows: That in the month of March, 1900, he and his son John purchased of the defendant Chas. T. Remme 250 shares of the capital stock of the St. Louis Gasoline Motor Company for the consideration of $4,000, paid for in the following manner: John, in order to pay for his interest in said shares of stock, conveyed by the deed last mentioned, though absolute in form only, his one-third interest in said real estate to said Chas. T. Remme, and that he (the plaintiff) and his wife, in payment of his interest in said stock, executed to said Remme their promissory note for $2,000. That said transaction took place in Remme's office, and that the stock was then and there delivered to them, and that they there delivered the deed and note to Remme. That while John conveyed the fee to the entire property to Remme it was stated at the time, and understood and agreed to by all of them, that the deed was to convey only the one-third interest owned by John, and that plaintiff was to retain his one-third interest therein; also that Remme verbally agreed to hold said one-third interest for the use and benefit of the plaintiff.

John Daman, the son of the plaintiff, was called as a witness for plaintiff; and while his memory was poor, and he could remember but little at first as to what occurred at the time of the transaction, later, however, being recalled, his memory was better, and his testimony substantially corroborated that of the plaintiff. He also testified that he signed the $2,000 note with his father, which fact was denied by both father and son on first examination.

This was all the evidence introduced by plaintiffs.

The defendant Dr. Charles T. Remme, since deceased, in order to make out the defense, testified, in substance, as follows (this statement of the defendant's evidence, after a careful verification of the same with the record, is taken substantially from the statement of the case made by counsel for defendants): That he had managed the said property for about three years prior to March, 1900, and up to that time had advanced $3,040 more than he had collected on account of the property; that at the time plaintiff and his son made overtures regarding the purchase of his shares in the St. Louis Gasoline Motor Company there was an outstanding indebtedness on the property of $6,750, secured by deeds of trust, $212 due on past-due interest notes, and $3,040 due him for advances, making a total of $10,002; that he explained this indebtedness to plaintiff, and told him that he did not think the property was worth over $12,000; that he was willing to sell his Motor Company shares for the interest of plaintiff and his son in the real estate and a note for $2,000, signed by plaintiff, his wife, and son; that this proposition was accepted, and the papers were drawn accordingly; that the plaintiff and his son attended to the preparation and execution of the deed, and the defendant attended to the drafting of the note; that in pursuance of this agreement he delivered the stock to plaintiff and his son, and they executed and delivered to him their joint note for $2,000, dated March 7, 1900, and plaintiff's son and wife executed and delivered to him a warranty deed, conveying to him the full fee-simple title to the Shaw avenue property.

Defendant also testified that he had been in the exclusive possession and control of the property, claiming it as his own, since March 7, 1900, the time when the above transaction was closed; that after that date he did not consult with plaintiff regarding the management or repairing of the property, nor render to him any statement or account; that from March 7, 1900, until February, 1908, plaintiff did not make any inquiry regarding the property, nor ask for a statement or accounting, or claim any interest therein; that in the month of February, 1908, plaintiff called upon defendant and demanded that he account to plaintiff for his alleged share of the property, and that he convey to plaintiff such share; that he thereupon stated to plaintiff that he (plaintiff) had no interest in the property; that it was owned exclusively by defendant; and that he would not recognize plaintiff's claim.

Mr. Charles N. Noble, an attorney practicing at the St. Louis bar, testified that he had represented Dr. Remme in this transaction, and had prepared the note for $2,000 and attended to its execution; that William Daman, his wife, Maggie Daman, and his son, John H. Daman, called at his office and signed it; that plaintiff and his son said, in substance, at that time that this note for $2,000 was given in settlement of a balance then due to Dr. Remme, after plaintiff and his son had given to defendant a deed.

William P. Bently and Sullivan & Wallace, all of St. Louis, for appellant. Rassieur, Schnurmacher, Rassieur & Kammerer, of St. Louis, for respondents.

WOODSON, J. (after stating the facts as above). There are a number of legal propositions stated and discussed by counsel in their briefs for the respective parties to this action, most of which are questions of procedure; but the view we have taken of the case renders it unnecessary for us to consider any question of procedure.

[1] As previously stated, there is but one disputed fact in this case, and that one is: Was it the intention and agreement of the parties to the transaction in question that the warranty deed from John Daman, dated March 7, 1900, purporting, on its face, to convey to Charles R. Remme a fee-simple title to the entire property described therein (the property in controversy), should convey to him only the undivided one-third interest therein which belonged to grantor therein?

That question was fairly and squarely presented to the trial court, without the aid of a jury, and, after hearing the evidence introduced by the respective parties to the action, it decided that question against the plaintiff.

After a careful reading of all the evidence presented by the record upon that question, we are fully satisfied that the finding of the court is sustained by a clear preponderance of the evidence; and that the finding and judgment of the trial court was correct.

The memory of both the plaintiff and that of his son John was poor, and their testimony was hesitating, doubting, incoherent, and contradictory, wanting in weight and destitute of conviction; while that for the defendants was clear, positive, and unequivocal, carrying conviction of its truthfulness to all who heard or read it.

[2] In addition to that, the judge who tried the case had the witnesses before him, observed their demeanor upon the witness stand, and heard their testimony as it fell from their lips, and consequently was in a much better position to weigh their evidence and pass upon the credibility thereof than this court is.

Under those circumstances, even though this court should doubt the correctness of the finding of the trial court, we would not feel justified in disturbing that action of the court without a stronger showing was made than is here presented by this record.

Under such circumstances, even in equity cases, we differ largely to the findings of the chancellor, and rarely disturb his findings, except where the findings are against the great weight of the evidence. Huffman v. Huffman, 217 Mo. 182, 117 S. W. 1.

Finding no error in the record, the judgment is affirmed. All concur.

SMITH et al. v. MACK.

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. Dec. 23, 1912.)

1. USURY (§ 113*)—ELEMENTS—BURDEN OF PROOF.

The burden is upon the party pleading usury to prove that excessive interest was paid to the lender, or that a bonus or commission was paid to the lender's agent with his knowledge, or under circumstances from which his knowledge will be implied, which commission when added to the interest would exceed the lawful rate.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Usury, Cent. Dig. §§ 308-323; Dec. Dig. § 113.*]

2. USURY (§ 57*)—ELEMENTS—AGENT OF BORROWER.

The payment of a bonus by a borrower to his own agent for procuring a loan does not make the transaction usurious.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Usury, Cent. Dig. §§ 128, 129; Dec. Dig. § 57.*]

3. USURY (§ 117*) — SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Evidence, in a foreclosure action on secured notes given for a loan, wherein the defense was usury, held to sustain findings that the person to whom the bonus was paid for procuring the loan was the borrower's own agent, and that neither the lender nor any one acting for him received any bonus.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Usury, Cent. Dig. §§ 328-340; Dec. Dig. § 117.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Greene County; Chas. D. Frierson, Judge.

Action by C. A. Mack against J. A. Smith and others. From a decree for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

C. A. Mack brought this suit against appellants to recover $10,642.50 on two promissory notes and interest, and to foreclose a mortgage upon lands in Greene and Poinsett counties, given to secure the payment thereof. The answer admits the execution of the notes and mortgage and pleads usury in bar of the recovery, alleging that appellee agreed to make said loan, charging interest at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum from date until paid and an additional sum of $1,000 as bonus for the forbearance and use of the money, which was paid to his agent and attorney, who delivered the amount of the loan to appellants; the money having been deposited by Mack with his said agent, D. J. Beauchamp, and the said Mack having full knowledge and consenting for his said agent to demand and receive said $1,000. Alleged further that the notes sued upon are void for usury, and the mortgage likewise, and prays that the same be surrendered up and cancelled and the cloud upon their title removed.

It appears from the testimony that appellants had been trying to procure a loan of about the sum of money which they finally borrowed, with which to purchase certain lands in Greene and Poinsett counties, the acreage of which had not been exactly determined; that J. A. Smith had offered to pay any one who would procure them the loan of the amount, upon five years' time, $1,000 for the service; that G. W. Cox had been attempting to procure the loan, but none of them had succeeded in doing so. J. A. Smith testified: That he had been in Memphis, trying to negotiate the loan, and it occurred to him that he could procure it from C. A. Mack. That he went to him upon his return from Memphis, told him he desired the loan for the purpose of buying certain lands, which were worth $10 or more per acre; that he would secure the loan by mortgage upon the lands, and, in addition, upon the farm of one of the appellants, Virginia Thompson, in Greene county. That Mack intimated that he was favorable to the proposition and, after an hour's absence, returned, when they had another conversation. Mack said he had investigated the matter a little during the time, and one or two people told him it was a good loan, and he said further: "'I understand, Joe, that you have offered a bonus of $1,000 to anybody that will loan you this money.' I looked at him a short time, long enough to get his expression, and saw that he knew something about this $1,000, and I told him, 'Yes.' He said: 'That $1,000 looks good to me, and, if I make the loan, you will have to give it to me.' I told him, 'All right.'" That thereafter Mack went to the bank to make the necessary arrangements, returned, and said the money would be forthcoming when the title was approved by Mr. Beauchamp, who was not then in the city. That it was arranged that evening or the next morning that Beauchamp, in Mack's behalf, and Williams, in behalf of his associates, should go to Harrisburg and investigate the title of the land that was about to be purchased. That they went there. George Cox informed the witness that Beauchamp had telephoned from Harrisburg for him to tell Williams to have the $1,000 placed in the bank and inform him by phone that it had been done, or that matters at that end of the line would not be fixed up. This was done. Witness made no arrangement with Mack about how the $1,000 should be paid, and at no time had he had any conversation with Beauchamp about this $1,000, or asked him to assist him in procuring the loan. The next day the notes and mortgages were executed and delivered in Mr. Beauchamp's office, the check for the $1,000 having been first turned over to him. That witness had never made any agreement with Beauchamp, nor had any conversation with him, relating to any compensation to be paid to him for procuring the loan, and in answer to this question said:

"Q. Did you know who was getting the $1,000 at the time you were making the check to Beauchamp? A. Mr. Mack was the man I was paying this money to, and the reason I gave it to Beauchamp was that Mack told me that Beauchamp was his attorney and would attend to the matter for him, and that is why I gave the check to Beauchamp. Otherwise I would have given it to Mr. Mack." Witness said further that he had never had any conversation with Cox at any time, in which he was told that Beauchamp would procure the loan and that he must be paid for it. The lands were purchased and the deed of conveyance made to C. A. Mack, for a consideration of $10,642.50. He later, for the same consideration, made a quitclaim deed to appellants at the time of the execution of the mortgage.

J. W. Williams, another appellant, testified: That the lands were purchased from J. H. Vandever, for something in excess of $10,600, and the title was taken in the name of C. A. Mack. That he went to Harrisburg to close out the trade with Beauchamp, who gave Vandever his personal check to cover the consideration. It was witness' understanding that they were to pay Mack $1,000 additional, to be embodied as a part of the principal in the mortgage, and he did not understand until after he returned from Harrisburg that the transaction had been arranged otherwise. He then joined with the others in executing a note for $1,000, but did not know to whom the money realized thereon had been paid. That he represented the firm when he went with Mr. Beauchamp to look up the titles and supposed that Mr. Beauchamp represented Mack. Did not remember that Beauchamp said anything about who he represented. That he did not represent witness, and that he had never spoken to him about representing him, nor with his associates, nor agreed to pay him anything, nor had he spoken to him about procuring a loan from Mack. This witness admitted that he had offered a bonus to other parties if they would get the money for appellants, but that he had never had any conversation with Mack or Beauchamp in regard thereto, and could not recall any conversation with Mack to the effect that he refused to make the loan after reconveying the lands for the additional $1,000. He understood Mack to refuse to make the loan because it had originally been for five years, but consented to do so if it was to be for one and two years. He denied that Cox had any conversation with him, in which he stated that he thought Beauchamp could get the loan if he would pay him $1,000 to do so, and also that he had any conversation in his office, or Cox's, in which Cox told him the $1,000 they put up goes to Beauchamp. The only thing said about $1,000 in his presence was that they were paying Clyde Mack $1,000 more than he was paying for the land. That he knew nothing of what became of the $1,000 other than what they told him. He had never employed Cox to represent him. He acknowledged he and his associates were ready to pay any one $1,000 that secured money for them, and he believed the bonus was to be included in the principal and mortgage.

Wright also denied any conversation with Cox, in which he had been informed that they could procure the loan through Beauchamp by paying him (Cox) $1,000.

Mack testified: That he had not employed Beauchamp in this or any other matter as his agent, and he made the deal to loan the money with Beauchamp. That he never got any part of the $1,000 paid to Cox and Beauchamp for procuring the loan, and answered further, as follows: "Q. Did you ever have any understanding, tacit or expressed, in any way, that you were to have any part of it? A. Most emphatically not. Q. Have you ever received any part of it from Mr. Cox, or me? A. Not a penny." He said first the appellants wanted the money for five years, and he felt that was too long a time, and afterwards, when Beauchamp came to see him about it, he agreed to let them have it on two years' time. The check covering the consideration for the land was given by Beauchamp personally, because the exact acreage was not known at the time Beauchamp and Williams departed for Harrisburg, and the title was taken in witness' name to protect him until the mortgage was executed. He denied ever having had any conversation with Smith relative to the making of the loan about the bonus, and said it was first broached to him by G. W. Cox, about three weeks before the loan was made. In this conversation, Cox said they would give $2,000 personal security and a bonus of $500 in addition to secure the loan. He rejected this and all other propositions after he learned that this would be usurious, and said J. A. Smith had called on him 25 or 30 times before the loan was procured to see if some arrangement could not be made which was satisfactory. He told him if he could get things on a satisfactory basis he could make the loan, and thought he could get the money, if he could cash his time deposits at the bank. This was all he ever said to appellant about getting the money from the bank. That he agreed with Mr. Beauchamp to make the loan on Saturday night between 7 and 9 o'clock, and it was closed on Monday or Tuesday following. That he saw the bank on Monday and made the arrangement that he could draw the money at that time. That, ordinarily, he would have given them a few days' notice before drawing such a large amount, but did not on this, as the deal went on through then. He did not see the bank as stated by Wright at the time. He told Beauchamp he would make the loan at the time the deal was closed. He could only recall one instance when an attorney other than Beauchamp did anything for him during four or five years before he was testifying. That he had submitted both the propositions of $1,000 and a purchase and resale of the lands at an advanced price of that purchase proposed by appellants to Beauchamp, and, upon discovering that it would be usurious, had declined to have anything further to do with the loan. About a week before the deal was consummated, he offered to lend the money for one year, to be secured by a mortgage on the lands bought and on Mrs. Thompson's farm. He denied any conversation with J. A. Smith on Saturday before making the loan, and stated the only proposition advanced by Smith or any of the other appellants had been rejected by him. Beauchamp told him the night of the loan that he represented the appellants. Witness never received anything either directly or indirectly, other than the stipulated interest in the notes. He refused to make the loan on the basis proposed by appellants, because they wanted it for five years, and not until the time was reduced to one and two years would he agree to consider it. He was willing to accept Beauchamp's opinion as to the title to the land as a basis for the loan, and appellants never told him that Beauchamp was representing him, and he was not present when the papers were executed and delivered. During the time of the negotiations, he consulted with Beauchamp about the legal phase of the transaction, but all conversations related to matters that arose prior to the Saturday night conversation with Beauchamp, in which he dealt with him as the agent of appellants and agreed to make the loan.

Beauchamp testified that he was an attorney and advised Mack that to make a purchase and resell at an advance of $1,000 would be but a cover for usury, and G. W. Cox told him after that that appellants were not satisfied because the deal had fallen through. He suggested to Cox that, if the defendants would give them the $1,000 it was currently rumored would be paid to any one procuring a loan for them, he and Cox would attempt to do so. That Cox went to see the defendant's attorney about 7:30 Saturday evening and informed him that they would pay the money. Witness at once went to see Mack and, after suggesting various deals, all of which were rejected, finally induced him to agree to let them have the money on one and two years' time. Sunday morning, Cox informed him that appellants had accepted the terms and witness was to accompany Williams to Harrisburg to examine the records. Before their departure, witness had arranged with Mack that he should give his personal check for the consideration, which Mack promised to order paid. He further arranged with Cox to be assured the money would be paid over in the event the title was accepted. Having satisfied himself as to the title, he took a warranty deed from the vendors, to plaintiff, Mack, who in turn afterwards quitclaimed to defendants. That evening he delivered the deed to appellant Smith, who gave him a check for $1,000, one-half of which he paid to Cox. Further: "Q. Were you representing the defendants in getting this loan for them? A. I thought I was. I represented them either knowingly or unknowingly, I don't know which. I thought I was representing them, and I know they accepted what I did, and the deal went through just that way, and they paid me the $1,000, and Clyde Mack never had a cent of that money, or any other money of mine, except whatever store account I had down there. I have paid that just like anybody else does." Said further: That he had never been general attorney for Mack. That there was no understanding then, nor had there been, that he was his attorney. That he transacted some business for Mack, who did not have much business. On cross-examination, he stated that he made all arrangements with Cox, who stated he was representing appellants, which was borne out by the manner in which the arrangements were carried out. He took the title in Mack's name, at the time the land was bought, being fearful that appellants, if they got the title in their name, would refuse to pay the bonus. The only conversation he had with any of the appellants about the matter was on Sunday, and he remarked to Smith, "This is a big transaction, Joe, and I don't like to assume the responsibility of passing on the title." Smith replied that it was all right.

Cox testified that he was at first a partner with appellants, but dropped out about two weeks before the loan was procured. After he learned that Mrs. Thompson's farm would be included as security, he tried to get Mack to lend the money, but he refused when he found the transaction would be usurious. On Saturday night, in a conversation with Beauchamp, he said defendants were willing to pay the $1,000, and that he (Beauchamp) should try to get the money for them. Accordingly, Beauchamp induced Mack to make the loan, on one and two years' time, which terms the appellant accepted after some hesitancy. They understood that the $1,000 was to go to Beauchamp, who afterwards divided it with the witness. Witness did not represent Mack, nor did he give him any part of the $1,000. While Beauchamp was at Harrisburg, he telephoned witness to get up the money, which, as they then agreed, was later done. On cross-examination, he stated he told Smith, on his return from Memphis, that he could get the money from Mack; that he did not tell them he would procure it for them for $1,000; that his suggestion was gratuitous at the time; that he did not know whether any of them talked to Mr. Beauchamp and agreed to pay him any sum of money; that Beauchamp fixed up the papers for Mack. In reply to the question if he had not told one of the attorneys that Beauchamp was Mack's agent, and he represented appellants, he said: "You asked me that question, if me and Beauchamp were these people's agents, and I said you could call it anything you wanted to. They told me to get this money, if I could. Q. Did you not say this, 'I was these people's agent, and Beauchamp was Mack's agent'? Or did I not ask you if you were their agent and Beauchamp was Mack's agent, and you said, 'Yes, sir'? A. That may have been what I said. I don't know what arrangement Mr. Mack or Mr. Beauchamp had." He gave defendants to understand that the $1,000 for Beauchamp must be paid in cash. He had nothing to do with closing out the transaction.

Another witness testified that Smith was very anxious about the loan and came into the store to see Mack 12 or 15 times shortly before it was made; sometimes, several times a day. Another clerk testified about to the same effect.

The court rendered a decree for the amount due upon the notes, and a foreclosure of the mortgage and a sale of the lands, dismissed the cross-complaint, and from the judgment appellants appealed.

Block & Kirsch, of Paragould, for appellants. M. P. Huddleston, of Paragould, for appellee.

KIRBY, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] The sole question in this case is one of fact. The law is well settled that, "to sustain the plea of usury, it must appear that excessive interest was paid to the lender, or that a bonus or commission was paid to the agent of the lender with his knowledge, or under circumstances from which his knowledge will be presumed, which commission when added to the interest paid, or to be paid to the lender would exceed the lawful rate." The burden of proof is upon the party who pleads usury to show clearly that the transaction was usurious. Banks v. Flint, 54 Ark. 40, 14 S. W. 769, 16 S. W. 477, 10 L. R. A. 459; Vahlberg v. Keaton, 51 Ark. 535, 11 S. W. 878, 4 L. R. A. 462, 14 Am. St. Rep. 73; Thompson v. Ingram, 51 Ark. 547, 11 S. W. 881. In Leonhard v. Flood, 68 Ark. 162, 56 S. W. 781, the court said: "Our law visits on a lender, who contracts for usurious interest, however small, a forfeiture of his entire loan and the interest thereon. It follows from the plainest principles of justice that such a defense shall be clearly shown before the forfeiture is declared. Usury will not be inferred from circumstances when the opposite conclusion can be reasonably and fairly reached."

[2] If Beauchamp acted as the agent of the borrowers, alone, in procuring the loan, it makes no difference whether he received the bonus or not, for what the borrower pays to his own agent for procuring the loan is no part of the sum paid for the loan or for forbearance of money. Vahlberg v. Keaton, supra. "To constitute usury, there must be an agreement on the part of the lender to receive and on the part of the borrower to give for the use of money a greater rate of interest than 10 per cent." Bank v. Murphy, 83 Ark. 36, 102 S. W. 699.

[3] As already said, the sole question in this case is one of fact. The lender denied positively any agreement to make the loan upon receipt of $1,000 bonus above the amount of the interest agreed to be paid, and stated that he absolutely refused to make the loan at all when he learned that such a transaction as proposed to him would be usurious; that, later, he was approached by Beauchamp, who insisted upon his making the loan, and agreed to do the work of getting up the papers for nothing if the loan could be arranged. He refused then to make the loan for the time proposed, but later agreed to and did make it for two years. He denied receiving any bonus, and that any one else was acting as his agent in receiving one. Appellants do not deny that they offered to pay the bonus to any one who could procure the loan, and both Cox and Beauchamp stated positively that they procured the loan and received the bonus; Cox insisting with Beauchamp that appellants were still willing to pay the $1,000, and that the loan should not be permitted to fall through, and that he ought to be able to procure it, and that he would pay him half the bonus if he would assist in procuring the loan or get Mack to make it. These witnesses both testified that they did procure the loan from Mack, that they received the bonus and divided it between themselves, and that Mack had nothing to do with it and did not receive any part of it.

Of course, if appellants were believed, the transaction was usurious; but the evidence is in direct and irreconcilable conflict, and it was passed upon by the chancellor, and we cannot say that his finding and decision is against a preponderance of it.

Such being the case, the decree is affirmed.

GRAND LODGE, A. O. U. W. OF ARKANSAS v. DREHER.

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. Dec. 23, 1912.)

EXCEPTIONS, BILL OF (§ 23*)—INCORPORATING TESTIMONY BY REFERENCE.

A direction in a bill of exceptions, the "clerk here insert testimony," did not authorize consideration as a part of the bill of testimony subsequently transcribed and certified to by the official stenographer, where it did not appear that the transcribed testimony was approved by the trial judge, or filed by the clerk until after the expiration of the time for filing the bill of exceptions.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Arkansas County; Eugene Lankford, Judge.

Action by Christina Dreher against the Grand Lodge of the Ancient Order of United Workmen of the State of Arkansas. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Carmichael, Brooks & Powers, of Little Rock, for appellant. Pettit & Pettit, of Stuttgart, and Moore, Smith & Moore, of Little Rock, for appellee.

HART, J. Appellee brought this suit against appellant in the circuit court to recover the amount of a beneficiary certificate issued January 6, 1896, to her husband, Nicholas Dreher, deceased. Appellant filed an answer in which it stated that it had issued the certificate upon an agreement with Nicholas Dreher that the same was issued to him subject to the laws of the order then in force, or which might thereafter be adopted. The answer further states that Nicholas Dreher failed and neglected to pay his dues and assessments for the month of October, 1905, and refused to pay any dues and assessments from and after that time; that he thereby forfeited all rights of a beneficial member, and that he was never reinstated at any subsequent time; that at the time Dreher applied for his benefit certificate there was a law of the order in force to the effect that any member who should enter into the business of selling by retail intoxicating liquors as a beverage should be expelled; and that Dreher, in disregard thereof, entered into the occupation of selling intoxicating liquors as a beverage about the month of July, 1905, and continued until in October, 1905, in the city of Stuttgart, where he resided. Wherefore, it was claimed that he had forfeited all rights as a beneficial member of the association prior to the time of his death, and that Christina Dreher, as his wife and beneficiary, was not entitled to recover on the certificate. The jury found for appellee in the sum of $1,000, the amount named in the certificate, and the case is here on appeal.

The transcript in this case purports to consist of two separately bound packages of paper, both of which appear to have been filed with the clerk of this court on the same day. The first, which is properly the transcript, contains the pleadings, a skeleton bill of exceptions, containing the charge of the court, the motion for a new trial, orders, and judgment. The only testimony in the skeleton bill of exceptions consists of seven preliminary questions and the answers thereto propounded to Mrs. Christina Dreher, appellee. Then we find a direction as follows: "Clerk here insert testimony." The case was tried at the November term, 1911, of the Arkansas circuit court, and the order overruling the motion for a new trial was made November 7, 1911. In that order it appears that 60 days was allowed appellant in which to file its bill of exceptions. The skeleton bill of exceptions shows that it was approved and signed by the circuit judge on the 6th day of January, 1912, and on the same day was filed in the office of the circuit clerk. What purports to be the testimony consists of 120 typewritten pages which was filed in the office of the circuit clerk on February 1, 1912. It does not appear to have been examined, approved, or authenticated by the circuit judge. It is now contended by counsel for appellee that the 120 pages of typewritten matter purporting to be the testimony taken at the trial is not properly a part of the bill of exceptions, and is therefore not a part of the record on this appeal.

The grounds upon which appellant seeks to reverse the judgment cannot be reviewed on this appeal without a consideration of the testimony taken at the trial. Therefore, it is insisted by counsel for appellee that the judgment should be affirmed. They rely on the case of Dozler v. Grayson-McLeod Lumber Co., 100 Ark. 244, 140 S. W. 7. There the court held: "Where a bill of exceptions recited, 'The following testimony was introduced before the court and jury, which was all the evidence introduced by either party (insert testimony),' meaning that the clerk should insert the official stenographer's notes of the testimony, and the certificate of the stenographer shows that the testimony was subsequently transcribed, and it does not appear that the transcribed testimony was ever presented to the circuit judge for examination, it did not become a part of the bill of exceptions, and cannot be considered on appeal." See, also, Int. Order of 12 Knights & Daughters of Tabor v. Jackson, 142 S. W. 1151. That case is squarely in point. There was no sufficient call for the testimony in the skeleton bill of exceptions. It is certain that nothing that is not reduced to writing can be embodied in the bill of exceptions by reference to it alone. Any other rule would make the final record of a case as uncertain as the memory or the will of the clerk to whom its final making up might be referred, and would place the rights of parties who have judgments of record entirely in the power of the person who eventually makes up the bill of exceptions for this court. In the case at bar the call for the testimony does not identify it, and the 120 pages of typewritten matter which purports to be the testimony taken at the trial was not approved by the judge, and was not even filed by the clerk until after the time given for filing the bill of exceptions had elapsed. The reason for the rule is aptly stated by Mr. Justice Brewer in the case of A. & N. Railroad Co. v. Wagner, 19 Kan. 335, as follows: "And in this we appropriate the language of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Leftwich v. Lecanu, 4 Wall. 187, 18 L. Ed. 388, in which the court says: 'If a paper which is to constitute a part of a bill of exceptions is not incorporated into the body of the bill, it must be annexed to it, or so marked by letter, number, or other means of identification mentioned in the bill as to leave no doubt, when found in the record, that it is the one referred to in the bill of exceptions.' And these means of identification must be obvious to all. No mere memorandum, intelligible it may be to a single person, even the clerk, but indicating nothing to any one else, will be sufficient. They must be such that any one going to the record can determine what document is to be inserted, or, after insertion, that the clerk has made no mistake. The record must prove itself, and not the record and the testimony of the clerk. The clerk changes; the record endures. And long after judge and clerk are both gone the record, if good, must carry on itself the evidence of its own integrity."

Therefore the judgment will be affirmed.

MAYHEW v. TODISMAN et al.

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 1.
Nov. 30, 1912.)

1. STATUTES (§ 267*)—AMENDMENT—RETROACTIVE EFFECT.

The amendment of 1909 (Laws 1909, p. 343) to Rev. St. 1899, § 650, giving actions to quiet title, cannot affect judgments recovered prior to such amendment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. §§ 350-359; Dec. Dig. § 267.*]

2. BANKRUPTCY (§ 142*)—ADMINISTRATION OF BANKRUPT'S ESTATE—TITLE OF TRUSTEE.

Under Bankruptcy Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, §§ 70, 70e, 30 Stat. 565, 566 (U. S. Comp. St. 1901, pp. 3451, 3452), providing that the bankrupt's trustee shall take the title of the bankrupt to property transferred in fraud of his creditors, and may avoid any transfer by the bankrupt which any creditor might have avoided and recover the property transferred, the trustee has no title, interest, or estate in land fraudulently conveyed which entitles him to sue to set aside the transfer, under Rev. St. 1899, § 650, as amended in 1909 (Laws 1909, p. 343), providing that any person claiming any title or estate in real property may sue to determine his interest, since the bankrupt was without title or right of action, and a creditor has no interest or estate in the property which his debtor has fraudulently conveyed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bankruptcy, Cent. Dig. § 222; Dec. Dig. § 142.*]

3. BANKRUPTCY (§ 302*)—ADMINISTRATION OF ESTATE—SUIT TO SET ASIDE FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCE.

A petition by trustee in bankruptcy to set aside a fraudulent conveyance by the bankrupt, under Bankruptcy Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, §§ 70, 70e, 30 Stat. 565, 566 (U. S. Comp. St. 1901, pp. 3451, 3452), providing that the trustee shall have the title of the bankrupt as to all property transferred in fraud of creditors, and may avoid any transfer which any creditor might have avoided for alleged fraudulent transfers, must clearly show that the property is needed to pay claims filed against the bankrupt debtor.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

4. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 154*)—RIGHT TO SET ASIDE—FAILURE TO RECORD DEED.

Where property was conveyed to a son for his mother, and the deed to the son was recorded, the omission of the mother to record the deed from her son would not vitiate it or give existing creditors a right to complain, although she could not claim the property against those who had given the son credit on his apparent ownership.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraudulent Conveyances, Cent. Dig. §§ 485-492; Dec. Dig. § 154.*]

5. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 25*)—VALIDITY—CHANGE OF DATE.

Where no rights of creditors intervened, an alteration in the date of a deed from a son to his mother, made after acknowledgment, but before record, will not avoid it as to subsequent creditors of the son.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Barry County; F. C. Johnston, Judge.

Action by D. S. Mayhew, as trustee in bankruptcy of Vaughn H. Todisman, against Hattie F. Todisman and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

The petition, filed May 20, 1908, is entitled as above, and, omitting caption, the description of one lot, not in controversy here, and signature is as follows: "The plaintiff, D. S. Mayhew, represents to the court that upon the — day of December, 1907, Vaughn H. Todisman filed his petition in the District Court of the United States for the Judicial District of Missouri, Southwest Division, and therein prayed to be declared bankrupt; that on the 18th day of December, 1907, the said Vaughn H. Todisman was duly adjudged a bankrupt in said cause; that on the 8th day of January, 1908, the plaintiff, D. S. Mayhew, was duly appointed by said court trustee in bankruptcy, and thereupon accepted the trust and qualified; that on the — day of April, 1908, plaintiff, as such trustee, filed his petition in said United States court for an order to institute, in behalf of all creditors of said Vaughn H. Todisman, an action in the Barry county circuit court to set aside certain deeds executed by said Vaughn H. Todisman to Hattie F. Todisman to certain real estate hereinafter mentioned; that on the 21st day of April, 1908, Hon. A. E. Spencer, a referee in bankruptcy of said United States District Court, heard said petition, and ordered that said petition be sustained and plaintiff, D. S. Mayhew, trustee as aforesaid, authorized and empowered to institute and prosecute this action for the purposes aforesaid, the premises considered. This plaintiff, D. S. Mayhew, trustee, for his cause of action states that Hattie F. Todisman is the lawful wife of M. Y. Todisman; that Vaughn H. Todisman is her son; that said Vaughn H. Todisman is the owner, in fee simple absolute, in and to the following described real estate, lying, being situated, in the county of Barry and state of Missouri, to wit: Lot three (3) in block five (5) original townsite of Monett, Missouri, and that defendant Hattie Todisman claims, so plaintiff, D. S. Mayhew, is informed and believes, title to the above-described real estate in fee by reason of certain deeds from Vaughn H. Todisman to Hattie F. Todisman conveying to her the above-described real estate, which deeds of conveyance plaintiff asserts and charges to be fraudulent and void by reason of having been made in fraud of creditors of the said Vaughn H. Todisman. Wherefore plaintiff, D. S. Mayhew, trustee in bankruptcy as aforesaid, prays the court to ascertain and determine the estate, title, and interest of said parties hereto, respectively, in and to the above-described real estate, and to determine and adjudge by its judgment, as provided by section 650, Revised Statutes of Missouri 1899, the title, estate, and interest of the parties severally hereto in and to said above-described real estate, and for all other relief."

The evidence, including the original deeds which are presented to this court by the parties for examination, shows that on the 15th day of December, 1902, two deeds were drawn, signed by the respective grantors and acknowledged before D. N. Jewett, justice of the peace for Barry county. One was a warranty deed from M. Y. Todisman and wife, the father and mother of Vaughn H. Todisman, the present bankrupt, to their said son, and was filed for record on the 26th day of March, 1903. The other was a warranty deed from the latter to his mother, and was never filed for record in the form in which it was originally signed and acknowledged, but on the 30th day of January, 1906, the date, both in the body of the deed and in the acknowledgment, was erased, and the last-named date substituted, and it was filed for record, as so changed, on the 2d day of February following. In the meantime Vaughn H. Todisman mortgaged the lot for $337, which was raised and used in the construction of a party wall in connection with the owner of an adjoining lot. He and his mother explain the alteration in the deed by saying that this mortgage was made by the son because it was ascertained that the record title was in him, and that when it was determined to record the deed they consulted Mr. Jewett, who advised the alteration as affording a solution of that difficulty. Although Mr. Jewett's deposition was read upon the trial, both parties seemed to avoid all mention of the circumstance in his examination; but the deeds speak for themselves, and, in view of the fact that his certificate and signature are not questioned on either deed, his silence, with the acquiescence of both parties, authorizes the assumption that both deeds were delivered on the same day. There is no suggestion in the record that Vaughn H. Todisman became indebted to any considerable extent before 1906. The parties, in their testimony, explain the execution of the two deeds by the statement that, the mother having furnished the greater part of the money with which the land had been paid for, this method was pursued to transfer to her the title, the son having no other connection with the transaction than as a mere conduit; and that she failed to record her deed, at first for lack of the money to pay the fee, and then through pure neglect. None of the papers or records of the bankruptcy proceedings are in evidence, and no attempt was made to show the condition of the bankrupt's estate at the time this suit was instituted.

The final judgment was entered September 29, 1908. It cancels the deed which was changed, as above stated, and recorded February 2, 1906, and decrees the title to the lot to be in Vaughn H. Todisman in fee. Motions for a new trial and in arrest of judgment, raising the questions presented here for our determination, were filed by defendant and overruled by the court.

J. T. Burgess, of Monett, for appellants. Sizer & Kemp, of Monett, for respondent.

BROWN, C. (after stating the facts as above). [1] This suit is, by the averments of the petition, founded expressly upon the provisions of section 650 of the Revised Statutes of Missouri 1899. The judgment from which the appeal is taken was entered in 1908, and is consequently unaffected by the amendment of 1909. Laws 1909, p. 343. The question, therefore, suggests itself whether or not the trustee in bankruptcy, who is suing to make the property in controversy available to the creditors of his bankrupt, has selected a remedy available for that purpose, and, if so, whether his petition presents a theory which entitles him to the relief embodied in the judgment.

[2, 3] He depends for his title entirely upon the provisions of section 70 of the bankrupt act (30 Stat. L. 565), which provided that he shall "be vested by operation of law with the title of the bankrupt as of the date he was adjudged a bankrupt * * * to all property transferred by him in fraud of his creditors." This does not avoid the title of the fraudulent grantee. In re Mullen (D. C.) 101 Fed. 413. Nor does it give him a right of action to have the fraudulent conveyance set aside in equity, because the bankrupt had no such right. It is simply such a title as is necessary to enable a creditor to avail himself of the property, under proper circumstances, in satisfaction of his debt. To this end the trustee is made by the same section (70e) the representative of any creditor entitled to the remedy. It provides as follows: "The trustee may avoid any transfer by the bankrupt of his property which any creditor of such bankrupt might have avoided, and may recover the property so transferred, or its value, from the person to whom it was transferred, unless he was a bona fide holder for value prior to the date of the adjudication." While the creditor cannot avail himself of this remedy, under ordinary circumstances, without obtaining a judgment at law upon his claim, his right to sue at law being arrested by the petition in bankruptcy, it seems reasonable to permit the trustee to protect the right of which the proceeding might otherwise deprive him; but this subdivision does not authorize the trustee to avoid a transfer, unless some creditor, by proper proceeding, might have avoided it in his own favor. In re Economical Printing Co., 110 Fed. 514, 49 C. C. A. 133. He represents the creditor, who, in this case, where no lien is in question, has no greater interest in the property than he would have, had the paper title remained in Vaughn H. Todisman, and the bankruptcy proceeding had not intervened. Argument is not needed to demonstrate that in such case the general creditor has no "title, estate or interest" in the land which entitles him to bring the debtor into court, under the provisions of section 650, to obtain a judicial declaration that he may proceed, by judgment and execution, to avail himself of it for the collection of his debt.

If, however, we disregard the statement that the trustee is proceeding under the provisions of a statute which he has no power to invoke, and examine his petition for the purpose of ascertaining whether it states facts sufficient to constitute the cause of action which the bankrupt act authorizes him to pursue, we find it equally insufficient. Although it states that his bankrupt "is the owner in fee simple absolute" of the property in question, and that he is informed and believes that the defendant claims title in fee to the same "by reason of certain deeds from Vaughn H. Todisman to Hattie F. Todisman. * * * which deeds of conveyance plaintiff asserts and charges to be fraudulent and void by reason of having been made in fraud of creditors of the said Vaughn H. Todisman," it stands upon the title of the bankrupt, and fails to state facts showing that the trustee has the right to proceed in behalf of any such creditor. He has no right superior to that of the creditor whom he represents. Admitting that the conveyances under which the defendant claims are fraudulent, no right to avoid them exists, unless the property is needed to pay the claims filed against the bankrupt debtor; and this should be shown affirmatively by the petition. Muel-ler v. Bruss, 112 Wis. 406, 88 N. W. 229; Prescott v. Galluccio, 21 Am. Bankr. Rep. 229, (D. C.) 164 Fed. 618.

[4, 5] The plaintiff proved, as a necessary part of his case, that Vaughn H. Todisman acquired the property involved in this controversy by warranty deed from M. Y. Todisman and his wife, the defendant here, without the payment of any valuable consideration therefor. It was also in evidence that this conveyance was a part of an arrangement by which the title to the lot was to be conveyed from M. Y. Toddsman, the husband, through the present bankrupt to this defendant, his mother; and that, on the same date and at the same time, another deed was executed by the grantee in the first, who was a single man, to his mother. Were this true, and we have no reason to doubt it, especially in view of the fact that it took place several years before the bankrupt had become indebted, or contemplated the business which resulted in his indebtedness, so far as the evidence shows, the deeds would constitute a full and mutual consideration for each other; and no creditor then existing, or who might thereafter sustain that relation, would have any reason to complain. The omission of the defendant to record her deed would not vitiate it, nor give existing creditors a right to complain. As to subsequent creditors, "it is only when the withholding the instrument from record gives the grantor, upon the faith of the ownership by him of the property conveyed, a fictitious credit, and some one has thereby been misled to his injury, that such failure to record will be held to be fraudulent." Clark v. Lewis, 215 Mo. 173, 187, 188, 114 S. W. 604, and cases cited. Nor would the alteration of the deed by changing the date, in 1906, have the effect to divest the title conveyed by it in 1902; nor would that be fraudulent as to any class of creditors, unless it was a part of a scheme participated in by the grantee to give her son a fictitious credit. In such cases she would be estopped from claiming otherwise than according to the terms of the changed deed against those creditors who had incurred the relation by reason of the false impression so produced. Potter v. Adams, 125 Mo. 118, 28 S. W. 490, 46 Am. St. Rep. 478, and cases cited.

We have referred so fully to the facts in evidence to show that, while the petition, founded as it is upon the assertion that Vaughn H. Toddsman is the owner in fee simple absolute of the land in controversy, is inconsistent with the assertion that he has conveyed that title, even for the purpose of defrauding his creditors, the evidence, as we understand it, does not tend to support either of these theories, so that it suggests no issue that could properly be included by amendment, were the case remanded for further proceedings. Carter v. Dilley, 167 Mo. 564, 67 S. W. 232.

The judgment of the Barry county circuit court is therefore reversed.

PER CURIAM. The foregoing opinion of BROWN, C., is adopted as the opinion of the court. All concur.

MORAN v. STEWART.

(Supreme Court of Missouri. Division No. 2.
Nov. 13, 1912. Rehearing Denied Dec.
10, 1912.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 198*)—TIMELY OBJECTION AND EXCEPTION—DIRECTIONS TO COMMISSIONERS.

Error in the directions given the commissioners appointed to ascertain the value of real estate in controversy in a widow's action for dower and damages for forfeiture thereof is not reviewable, where no objection is made or exception taken when the commissioners were appointed and directed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1248-1250; Dec. Dig. § 198.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 266*)—NECESSITY OF EXCEPTIONS—REPORT OF COMMISSIONERS.

Error in the directions to commissioners appointed to ascertain the value of real estate in a widow's action for dower and damages was not reviewable, where no exceptions were saved to the court's approval of the report of the commissioners.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1552-1571; Dec. Dig. § 266.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 77*)—APPEALABLE JUDGMENTS—FINAL JUDGMENT—PRELIMINARY ORDER.

The court's order, in a widow's action for dower, appointing commissioners to set off homestead and dower therein, and directing them how to fix the value of the property, was not a final judgment, but was merely a preliminary order leading up to final judgment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 444-463; Dec. Dig. § 77.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 272*)—NECESSITY OF TIMELY EXCEPTIONS.

It is the duty of the parties in a civil case to immediately except to every erroneous act of the trial court which tends to prejudice their rights, to the end that the court may correct its error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1611-1619; Dec. Dig. § 272.*]

5. DOWER (§ 82*)—ACTION BY WIDOW—DIRECTIONS TO COMMISSIONERS.

In a widow's action for dower, the court need not give written directions on their duties to the commissioners appointed to ascertain the value of the real estate in controversy.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dower, Cent. Dig. § 321; Dec. Dig. § 82.*]

6. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 274*)—SUFFICIENCY OF EXCEPTION.

An exception to the order of the court overruling objections to the report of commissioners appointed to ascertain the value of real estate in controversy in a widow's action for dower, is insufficient to present for review error in approving such report.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1631-1645; Dec. Dig. § 274.*]

7. DOWER (§ 99*)—REPORT OF COMMISSIONERS—EXCEPTIONS.

Since Rev. St. 1909, §§ 374, 6713, providing for commissioners to assign dower and homestead, do not require written exceptions to their report, the court may, when written objections are made, determine the correctness or legality of such report on grounds not mentioned in such objections.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dower, Cent. Dig. §§ 345-347; Dec. Dig. § 99.*]

8. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 274*)—FAILURE TO EXCEPT—CURE—DOWER—RIGHT OF COMMISSIONERS.

Failure of the plaintiff, in a widow's action for dower, to save exceptions to the approval of the report of commissioners, was not cured by her motion, made four years later, to set aside the report, nor by her exceptions to the striking of such motion from the files.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1631-1645; Dec. Dig. § 274.*]

9. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 62*)—WIDOW'S QUARANTINE—TITLE ACQUIRED.

A widow occupying property under a widow's quarantine cannot thereby acquire an absolute title against the heirs or remaindermen.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. §§ 323-332; Dec. Dig. § 62.*]

10. LIFE ESTATES (§ 8*)—ADVERSE POSSESSION.

Possession of one holding a life estate can never become hostile to the remaindermen.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Life Estates, Cent. Dig. §§ 24-28; Dec. Dig. § 8.*]

11. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 62*)—RIGHTS OF HEIRS—WIDOW'S QUARANTINE.

By delay during which a widow is permitted to occupy the whole of an estate, the other heirs do not lose their right to apply to the court to assign dower to her.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. §§ 323-332; Dec. Dig. § 62.*]

12. DOWER (§ 81*)—MULTIPLICITY OF SUITS—ASSIGNMENT OF DOWER—SEPARATE TRACTS.

Where, in a widow's action for dower, it appeared that defendant was the owner of the remainder in two tracts of land, subject to the widow's quarantine, dower, and homestead rights, the court, in order to prevent multiplicity of suits, properly ordered plaintiff's dower in both tracts to be assigned at the same time.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dower, Cent. Dig. §§ 312-316; Dec. Dig. § 81.*]

13. DOWER (§ 6*)—MARRIAGE CONTRACT—VALIDITY—EFFECT.

A marriage contract, invalid for want of consideration, could not entitle the widow to any interest in the property of her deceased husband, especially where she repudiated such contract in order to have dower and homestead.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dower, Cent. Dig. § 9; Dec. Dig. § 6.*]

14. DOWER (§ 99*)—ASSIGNMENT—COMMISSIONERS' REPORT.

The fact that the court, in a widow's action for dower, determined, on the pleadings at a preliminary stage of the trial, that she was entitled to dower in certain land, did not show that the approval of the report of the commissioners, by which she was given no part of such tract, was erroneous.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dower, Cent. Dig. §§ 345-347; Dec. Dig. § 99.*]

15. DOWER (§ 105*)—DAMAGES FOR DEFOECMENT—RIGHTS.

Since under Rev. St. 1909, § 389, defining the widow's right to dower, a judgment for damages must be special against the interest of the heir or other person wrongfully depriving her of dower in the very land set off to her as dower and homestead, a widow was not entitled to damages against a defendant who had not deprived her of possession of any part of the land set off to her.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dower, Cent. Dig. § 189; Dec. Dig. § 105.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Andrew County; A. D. Burnes, Judge.

Action by Angie Moran against Samuel B. Stewart. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Action by widow for dower and damages for enforcement thereof. From a judgment assigning dower and rejecting her claim for damages, she appeals.

On February 5, 1891, David Moran, 70 years old, with two adopted children, but no lineal heirs, was united in marriage with the plaintiff, then a lady of 30 summers. They resided in Andrew county, where the husband was possessed of two farms, one a tract of 500 acres and the other a smaller tract of 106 acres. On the smaller farm these victims of the designing Cupid made their home, until 13 months later, when the Grim Reaper, unmindful of the achievements of the aforesaid Cupid, and with a shameless disregard for connubial felicity, entered the Moran home and wantonly struck down the doting husband. When the funeral was over, it was discovered that Moran had devised all his lands to his adopted children except a life estate in the 106-acre tract. By an antenuptial contract, Moran, in consideration of marriage, settled upon plaintiff the 106-acre tract, "during her life or widowhood," and in consideration of rights acquired by that settlement she agreed to waive all claim to dower and homestead in the real estate of her husband. See 173 Mo. 211, 73 S. W. 177, for copy of contract. However, the plaintiff was not at all satisfied with such rights in the 106-acre tract as were given to her by the marriage contract, and during the last 20 years has assiduously sought to enlarge her estate in the realty of her deceased husband. This is her fifth appearance in this court in her efforts to acquire more property than she agreed to accept in full satisfaction of her marriage with Moran. See 122 Mo. 295, 26 S. W. 962; 132 Mo. 73, 33 S. W. 443; 151 Mo. 555, 52 S. W. 377; 173 Mo. 207, 73 S. W. 177.

On the 27th day of November, 1899, she instituted this action against the adopted son of her husband for dower in the 500-acre tract occupied by him, and also claimed damages for the enforcement of her dower in that tract. Defendant pleaded the marriage contract as a bar to plaintiff's dower; but this court held that said contract was not based on a sufficient consideration, and did not bar the plaintiff's right to dower. The first appeal in this particular cause resulted in a reversal and remanding of the cause for new trial. Moran v. Stewart, 173 Mo. 207, 73 S. W. 177. On May 25, 1903 (after the cause was remanded by this court), defendant amended his answer so as to admit the plaintiff's right to dower in the 500-acre tract occupied by him, but asserted that he had made several thousand dollars worth of permanent improvements on the property since the death of Moran, and prayed that the value of these improvements be deducted from any dower that might be assigned to her. Defendant in his amended answer also averred that plaintiff was entitled to dower and homestead in the 106-acre tract occupied by her, the said 106-acre tract was equal in value to one-third of all the real estate of her deceased husband, and prayed that dower be assigned to her in all the real estate of deceased, including the 106-acre tract. In plaintiff's reply, she alleges that since the death of her husband she has held the 106-acre tract "by virtue of her right of homestead and quarantine." On November 12, 1903, both parties, after waiving a jury and admitting "the facts set up in the pleadings," submitted the case to the court. The court found the issues in favor of plaintiff, and that she was entitled to dower in the 500-acre tract, with damages for the detention thereof; also, that she was entitled to both dower and homestead in the 106-acre tract.

The court then appointed appraisers to view the property and set off to plaintiff, first, a sufficient amount of the 106-acre tract to equal $1,500 in value as her homestead, and also a sufficient amount of the remaining lands occupied by the plaintiff and defendant to equal one-third of all the real estate of the deceased; said one-third to include the amount set off as homestead. At the same time the court also made an order directing the commissioners that, in ascertaining the value of the different tracts of land owned by the deceased, they should not consider any permanent improvements placed upon the lands since the death of Moran. On February 23, 1904, the commissioners filed their report reciting that they had set off plaintiff's homestead in the 106-acre tract and also the remainder of said 106-acre tract in full of her dower in all of her late husband's lands. When this report was filed, the plaintiff filed objections thereto, alleging, among other things, that the commissioners had placed a value on both tracts of land as of the date of the death of David Moran; that said lands had greatly increased in value since his death; and that the commissioners should have awarded the plaintiff one-third in value of all of said lands at the date of the assignment of her dower and homestead.

By what we suppose is the bill of exceptions in this cause, it appears that the plaintiff's objections to the report of the commissioners were overruled by the court while the plaintiff's attorney was temporarily absent from the courtroom. When he returned on the same day and was informed of the action of the court, he announced his desire to introduce, in support of said motion, numerous files in other suits in which the plaintiff was or had been a party; and also the will of the late David Moran. Upon objection of the defendant, the court refused to allow these documents to be introduced, on the ground that the offer came too late, whereupon plaintiff saved her exceptions. It does not appear that the plaintiff at any time excepted to the order of the court appointing and directing the commissioners how they should set off the plaintiff's dower and homestead, nor does it appear anywhere that she excepted to the homestead, nor does it appear anywhere that she excepted to the action of the court in confirming and approving the report of the commissioners.

After the commissioners' report was approved, the plaintiff filed a motion for a new trial, which being overruled, she appealed to this court. Later, this appeal was dismissed by the plaintiff as having been prematurely taken. Thereafter, at the May term, 1908 (four years after the approval of the commissioners' report), plaintiff moved the court to set aside its order approving the report of said commissioners appointed to set off dower and homestead, which motion was by the court stricken from the files on the 10th day of November, 1908; and plaintiff excepted. Thereafter, at the November term, 1908, at the request of the plaintiff, the cause was redocketed, and the issue of the plaintiff's right to damages for the detention of her dower in the 500-acre tract tried before the court sitting as a jury, and a judgment rendered in favor of the defendant, holding that plaintiff was not entitled to any damages; whereupon the plaintiff prosecuted this appeal.

For reversal of the judgment, plaintiff contends: (1) That the court erred in directing the commissioners to fix the value of the real estate as of the time of the death of David Moran and not allowing them to consider the enhanced value of the property brought about by the improvements made by defendant; (2) that plaintiff was the absolute owner of the 106-acre tract, and the court erred in assigning her dower in that tract; (3) that the defendant was barred at the time of filing his amended answer from having dower or homestead set off to plaintiff in the 106-acre tract; and (4) that the court erred in not awarding her damages for the detention of her dower by defendant. Other alleged errors of the trial court are complained of, but they are either embraced in the foregoing assignments or found not worthy of attention.

BROWN, P. J. (after stating the facts as above). [1, 2] I. The main insistence of the plaintiff is that the court erred in directing the commissioners to ascertain the value of the real estate as of the date of the death of Moran and instructed them not to consider any permanent improvements placed thereon by defendant.

Upon the record, this issue is not properly presented to us for review: First, because plaintiff did not object or except to the action of the court at the November term, 1903, when the commissioners were appointed and directed to disregard the permanent improvements made on the land since the death of Moran; and, second, because no exceptions were saved to the order of the court approving the report of the commissioners.

[3] The action of the trial court in finding plaintiff was entitled to dower in both the 106 and the 500 acre tracts, its order appointing commissioners to set off homestead and dower therein, and directing them how to fix the value of said property, was not a final judgment nor any part thereof. It was only a preliminary order of the court leading up to a final judgment. Rannels v. Washington University, 96 Mo. 226, loc. cit. 231, 9 S. W. 569.

If the court erred in its directions to the commissioners, its attention should have been called to the error by a proper exception at the time such error was committed, so that the same could have been corrected then and there.

Section 2028, R. S. 1909, which provides that exceptions may be saved to the "opinion" of the trial court during the progress of trials, does not designate the class or nature of errors which may be preserved for review by bills of exceptions; but it has long been the practice in this state to require exceptions to be preserved to all erroneous rulings and orders of trial courts which tend to produce unjust or erroneous final judgments. It was impossible for the General Assembly to foresee and designate the sundry classes of erroneous rulings, orders, or misconduct of the trial courts which might injuriously affect the rights of the litigants in the final determination of civil cases. It was therefore left to the appellate courts to determine what orders and rulings should form proper matters of exception and the effect of such errors upon the rights of litigants in each concrete case.

It has been held that the following orders made by trial courts, if erroneous and injurious to a litigant, must be excepted to by him when made: Orders awarding changes of venue. Gibney v. St. Louis Transit Co., 204 Mo. 704, loc. cit. 717, 103 S. W. 43. Orders consolidating suits. Turley v. Barnes, 67 Mo. App. 237, loc. cit. 240. Orders striking out parts of pleadings. Linn County v. Bank, 175 Mo. 539, 75 S. W. 393.

If the trial court erred in directing the commissioners to disregard permanent improvements made on the land of Moran and to assign the homestead and dower of plaintiff out of the 106-acre tract, so far as it would go, that error must have been as apparent to plaintiff's attorney at the time the interlocutory judgment was entered and the order made as when the commissioners filed their report at the succeeding term of court; and, no reason being apparent why he failed to except to that interlocutory order when it was made, the objections to the report of the commissioners, made in exact conformity with the order under which they were appointed, comes too late, and cannot be considered on appeal. Richardson v. Association, 156 Mo. 413, 57 S. W. 117; Windes v. Earp et al., 150 Mo. 600, 51 S. W. 1044.

[4] In the trial of civil cases, the same duty rests upon plaintiff's as defendant's attorneys to aid the court in every possible way to try the case according to law; and among other duties so imposed is to except to every erroneous or improper act of the trial court which tends to prejudice the rights of their clients. Said exceptions must be saved at the very time such error is committed, to the end that the trial court may correct its error or mistake before it ripens into an erroneous or unjust final judgment.

[5] It was not necessary for the circuit court to have given the commissioners any written directions in regard to their duties. Chicago, etc., Railroad Co. v. Randolph Townsite Co., 103 Mo. 451, loc. cit. 468, 15 S. W. 437.

[6] If no directions had been given to the commissioners and their report had been erroneous under the law and facts, an exception to the order of the court approving this report would have been sufficient to have brought such error here for review; but the abstract does not show that any such exception was saved. An exception was only saved to the order of the court overruling objections to the report.

[7] The statutes do not require written exceptions to the report of commissioners appointed to assign dower or homestead. Sections 374 and 6718, R. S. 1909. The trial court may determine the correctness or legality of such report in whatever manner is satisfactory to it. If written exceptions be filed and overruled, that does not injure either party, because the court can overrule the written objections and still reject the report of the commissioners on grounds not mentioned in such objections. When the report was approved, it became binding; and then the plaintiff should have excepted to the order approving it. This she failed to do. Richardson v. Association, 156 Mo. 407, loc. cit. 411, 57 S. W. 117.

[8] The report of the commissioners appointed to assign plaintiff's dower was approved by the circuit court on March 24, 1904, and more than four years thereafter, to wit, on November 20, 1908, the plaintiff apparently having discovered that she had saved no exceptions to the approval of said report, filed a motion praying the court to set aside its order approving the report, and saved her exceptions to an order of the court striking said motion from the files.

The filing of this last-named motion and the saving of exceptions to the court's action in striking it from the files did not help the plaintiff. When the trial court commits an error to which an exception may be properly saved, such exception must be saved promptly. Harrison v. Bartlett, 51 Mo. 170; City of St. Joseph v. Ensworth, 65 Mo. 628; Bond v. Finley, 74 Mo. App. 22; Richardson v. Association, 156 Mo. 407, loc. cit. 411, 57 S. W. 117.

II. Plaintiff further insists that the court committed error in finding that dower should be assigned to plaintiff in the 106-acre tract, because plaintiff was the absolute owner of such tract at the time defendant's amended answer was filed, and that defendant's right to have dower assigned in that tract was barred by the statute of limitations.

[9] The proposition that one occupying the home and plantation of deceased under a widow's quarantine can by that act acquire an absolute title against the heir or remainderman is novel, and wholly untenable.

[10] Under no possible construction of plaintiff's pleading could she have been entitled to anything more than a life estate in the 106-acre tract; and the settled rule of law is that possession of one holding a life estate can never become hostile to the remainderman. Hall v. French, 165 Mo. 430, 65 S. W. 769.

[11] Our attention has not been called to any law which would bar the right of an heir to apply to the circuit court to assign dower to a widow who, as in this case, is occupying lands under the right of quarantine. Through filial consideration and affection, heirs often allow the widowed mother to occupy the whole of their father's real estate and enjoy the income thereof for an indefinite period. To hold that heirs should be penalized by forfeiting their interest in the property for such generosity toward a parent would violate the plainest laws of humanity.

A delay on the part of the heir or remainderman in bringing suit for assignment of the widow's dower while she is in possession does not bar the action, because the possession by the widow is not hostile to the heir or remainderman. Fischer v. Slekmann, 125 Mo. 166, 28 S. W. 435; Carey v. West, 139 Mo. 146, 40 S. W. 661.

[12] In the instant case, at the time of filing his amended answer the defendant was the owner of the remainder in both the 106 and the 500 acre tracts, subject to the widow's quarantine, dower, and homestead rights; and it was altogether proper on his answer for the court to order plaintiff's dower in both tracts assigned at the same time. It is always the policy of the law to prevent a multiplicity of suits. The plaintiff seems grieved because she received no part of the 500 acres as dower. Her homestead, expressly asserted in her reply, had to be set off in the 106-acre tract; and no doubt the court and commissioners thought it would be more to her interest to have her dower assigned out of the remainder of that tract than to give her part of her dower in another tract and allow the defendant to recover possession of a part of the 106 acres.

[13] In the last brief filed by appellant, she asserts that she is holding the 106-acre tract under the marriage contract, notwithstanding her reply in this cause shows she is holding it under dower and quarantine.

She can have no interest whatever under the marriage contract. She had to repudiate that contract in order to have dower and homestead; and, this court having held that the marriage contract was based upon an insufficient consideration, it is not valid for any purpose.

[14] III. The further contention of plaintiff that, having found that she was entitled to dower in the 500-acre tract, the court erred in approving the report of the commissioners by which she was not given any part of that tract, is unsound. The preliminary trial to determine plaintiff's rights was upon the pleadings, which, as we have seen, were admitted to be true; and from that trial the court could make no final decision as to how much of the land plaintiff's homestead and dower rights would cover. That had to be ascertained and was ascertained by the commissioners when they appraised the land and set off one-third thereof in value to the plaintiff.

[15] IV. Another contention of plaintiff is that she was not allowed to recover damages for deforcement or detention of her dower. The evidence clearly shows that defendant never at any time deprived her of the possession of any part of the land which was set off to her as dower and homestead; consequently there was no evidence upon which a judgment for damages could be based. When all the provisions of the dower law are read together, it becomes apparent that a judgment for damages for deforcement of dower is not a general judgment, but must be a special judgment against the interest of the heir or other person who has wrongfully deprived the widow of dower in the very land which she has succeeded in having set off to her.

Section 389, R. S. 1909, being a part of the article defining the widow's rights to dower, reads as follows: "In all cases of judgments for damages, or yearly allowance in favor of any widow under the provisions of this article, execution thereof shall be awarded only against the estate in which dower shall have been assigned." See Griffin v. Began, 79 Mo. 73, and Reineinan v. Larkin, 222 Mo. 156, loc. cit. 166, 121 S. W. 307.

Finding no reversible error in the record, the judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

(Supreme Court of Missouri. Nov. 26, 1912.
Rehearing Denied Dec. 10, 1912.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 170*)—APPEAL FROM PROBATE COURT—CONSTITUTIONAL QUESTION.

A constitutional question cannot be raised on an appeal from the probate court, where no such issue was presented at the trial.

2. EXCEPTIONS, BILL OF (§ 53*)—REFUSAL TO SIGN—DEFENSE—WRIT OF PROHIBITION.

Where a writ of prohibition had been granted by the St. Louis Court of Appeals restraining respondent, a circuit judge, from signing and filing a bill of exceptions on an appeal from an order dismissing an appeal from probate, such writ, whether rightful or wrongful, was a valid reason for respondent's refusal to sign and file such bill of exceptions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Exceptions, Bill of, Cent. Dig. §§ 80-88; Dec. Dig. § 53.*]

3. EXCEPTIONS, BILL OF (§ 53*)—SIGNING—ENFORCEMENT.

While the Supreme Court will grant mandamus to compel circuit courts to sign and file bills of exception, a writ will not be granted where the signing and filing of a bill under the circumstances would be a vain and useless act.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Exceptions, Bill of, Cent. Dig. §§ 80-88; Dec. Dig. § 53.*]

4. INSANE PERSONS (§ 23*)—INQUISITION—NEW TRIAL—JURISDICTION.

Rev. St. 1909, § 482, permits the probate court, for just cause appearing during the term at which an inquisition is had, to require the facts to be inquired into by a new jury. Held that, where a person found insane promptly moved to set aside the verdict during the term, the expiration of the term did not oust the probate court of jurisdiction; the statute being directory only.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 104; Dec. Dig. § 82.*]

6. INSANE PERSONS (§ 27*)—INQUISITION—JUDGMENT—APPEAL.

Since probate court decrees adjudging a person of unsound mind are in fieri and may be opened and set aside at any subsequent term of the court in case the person be restored to sanity, as provided by Rev. St. 1909, § 519, no appeal lies therefrom.

7. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 316*)—DUE PROCESS OF LAW—DISMISSAL OF APPEAL FROM PROBATE.

Dismissal of an appeal from an order of the probate court setting aside a verdict finding a person of unsound mind and granting a new trial before another jury did not deprive the petitioners of due process of law, but merely remanded the proceeding to the probate court for trial in the only tribunal designated by the Legislature to determine the issues.

In Banc. Mandamus by the State on the relation of Louis Nolte, Sheriff of the City of St. Louis, and Edward M. Taylor, to compel Eugene McQuillin, Judge of the Circuit Court of St. Louis City to settle, sign, and file a bill of exceptions. Alternative writ quashed, and peremptory writ denied.

Mandamus to compel the respondent, as judge of the circuit court of St. Louis city, to settle, sign, and file a bill of exceptions in a cause appealed to this court. The proceedings which led up to the issue of our alternative writ are as follows: On March 17, 1911, and during the March term, 1911, of the probate court of St. Louis city, the relator Louis Nolte in his official capacity as sheriff of St. Louis city, filed an information in said court under the provisions of sections 474 and 477, R. S. 1909, alleging that one Clara E. Taylor, a resident of said city, was a person of unsound mind and incapable of managing her affairs. Upon the filing of said information a jury was duly impaneled by said court, which jury, after hearing the evidence, returned a verdict sustaining the allegations of said information. Only 10 of the jurors concurred in the verdict. Judgment was rendered on said verdict declaring the said Clara E. Taylor to be a person of unsound mind and incapable of managing her affairs. During the said March term of said probate court, Clara E. Taylor filed therein her motion to set aside the verdict of the jury, whereupon said probate court made an order reciting the filing of said motion, and further reciting that the court, "not being fully advised of and concerning same, doth take time to consider thereof." No further action was taken by the probate court in said proceeding until July 10, 1911, on which day it entered an order setting aside the verdict of the jury so returned on March 17, 1911, and granting said Clara E. Taylor a new trial. On July 13, 1911, relator Nolte filed in said probate court an affidavit and bond for appeal from the order of said court granting a new trial. The appeal was accordingly granted to the circuit court of St. Louis city and assigned to the division of said circuit court over which respondent presides. On October 2, 1911, said Clara E. Taylor filed with respondent a motion to dismiss the aforesaid appeal from the probate court on the ground that "no appeal lies in the circumstances of this case; the order granting the same being improvidently and erroneously made," and "because the order setting aside the finding and verdict of the jury was not a final determination of the matter in the probate court, and no appeal would lie from the same." On November 17, 1911, respondent, as judge of said circuit court, sustained said motion and dismissed the appeal;• but, for some reason not recited in relator's petition, respondent on December 1, 1911, set aside and vacated its order dismissing relator's appeal, and reinstated the motion to dismiss on his docket. On January 5, 1911, the motion to dismiss was again sustained, and relators' appeal dismissed. On January 18, 1911, relator Nolte filed in the circuit court what he designates as a "petition" and affidavit for appeal to this court from the order and judgment dismissing his appeal from the probate court. The allegations of this "petition" for appeal will be noted in our opinion. On February 2, 1912, relator Edward M. Taylor also filed with respondent a "petition" for appeal, in which he describes himself as the husband of the aforesaid Clara E. Taylor, and for that and other reasons claimed the right to prosecute an appeal from the respondent's order dismissing the appeal granted by the probate court.

The conclusions we have reached render it unnecessary to decide whether Edward M. Taylor possessed any right to interplead or otherwise inject himself into this litigation. Pursuant to relator Nolte's petition and affidavit for appeal from the circuit court, the respondent on February 3, 1912, granted him an appeal to this court, and also granted him 10 days in which to prepare, have signed, and file his bill of exceptions. Respondent in his return recites that relator Nolte prepared and presented to him a bill of exceptions within the time granted and allowed for that purpose, but that, before said bill of exceptions was settled, signed, and filed, respondent was served with a preliminary writ of prohibition issued by the honorable St. Louis Court of Appeals, which writ prohibits said respondent from taking any further action in the matter of said information against Clara E. Taylor until the further order of said Court of Appeals. Respondent in his return further states that he is willing to comply with our alternative writ and allow, sign, seal, and file the bill of exceptions as prayed by relators, provided he can do so without violating the writ of prohibition issued by the St. Louis Court of Appeals, which said writ of prohibition is still pending and undetermined in said Court of Appeals. Wherefore respondent prays us to determine whether or not said writ of prohibition constitutes good cause why he should not allow, sign, and file said bill of exceptions. Upon the filing of respondent's return, relators move for a judgment on the pleadings.

Max F. Ruler and Randolph Laughlin, both of St. Louis, for relator. Geo. B. Webster, of St. Louis, for Clara E. Taylor. Eugene McQuillin, of St. Louis, pro se.

BROWN, J. (after stating the facts as above). Upon the face of the pleadings, we are requested to compel the respondent to violate a writ of prohibition issued by the St. Louis Court of Appeals. As a ground for this unusual demand, relators insist that said Court of Appeals has no jurisdiction to hear or determine the appeal granted by respondent, and consequently, under the ruling of this court in State ex rel. v. Norton, 201 Mo. loc. cit. 24 to 29, 98 S. W. 554, the writ issued by the said Court of Appeals is void. They contend that, by reason of certain constitutional questions inserted by relators in their "petition for appeal," the St. Louis Court of Appeals is deprived of jurisdiction to hear and determine the appeal, and is therefore without power to control or interfere with the appeal by its writ of prohibition. Relators do not contend that any constitutional question was raised while the original cause was pending in the probate court, but assert that the dismissal by respondent of the appeal taken from said probate court violates the following provisions of the Constitution of Missouri: Section 10, art. 2, providing that courts shall be open to every person, etc.; section 30, art. 2, guaranteeing due process of law; and sections 22 and 23, art. 6, granting to circuit courts jurisdiction of appeals from, and supervising control over, probate courts.

[1] A constitutional question cannot legally be injected into a cause appealed from the probate court where no such issue was presented at the trial in such court. A very similar question was presented to us in Re Strom's Estate, 213 Mo. 1, 111 S. W. 534, and in that case this court, speaking through Gantt, J., said: "It is elemental in this state that, on appeal from a probate court or a justice of the peace, the circuit court must try the case anew upon the same cause of action that was tried in the probate court or in the justice's court. It is obvious that the two constitutional questions imported into the case presented entirely new issues in the circuit court, issues which the probate court was not allowed to pass on, and this change of the cause of action, so to speak, was unauthorized. The appeal could not give the circuit court greater jurisdiction than the probate court had, or change the course of that appeal from the St. Louis Court of Appeals to this court." It is manifest upon the face of the pleadings that the respondent is not intentionally refusing to perform any official duty.

[2] Whether the writ of prohibition was rightfully or wrongfully issued by the court of Appeals, it appears beyond peradventure that it was issued and served, and it constitutes a valid reason for the respondent's refusal to sign and file the bill of exceptions. If relators have any valid ground of complaint against any court, it must needs be against the Court of Appeals, which they insist has exceeded its jurisdiction. It would be a novel procedure to convict the honorable St. Louis Court of Appeals of exceeding its jurisdiction in an action to which that court is not a party. To grant the relief relators seek in this action would amount to weaving an additional snarl into the warp and woof of our judicial procedure. Our writ of mandamus certainly ought not to issue against one party because another party has done, or is doing, wrong.

2. However, the petition of the relators harks back to their right to appeal from the order of the probate court granting Clara E. Taylor a new trial on the information which charges that she is a person of unsound mind.

[3] We have many times, through our writ of mandamus, compelled circuit courts to sign and file bills of exceptions. We will not hesitate to thus aid litigants in perfecting their appeals when the facts warrant such action on our part. However, it is our rule in all classes of cases to refuse to require either courts or litigants to perform vain or useless acts. Darrier v. Darrier, 58 Mo. 222, loc. cit. 234. Baker v. Railroad, 122 Mo. loc. cit. 547 and 548, 26 S. W. 20; Morris v. Du Puy, 85 Mo. App. loc. cit. 657. Therefore, if the relators' petition shows on its face that they are not entitled to an appeal, and that, if we compel respondent to sign and file the bill of exceptions, such appeal would not bring up any error which we could review, then no useful purpose would be served should we go through the idle formality of requiring such bill of exceptions to be signed.

[4] Section 482, R. S. 1909, expressly confers upon the probate court the right, if "just cause appear" during the term at which the inquisition was had, to set aside the finding of the jury and require the facts to be inquired into by a new jury. Relators, however, insist that the power of the probate court to set aside the verdict of the first jury expired with the term at which that verdict was returned. It very clearly appears that Clara E. Taylor promptly filed her motion to set aside the verdict of the jury during the term at which it was returned, but the court of its own volition took the motion under advisement until its next term, and then sustained same. Did this continuance of the motion for a new trial until the next succeeding term oust the probate court of jurisdiction to consider or sustain it? We think not. There is nothing in the statutes which warrants such a construction. It would be a monstrous doctrine to penalize a litigant who is not in default by denying her a hearing to which by law she is entitled, simply because the court of its own motion continued her case to a succeeding term. The Constitution of Missouri, § 3, art. 6, requires this court to prepare and file its opinions in all cases during the term at which such cases are submitted. But this constitutional provision and statutes of similar import have been treated as only directory. Kralemann v. Sippel, 57 Mo. App. 598. The motion of Clara E. Taylor for a new trial in the probate court is not set out, nor the substance thereof recited in relators' petition; therefore we will indulge the presumption that said motion contains allegations which amounted to "just cause" for setting aside the verdict of the jury, and granting her a new trial under the provisions of section 482, R. S. 1909.

[6] 3. Decrees of probate courts adjudging persons to be of unsound mind are entirely unlike ordinary judgments. No appeal lies from such decrees for the reason that by the statutes they remain in fieri like a suit pending, and may be reopened and set aside at any subsequent term of the court when the insane person shall be restored to his right mind. Section 519, R. S. 1909; Dutcher v. Hill, 29 Mo. 271, loc. cit. 274, 77 Am. Dec. 572; In the Matter of Marquis, 85 Mo. 615; In the Matter of Crouse, 140 Mo. App. 545, 120 S. W. 666.

[7] The relators' insistence that the dismissal of the appeal by respondent deprives them of due process of law is frivolous. It merely sends them back to the probate court for a trial in the only tribunal designated by the Legislature to hear and determine the issues presented by the information filed in that court by the relator Nolte.

For the reasons recited, our alternative writ of mandamus will be quashed and a peremptory writ denied. All concur, except WOODSON, J., not sitting.

PARKYNE v. CHURCHILL et al.
(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 1.
Nov. 30, 1912.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 639*)—DISMISSAL—
GROUNDS—DEFECTIVE RECORD.

Where the abstract of record is a proper abstract of the pleadings and judgment, and there is enough to make the record proper a matter of review on appeal, the appeal will not be dismissed for defects in the abstract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 2787; Dec. Dig. § 639.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 584*)—DISMISSAL—
GROUNDS—DEFECTIVE RECORD.

An abstract of record on appeal which commingles the record proper and matters of exceptions, so that it is impossible to say what is included for record proper, and what for matters of exceptions, and so that it cannot be determined whether a motion for new trial was preserved in a bill of exceptions or not, and which under the caption "abstract of record" contains pleadings and the judgment, is fatally defective, and leaves for review only the record proper.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 518*)—RULINGS ON PLEADINGS—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—MOTIONS.

A motion to strike out pleadings, if treated as a pure motion, must appear in the bill of exceptions, and not in the record proper, or the ruling thereon is not reviewable on appeal.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Wright County; Argus Cox, Judge.

Action by Josephine Parkyne against Charles S. Churchill and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant Laura E. Moody appeals. Affirmed.

J. W. Jackson, of Hartsville, and W. J. Boyd, of St. Joseph, for appellant. E. H. Farnsworth, of Mountain Grove, and Lamar, Lamar & Lamar, of Houston, for respondent.

GRAVES, P. J. By a petition first filed in this cause plaintiff in a single count, sought to have the circuit court ascertain and determine her title to two certain blocks in the town of Mountain Grove, Wright county, Mo. Whilst title was claimed by adverse possession for 10 years, the action should be properly denominated one under old section 650. Later the petition was amended by the addition of another count, setting up facts constituting a resulting trust, but followed with a prayer as under old section 650 to ascertain and determine the interests of plaintiff and defendants in and to the property in dispute. This petition was challenged by demurrer, but this was overruled nisi, and the appealing defendants answered over. That answer reads: "Now comes the defendant Laura E. Moody, and by leave of the court first had and obtained files this, her separate amended answer to plaintiff's amended petition herein, and says that she denies each and every allegation therein contained, not herein expressly admitted. Defendant Laura E. Moody admits that she claims some right, title, and interest in and to the real estate described in plaintiff's petition. She alleges and says that she is the owner and holds the legal title to the lands described in plaintiff's amended petition aforesaid. Defendant further alleges and says that she is the sole owner, and holds the equitable title to the lands described in the plaintiff's petition aforesaid. For another and further answer and defense the plaintiff's action, the defendant says and avers the fact to be that the plaintiff's action, if any she had, was barred before the filing of the original petition in this action, in this: That any action that the plaintiff may have had accrued and existed more than 10 years before the filing of the original petition herein, which statute of limitation defendant especially pleads in bar of the plaintiff's action." No reply appears in the record, but the cause seems to have proceeded as if the reply had been filed. The judgment after finding the service of process by publication upon all the defendants named, except Laura Moody, and pronouncing a default judgment against them, then proceeds: "The court further finds all the issues for the plaintiff, finds that the plaintiff is the owner in fee and in possession of the land described in the petition herein, to wit, block 6 and 7, in Durham's addition to the original town of Mountain Grove, finds that none of the aforesaid defendants have any right, title, interest, or estate, either in law or equity, in and to the said real estate. Wherefore it is considered, ordered, and decreed by the court that all of said defendants, to wit, Joseph A. Dedmon, S. S. Dedmon, C. C. Dedmon, Elizabeth Durham, E. M. Durham, Adolph A. Durham, Emmett McDurham, Lizzie Kenamore, Catherine A. Hull, Samuel Coleman, J. W. Isom, and Chas. S. Churchill, and the unknown heirs of each and all of the aforesaid defendants and Laura E. Moody, defendants, be, and they are hereby, divested of any and all right, title, interest, and estate, both in law and equity, in and to said block 6 and 7, Durham's addition to the original town of Mountain Grove, and that all right, title, interest, and estate be vested, and the same hereby is vested and quieted in the plaintiff, Josephine Parkyne. It is further adjudged that the plaintiff have and recover of and from the defendant Laura E. Moody all costs in this behalf laid out and expended." It should be noted that the judgment also recited the appearance of Laura E. Moody in person and by counsel. From this judgment Laura E. Moody has appealed. Such states the condition of affairs in the trial court. In this court the defendant appealing is met with a motion to dismiss her appeal. The motion is of length, but its effect is to challenge the sufficiency of the abstract filed in this court. Further outline of the case can be properly omitted in the statement, and additional matter be left to the opinion.

[1] 1. The motion to dismiss the appeal must be overruled. However defective the abstract of record may be as to other matters, there is a proper abstract of the pleadings and judgment. Under the head of "Abstract of Record" appears enough to make the record proper a matter of review by this court, and in such case a motion to dismiss the appeal is never sustained. The question has been so frequently ruled by this court that a mere statement of the situation will suffice. The motion to dismiss the appeal is therefore overruled.

[2] 2. Refusing to absolutely dismiss the appeal, however, does not relieve the defendant of all of the difficulties in this court. Respondent's motion points out many things going to show that we can only consider upon this appeal the record proper. In other words, that all matters of exceptions are precluded from a review here, by reason of defects in the abstract filed. Respondent challenges the sufficiency of this record, and on such challenge stands. She does not brief the merits of the case. To our mind her objections to the abstract of record are well taken. There is a commingling of record proper and matters of exceptions to such an extent that it is impossible to say what is included for record proper, and what included as matters of exceptions. It cannot be determined from this abstract whether the motion for new trial was preserved in a bill of exceptions or not. We have stated above that there is a caption in the abstract of record entitled "Abstract of Record," and under this caption we find the pleadings and the judgment. These matters and a preliminary statement of the case run to take a part of page 13 of the document called, "Statement, Abstract of Record, Brief and Argument of the Appellant, Laura E. Moody." Following the last sentence of the judgment on said page 13 we find: "To the rendition of which judgment the defendant Laura E. Moody then and there objected and excepted. Afterwards, to wit, on the 5th day of March, 1909, and within four days after the rendition of said judgment, the defendant Laura E. Moody filed her motion for a new trial, which motion, omitting caption, is in words and figures as follows." (Here follows motion in full, which we omit.) Upon the very heels of this motion for new trial set out in full as above stated we find on pages 14 and 15 of the so-called abstract the following matter: "Whereupon, the hearing of said motion was continued by consent of the parties until the adjourned March term of this court, to be held on the 12th day of May, 1909, when said motion was, by order of the court, overruled, to which judgment and order of the court in overruling said motion the defendant by her counsel then and there duly objected and excepted. Thereupon, on the same day, the defendant filed her application and affidavit for an appeal to the Supreme Court, which was by the court granted, and the defendant given until the 1st day of August, 1909, to file her bill of exceptions. On the 17th day of July, 1909, the bill of exceptions in this case was assigned by Argus Cox, judge of the circuit court of Wright county, Mo., and the same was on the 23d day of July, 1909, filed in the office of the circuit clerk of Wright county, Mo. Whereupon the clerk in vacation made and entered of record the following record entry: 'Josephine Parkyne v. Joseph A. Dedmon et al. Now on the 23rd day of July, 1909, comes defendant, Laura E. Moody, by her attorneys, it being within the time allowed by the court to file bill of exceptions and files her bill of exceptions in this cause.' At the beginning of the trial the following agreement between the parties to this suit was taken and entered of record." Under the caption "Evidence in the Cause," as above set out, we find the next 15 pages setting out the evidence heard upon the trial, and then, on page 30 of the document, is this conclusion: "Defendants offered in evidence a deed from Charles S. Churchill to Laura E. Moody, conveying his interest in these lots to her. Defendants thereupon rested in chief. Plaintiff rested. Defendant rested." On page 31 is found the "Assignments of Errors." Pages 32 and 33 the "Points and Authorities." The remaining two pages is what is called the "Argument."

From this brief outline it is clear that it does not appear whether a motion for new trial was ever preserved in a bill of exceptions. It is placed under the caption of "Abstract of Record." A bill of exceptions is not mentioned until we reach page 15 of the document here challenged. On that page we have a recital of its filing and the record entry showing its filing. After this there is no mention of a motion for new trial. After this mention of a bill of exception we have the evidence set out, and we might possibly be justified in concluding that such evidence was in the bill of exceptions, although there is no statement that it was in fact preserved therein. But the motion for new trial and the exception to the action of the court in overruling it are not so advantageously located. This comes before the mention of a bill of exceptions, and under the heading of "Abstract of Record." The abstract filed by applicant is fatally defective, and leaves for our consideration only the record proper. Jackson v. Bolt & Nut Co., 238 Mo. loc. cit. 660, 141 S. W. 1128; Kolokas v. Railroad, 223 Mo. loc. cit. 460, 122 S. W. 1082, and causes there cited and reviewed therein.

[3, 4] 3. With all matters of exceptions beyond our review several points made in the brief become unavailing. The motion to strike out is a lost error, for, if it be treated as a pure motion, its place is in the bill of exceptions, and not in the record proper. If, on the other hand, it be treated as a demurrer, it is a part of the record proper, but cannot be considered here, because the defendant answered over, thereby waiving a demurrer or any motion in the nature of a demurrer. A like rule would apply to the demurrer proper.

[6] Going next to the record proper to which our right to review is limited by defendant's failure to abstract her record properly, we find a good petition, and a decree which responds to at least one count of the petition, if not to both. In such case we are forced to affirm the judgment.

Let the judgment be affirmed. All concur.

HEINTZ v. MOORE.

(Supreme Court of Missouri. Division No. 1.
Nov. 30, 1912.)

1. ACKNOWLEDGMENT (§ 5*) — CONTRACT OF SALE—RECORD.

Where a contract for the sale of land was not acknowledged by the grantor, though signed by her with the grantee who did acknowledge it, it was not entitled to record.

Appeal from Circuit Court, St. Louis County; John W. McElhinney, Judge.

Action by William Heintz against John Moore. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Stevens & Braden, of Clayton, for appellant. Pearce & Davis, of St. Louis, for respondent.

GRAVES, P. J. Plaintiff by his petition seeks to have the court ascertain and determine the title to a small tract of land in St. Louis county, Mo. Petition is in approved form under old section 650. Plaintiff is the immediate grantee by law from Annie E. Hiett, who is treated throughout as the common source of title.

By answer the defendant admits that the plaintiff was in possession of the property, and that he claimed an interest therein. He further set up what he alleged to be a contract of sale between him and Mrs. Hiett. Plaintiff now claims that the contract pleaded by defendant is not the one offered in evidence, and makes the point of a variance. This will meet with disposition in the opinion. Suffice it now to say that, whatever be the contract pleaded, the contract relied upon is in evidence, and, although rather long, had best be set out, inasmuch as its legal effect is strongly assailed by the plaintiff. The contract reads:

"Kirkwood, Mo., March 21, 1908.

"Received from John Moore the sum of one hundred dollars earnest money and part purchase money for a certain parcel of improved property, lying in the county of St. Louis, state of Missouri: That tract of ground on the N. E. corner Geyer and Big Bend roads, contains about 12 acres, more or less, on which premises is situated house No. ——— which property is this day sold to ——— for the total sum of nine thousand ——— dollars payable as follows: $1500 cash, $1500 on or before six months, $1000 on or before 12 months, and subject to the deed of trust of $5000 now on the property, with interest on deferred payments to be secured by first deed of trust on said premises. The title to said property to be perfect and to be conveyed by warranty deed free from liens and encumbrances, except taxes, both general and special for the year 1908, and thereafter, and the hereinbefore noted deed of trust which the undersigned purchaser agrees to pay. If the title be found imperfect and cannot be perfected with in a reasonable time, said purchaser is to be paid the cost of examining the title, not to exceed $25.00 dollars, and earnest money to be refunded. The sale under this contract to be closed within 10 days from date on or before April 1st. and if not closed by that time, owing to the failure or neglect of the purchaser to comply with terms herein, the earnest money is to be forfeited to the seller; but for this cause the buyer shall not be released from the fulfillment of his part of this contract, if so determined by the seller. This contract is subject to the approval of the owner, and also subject to restrictions now on said property. Sale under this contract, when approved by owner, to be closed at the office of Benjamin F. Thomas, Kirkwood, Mo.

"Accepted under the above terms and conditions. John H. Moore.

"I hereby approve the above contract and agree to pay Benjamin F. Thomas a commission of 5%. Annie E. Hiett.

"This receipt to be returned to this office on closing of purchase.

"State of Missouri, County of St. Louis—ss.: On this, 2nd of April, 1908, before me personally appeared John Moore to me known to be the person described in and who executed the forgoing instrument and acknowledged that he executed the same as his free act and deed. In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and affixed by official seal at my office in St. Louis county, the day and year first above written.

"My term expires May 2, 1909. J. G. Hawkens, Notary Public."

This contract was filed for record in the recorder's office of St. Louis county on March 3, 1908, and was duly recorded prior to the conveyance by Mrs. Hiett to the plaintiff. By oral proof it is made clearly to appear that Mrs. Hiett alone breached the contract, and that the defendant, Moore, did all that he could to comply with its terms. The cash payment was tendered. The deed of trust was prepared and tendered. In fact, it is not seriously contended that Moore did not do everything in his power to secure the deed from Mrs. Hiett under this writing, and that she refused. It should be further noted that the evidence fails to disclose that the plaintiff had actual knowledge of this contract at the time he took the deed. This succinctly states the issue involved. The learned trial judge in a written memorandum thus disposed of the case: "The contract offered in evidence is not an agreement by Mrs. Hiett to convey or sell to the defendant Moore. It is a receipt from Moore for money paid by himself on a sale of real estate; but it does not appear to whom the property is sold or by whom it is sold. According to the claim of the answer, defendant was a purchaser from Mrs. Hiett. The contract was recorded, after acknowledgment by the defendant Moore. It was never acknowledged by Mrs. Hiett, and the record of it was not constructive notice to any person claiming under her. There is no evidence of actual notice. For this reason, at least, the defendants have failed to show any title or interest. Finding and decrees for plaintiff, with costs."

From a judgment in accordance with this memoranda opinion the defendant appeals. Points made will be taken in this order.

1. It is urged in the briefs here that the instrument relied upon by defendant is totally defective in substance and form, and did not operate to give Moore any interest in the land. It is urged that it only purports to be a receipt from Moore to himself for $100, and an agreement by him to convey the land described. It is also urged that the written instrument does not show an agreement upon the part of Mrs. Hiett to convey the land. To say the very least of it, the written instrument relied upon is very awkwardly worded, and whether it is such as to carry with it any interest or rights is extremely doubtful. In view of another question, we need not go into a discussion of the force and effect of this written instrument. We have set it out in full, with the acknowledgment thereto attached for another purpose, which we discuss next.

[1] 2. The next contention of the plaintiff is that, although it be conceded that the written instrument upon its face is a good contract between Mrs. Hiett and Mr. Moore for the conveyance of the land in dispute, yet such contract was never acknowledged by Mrs. Hiett, and the mere spreading it upon record did not give notice to the plaintiff. This contention is so plainly well taken that we desist from a discussion of the real force and effect of the written instrument. It will be observed that the instrument divides itself into three parts: (1) That which precedes the signature of John H. Moore; (2) that portion between the signature of Moore and the signature of Mrs. Hiett; and (3) a short sentence following the signature of Mrs. Hiett. But, however these portions may be put together, and whatever may be its legal effect as between the parties, when they are put together, it is clear that the instrument is not acknowledged by Mrs. Hiett. If the instrument was intended to affect title to real estate, it must be acknowledged by the grantor or proposed grantor before it is entitled to record. This is not a case of defective acknowledgment, but a case of no acknowledgment at all, so far as the real grantor is concerned. As to Mrs. Hiett, the instrument was not entitled to record.

[2] As the instrument was not entitled to record as one affecting the title to real estate, the next question is, Does the fact that it was recorded change the situation as to notice to subsequent purchasers from Mrs. Hiett? Stated differently, does the actual record of an instrument not entitled to record make such recorded instrument constructive notice? Under the rulings in this state, we think not. In the later case of Williams v. Butterfield, 182 Mo. loc. cit. 184, 81 S. W. 616, we thus dispose of the point in hand: "There is but one vital proposition involved in this cause presented for our consideration. That is this: Was the record of the deed from Bohlicke and wife to Wolfenden, embracing the land in dispute, admissible in evidence in this cause for the purpose of fixing constructive notice upon plaintiff of the sale of the land prior to his (plaintiff's) purchase? The record of this deed, as offered in evidence, does not show any certificate of acknowledgment by Henry Bohlicke, the grantor in said deed. Under the statute, it must be conceded that this deed was not entitled to be recorded, by reason of the absence of such acknowledgment. Section 2418, R. S. 1889. It follows from this, if the general rule is applicable to this deed, that, in the absence of the certificate of acknowledgment required by the statute, it had no place upon the land records of Stoddard county, and, if improperly recorded, would not impart constructive notice to a subsequent purchaser in good faith for a valuable consideration. Sections 2419 and 2420, R. S. 1889; Bishop v. Schneider, 46 Mo. 472 [2 Am. Rep. 533]; Terrell v. Andrew County, 44 Mo. 309." In that case, as in this, the owner of the land and the purposed grantor in the written instrument had not acknowledged it. So we say in the case at bar that, it appearing from the evidence that the plaintiff had no actual knowledge of this so-called contract, the record thereof gave him no notice, and his purchase in good faith cannot be disturbed.

The judgment nisi was for the right party, and it is affirmed. All concur.

CARTER v. SPRACKLIN et al.

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 1.
Nov. 30, 1912.)

1. BOUNDARIES (§ 36*)—SURVEYS—EVIDENCE.

Rev. St. 1909, § 11,301, providing that, with certain exceptions, no survey except those made by the county surveyor or his deputy shall be legal evidence, merely makes the official survey prima facie correct, and does not prevent the introduction in evidence of surveys made by private or other public surveyors, where their correctness has been first shown.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Boundaries, Cent. Dig. §§ 160-162, 164, 166-176; Dec. Dig. § 36.*]

2. BOUNDARIES (§ 54*)—SURVEYS—EVIDENCE.

A survey is not admissible as an official survey where it appears on its face or from competent evidence that it was not made as the statute directs.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Boundaries, Cent. Dig. §§ 263, 268-277; Dec. Dig. § 54.*]

3. BOUNDARIES (§ 40*) — EVIDENCE — JURY QUESTION.

Where, in ejectment, the evidence upon a disputed boundary contradicted the prima facie case made out by an official survey, the issue was for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Boundaries, Cent. Dig. §§ 196-204; Dec. Dig. § 40.*]

4. BOUNDARIES (§ 54*) — INSTRUCTION — EVIDENCE.

Where the plaintiff introduced, on the issue of a disputed boundary, not only the official survey, but also evidence contradictory thereto, the court properly refused plaintiff's requested instruction that the survey made by the county surveyor was presumptively correct; the court being bound to instruct for plaintiff only upon the case as made out by all his evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Boundaries, Cent. Dig. §§ 263, 268-277; Dec. Dig. § 54.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jasper County; Hugh Dabbs, Judge.

Ejectment by Harriet E. Carter against E. E. Spracklin and others. From judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

This is a suit in ejectment, brought by the plaintiff against the defendants to recover the possession of a strip of ground three feet wide off of the south side of lot 71, in the original town of Webb City, Jasper county, Mo. Said lot 71 has a frontage of — feet on Webb street and a depth of — feet on Daugherty street; the exact dimensions of said lot not appearing, though I suppose it was quite a large tract of land. The latter street runs east and west, and the former north and south. A trial was had in the circuit court of that county, which resulted in a judgment in favor of the defendants; and, after moving unsuccessfully for a new trial, the plaintiff duly appealed the cause to this court.

The "Webb estate," so designated in the record, is the common source of title. The plaintiff's deed, dated October 11, 1904, conveys to him a lot of ground described as commencing at a point on Webb street 50 feet north of the north line of Daugherty street, and running west 142 feet, thence north 66 feet, thence east 142 feet, thence south 66 feet to the point of beginning. The deed of defendants is dated March 22, 1888, and conveys to them by metes and bounds a lot of ground 50 feet front on Webb street by 142 feet on Daugherty street in the southeast corner of that part of lot 71, in original town of Webb City, lying north of Daugherty street. This controversy arises over the proper location of Daugherty street. In order to make out the plaintiff's case, he introduced two witnesses, namely: William Kohlman, the county surveyor of Jasper county, and W. E. Smith, the city engineer of Webb City. According to the testimony of the former, the defendants occupy said three feet of plaintiff's lot, and, according to the latter, they occupy only a narrow strip thereof, 7½ inches wide at one end and 4 inches at the other. The evidence for the defendants shows that at the time of the trial there was a fence standing between the houses of plaintiff and the defendants, and that it had been there for more than 20 years, and stood about 3 feet north of the defendants' north line; that defendants never claimed more than the 50 feet of ground described in their deed of March 22, 1888; that shortly after defendants purchased said 50 feet of ground they erected a building on it practically covering the entire lot. The south line of the building stands on the north line of Daugherty street and the east line thereof stands on the west line of Webb street.

Currey, Owen & Farris, of Webb City, for appellant. Frank L. Farlow, of Webb City, for respondents.

WOODSON, J. (after stating the facts as above). 1. The questions here presented by the record are propositions of law, and grow out of the action of the trial court in refusing to give two instructions asked by appellant. The first was a mandatory instruction directing the jury to find for the plaintiff, and the second declared that, under the law, a survey of the county surveyor was presumptively valid and correct. We will consider these two propositions in the inverse order as stated.

[1] The position of counsel for plaintiff is this: That under section 11,301, R. S. 1909, the survey introduced in evidence, made by Mr. Kohlman, the county surveyor of Jasper county, is presumptively correct, and must be accepted as such until it is, by competent evidence, shown to be incorrect, and that (quote) "while the survey of W. E. Smith must be shown to be correct, and the survey itself of this nonofficial surveyor is not admissible as evidence, even if shown to be correct." Said section 11,301 of R. S. 1909 reads as follows: "What survey shall be legal evidence.—No survey or resurvey, hereafter made by any person, except that of the county surveyor or his deputy, shall be considered legal evidence in any court in this state, except such surveys as are made by the authority of the United States or by mutual consent of the parties." This section of the statute came before this court for construction in the case of Hopper v. Hickman, 145 Mo. 411, 46 S. W. 973, and it was there held, and properly so in our opinion, that this statute does not disqualify any surveyor, private or official, from testifying in relation to surveys made by him. Clearly the design of the Legislature in enacting that section was to make a survey made by a county surveyor prima facie evidence of its correctness without first establishing its correctness by parol or other competent evidence. There is nothing in the letter or spirit of said section which indicates that surveys made by private or other public surveyors shall not be introduced in evidence, where their correctness has first, by competent evidence, been shown to be such.

We are cited to the case of Clark v. McAtee, 227 Mo. 152, 127 S. W. 37, as announcing a contrary rule. The writer is perfectly familiar with that case, he having written the opinion therein; and we have no hesitancy whatever in saying that there is no conflict between that case and the case of Hopper v. Hickman, supra. The court in the Clark-McAtee Case simply held that a survey made by the county surveyor was prima facie correct, and needed no evidence in the first instance to establish its prima facie character.

[2] But, in order to be held an official survey, it must be made as the statute directs; and that where it appears from the face of the survey itself, or where it is shown by competent evidence, that it was not so made, it cannot be admitted in evidence as an official record; also, that the only authority for admitting such surveys in evidence as official records is the statutes which authorize them to be made, and which direct them to be recorded. Under this view of the law, the survey made by the county surveyor was properly admitted in evidence, and it made out a prima facie case, which, of course, could be overthrown or disproved by any competent evidence.

[3] But counsel for plaintiff did not rest his case upon the prima facie case made by the official survey introduced in evidence, but went farther, if I correctly understand the record, and introduced W. E. Smith, the city engineer of Webb City, as a witness, who it seems also made a survey of the land in controversy, which was also introduced in evidence by plaintiff. As previously shown, according to the survey made by the county surveyor, the defendants were in possession of the entire three feet of ground claimed by the plaintiff, but, according to the testimony of Smith, the city engineer, and the survey made by him, defendants are in possession of only a narrow strip thereof, 7½ inches wide at one end and 4 inches at the other. By this evidence the plaintiff contradicted the prima facie case he made by the official survey introduced, or, at least, all of it except as to the narrow strip mentioned. In addition to the foregoing testimony introduced by plaintiff, the respondents introduced Samuel Bell, a former city engineer of said city, who it was shown was perfectly familiar with the premises and had located the sidewalks, curbs, and gutters on Daugherty and Webb streets. He testified in effect, among other things, that defendants were in the possession of no part of the plaintiff's ground. This evidence of the respondents, as well as a part of that introduced by the appellant, contradicted the prima facie case made by plaintiff, which, of course, presented a question of fact for the jury to determine. That being true, the court properly refused to give the mandatory instruction asked by appellant, telling the jury to find for him.

[4] 2. This brings us to the consideration of the action of the court in refusing the second instruction asked by the plaintiff. That instruction told the jury that the survey introduced made by the "county surveyor was presumptively valid and correct." As an abstract legal proposition, that instruction properly declared the law, but it was not error to refuse it in this case, for the reason that plaintiff did not rely upon that survey alone to make out his case, but he went further and introduced in evidence the testimony of W. E. Smith, and a survey made by him, both of which contradicted the prima facie case made by the official survey. After that had been done, it was the duty of the court to instruct the jury for plaintiff upon the case as made by all the evidence introduced by him, and not upon a portion of it. To have done so would have convicted the court of having selected out and commented upon certain portions of the evidence, and of having ignored the remainder. Clearly that would have been error. We are, therefore, of the opinion that the court properly refused said instruction.

Finding no error in the record, the judgment should be affirmed. It is so ordered. All concur.

MONTGOMERY v. GAHAGAN.(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 1.
Nov. 30, 1912.)1. JUDGMENT (§ 107*)—DISPOSAL OF ISSUES—NECESSITY.

Where an answer contained a general denial, as well as allegations of facts on which defendants based a claim for affirmative relief, defendant's refusal to plead further, after a demurrer was sustained to the affirmative part, did not leave him in default so as to warrant judgment against him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. §§ 198-200; Dec. Dig. § 107.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 499*)—REVIEW—RECORDS.

The question whether the issues raised by demurrer to part of an answer were concluded by an adverse ruling on motion to strike out cannot be raised on appeal, where the record does not show that it was brought to the attention of the lower court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2295-2299; Dec. Dig. § 499.*]

3. EJECTMENT (§ 144*)—RECOVERY FOR IMPROVEMENTS—LIEN.

A purchaser of land sued in ejectment by the vendor, on default in payment of installments of the contract price, cannot have the value of his improvements on the premises, made under a collateral contract with the vendor, charged as a lien on the land, but is limited to setting them off against the damages claimed by the vendor, since Rev. St. 1909, § 2401 et seq., giving the right to charge the improvements against the land, requires it shall be done in a separate proceeding, and is further limited to improvements made by one claiming ownership, and before notice of any adverse claim.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Ejectment, Cent. Dig. § 482; Dec. Dig. § 144.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1073*)—HARMLESS ERROR.

Where, in ejectment, a demurrer was sustained to part of the answer of defendant purchaser praying that his improvements be made a lien on the land, and, on refusal to plead further, a default judgment was rendered for plaintiff vendor, though there was also a general denial, the judgment could not be sustained on appeal, on the theory that, while defendant could set off the improvements against damages, defendant was not prejudiced, since only nominal damages were recovered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4240-4247; Dec. Dig. § 1073.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Greene County; James T. Neville, Judge.

Action in ejectment by Peter H. Montgomery against D. W. Gahagan. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

This is an action in ejectment, instituted January 15, 1907, in the Newton county circuit court, to recover a piece of ground in the city of Seneca in that county, on which a flour mill was situated.

The defendant filed an answer, in which he denied specially that plaintiff was entitled to possession of the premises, and generally denied "each and every allegation contained in said petition, except what is hereinafter specially admitted." For further answer it stated that the defendant was placed in possession of the premises under a contract executed by plaintiff to sell and convey the same to defendant, and set forth a true copy thereof. It is dated June 30, 1905, signed by the plaintiff and his wife as parties at the first part, who, by its terms, agreed that, if defendant, the party of the second part, should first make the payments and perform the covenants therein contained to be kept and performed by him, they would convey to him the premises in fee, clear of incumbrances, by warranty deed. The defendant was to pay the sum of $3,000 in 12 semiannual payments, due, respectively, on the 1st days of January and July of each year, beginning January 1, 1906, the last being due July 1, 1911, without interest. It was further provided as follows: "And in case of the failure of said party of the second part to make either of the payments or perform any of the covenants on his part hereby made and entered into, this contract shall, at the option of the parties of the first part, be forfeited and determined, and the party of the second part shall forfeit all payments made by him on this contract, and such payments shall be retained by the said parties of the first part in full satisfaction and in full liquidation of all damages by them sustained and they shall have the right to re-enter and take possession of the premises aforesaid; and it is mutually agreed by and between the parties hereto that in construing this contract time shall be an essential." These payments were evidenced by promissory notes, payable as stated above. The answer then proceeded to state that the premises in suit consisted of lands on which was situated a small steam flouring mill in a crude, unfinished, and dilapidated condition, erected in 1901; that it was operated for a year or more and then abandoned for about two years, and, at the time of its purchase by defendant, had so deteriorated as to be almost valueless; that its abandonment by plaintiff was brought about by financial embarrassment due to the incapacity of the mill to earn a profit without large improvements and additions to its equipment, and plaintiff consented and agreed that the improvements must be made before it could be successfully operated; that by reason of these facts plaintiff sold to defendant and put him in possession of the mill on deferred payments, without interest, and that defendant would have to expend large sums of money in rebuilding and improvements and additions to said mill, and it was agreed that defendant would add a complete and finished corn-milling plant, a large platform wagon scales with dump and suitable shed over the same, with corn drag and wheat conveyors from said dump, and additional elevators in the mill; "that in consideration of the improvements and additions to be made on said mill, and in consideration of the very large expenditure of money by the defendant, the plaintiff sold to defendant the said milling plant and the land as described, as aforesaid, without the payment of any sum of money in advance by defendant to plaintiff, it being agreed and understood that said improvements and additions were absolutely necessary to put the mill in a serviceable condition; that it was agreed and understood by and between the plaintiff and defendant that said improvements and additions to be made at the cost and expense of the defendant would amply secure the plaintiff for any default in the deferred payments of the notes of the defendant, as aforesaid; that it was agreed and understood by and between the plaintiff and defendant that until said mill was placed in a condition to earn a profit, by making the improvements and additions as aforesaid, it would be impossible for the defendant to pay off and discharge and extinguish his said notes or any of them; that the defendant did, on being placed in possession of the premises, as aforesaid, by plaintiff, diligently proceed at once, in good faith, to the building and completion of all the aforesaid improvements and additions, and many more, under the contract and agreement by and between the plaintiff and defendant, as aforesaid, at his own expense, and did, as rapidly as possible and practical under the circumstances, put the milling plant in perfect repair and good order for successful operation; that all of said improvements and additions were made with the full knowledge and consent and contract and agreement of the plaintiff."

It then set out an itemized account of the money so expended between the date when defendant took possession of the mill and November 2, 1905, amounting to $1,822.98, and stated that defendant had paid cash on the notes, without giving dates therefor, amounting to $175, and that the mill was worth $2,500 more than at the time of the purchase, and that defendant went into possession and made the said improvements by the authority of the plaintiff, and did not hold adversely to plaintiff, but under and by authority from him, and that there were no other writings between them than the contract and notes mentioned. The answer asked judgment for the sum of $1,997.90, the amount of the expenditure for improvements and cash paid on the notes, less any amount that might be found by the court to be due for rent, and that the sum be adjudged and declared a first lien on the real estate described in the petition, including the milling plant thereon, and that plaintiff be enjoined and restrained, "or that execution be stayed by order of record of this court until such time as the plaintiff shall have paid to the defendant the amount of his judgment and filed the receipt of the defendant therefor with the clerk of this court; that all of defendant's notes described in the plaintiff's articles of agreement be canceled and for naught held and esteemed by the order and judgment of this court, and for such other and further relief as may be proper." The plaintiff then filed its motion to strike out "the following portion of defendant's answer, viz., beginning with the ninth line on the fourth page of defendant's answer, and including all the portion following, except the prayer, the same being that portion of defendant's answer that attempts to charge the plaintiff with the value of improvements," for the reason, among others, that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, or entitle the defendant to any relief. This motion was overruled by the court, and thereupon the plaintiff applied for, and the court granted, a change of venue, transferring the case to the Greene county circuit court, where the plaintiff filed a demurrer to the answer, which, omitting the title, is in words and figures as follows: "Now comes the plaintiff and demurs to the defendant's answer excepting the general denial, for the following reasons, viz.: (1) Said answer does not state facts sufficient to constitute any cause of action against plaintiff or any defense to plaintiff's action. (2) Upon the allegations of defendant's answer, the plaintiff is entitled to recovery." The demurrer was thereupon sustained by the court, and, the defendant refusing to plead further, the court entered a judgment by default against him and, proceeding to hear evidence, found all the issues for plaintiff, and assessed his damages at one cent and the value of the monthly rents and profits at $20 per month, and entered judgment for the possession of the property, together with the damages and monthly rental.

James H. Pratt, of Neosho, A. D. Bennett, of Vinita, Okl., and A. J. Clarity, for appellant. M. E. Benton, Horace Ruark, and Barton J. Morrow, all of Neosho, for respondent.

BROWN, C. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. The sustaining of the demurrer so emasculated the answer that it contained nothing but a general denial. This constitutes a complete defense to the cause of action stated in the petition. It was therefore error for the court to enter default and proceed thereon to final judgment while it stood as a pleading in the case.

[2] The defendant, however, in the part of the answer held insufficient on demurrer, had pleaded a special defense inconsistent with the general denial, in that it set up that he was in possession of the premises under the plaintiff by virtue of a contract of purchase which had already become subject to forfeiture. In avoidance of this admission, he pleaded certain matters which he claims entitled him to rescind the contract and to have affirmative relief, and he now claims that as to these matters the demurrer was improperly sustained, and his real defense eliminated.

The first ground urged by defendant in support of this contention is that the same questions had been previously raised by motion to strike out substantially the same parts of the same answer, and that the overruling of this motion constituted a final adjudication of all the questions so raised. Ordinarily this result, by which black may be made white and the crooked straight by the dictum of the court, can only proceed from a final judgment. This seems to accord with both the letter and spirit of our own practice, in which all the decisions of the court made in course of a trial are, if questioned, required to be reviewed upon the motion for a new trial, so that the court may then have an opportunity of correcting and revising its decisions. The question, however, does not seem to have been made or preserved in this record, where there is nothing to show that it was brought to the attention of the court. The defendant might have waived it, and gone directly to the merits of the controversy. If he did not desire to do this, he could have made his motion to strike out the demurrer, or could have taken such other course upon the record as would apprise the court of his intention. Having failed to do so, he will not be permitted to raise the question in this court. We do not think that there is anything in this inconsistent with any expression of Judge Sherwood in Baisley v. Baisley, 113 Mo. 544, 550, 21 S. W. 29, 35 Am. St. Rep. 726.

[3] 2. The contract of purchase under which the defendant was in possession provided, as we have seen, that if he should fail to make any payments that it required it should, at the option of the vendor, be forfeited and determined, and the payments theretofore made upon it should be retained in full satisfaction of all damages sustained by him, and that he might re-enter and take possession of the premises. The exercise of this option would thus extinguish, not only the right to charge the unpaid purchase price upon the land, but also his right to damages up to the time of such forfeiture and re-entry therefor. The answer pleaded, in connection with this contract, that there was a contemporaneous oral agreement that the defendant should make certain improvements, which were necessary before the mill could be operated, which, it was agreed, would increase the security of the plaintiff for the deferred payments of the purchase price, and which were therefore intended for the benefit of the plaintiff as well as of the defendant, and that the defendant made these improvements at an expenditure of $1,822.98, and thereby increased the value of the property to the extent of $2,500. Having done this, he failed to make the payments as they became due, and the plaintiff, by this suit, has exercised his election to forfeit the contract and re-enter the premises, and now asserts that he is entitled to not only the liquidated damages provided in the contract, amounting to $175 paid him upon the purchase price, but also to have the improvements made in compliance with the oral agreement. This, he says, is so nominated in the obligation; while the defendant asserts that he has, in equity, the right to be reimbursed for the improvements and have the same charged upon the body of the property on which they were made. This difference in opinion is the foundation of the real question in the case. It was directly presented by the demurrer to that part of the answer stricken out by the court.

At the time the common law of England was brought to this country by our ancestors, the action of ejectment was an altogether fictitious proceeding, in which the damages were nominal only; and it remained so in those states in which the common law was adopted until changed by statute. The owner recovered his land without being required to pay for improvements, which were considered as annexed to the freehold and passing with recovery. Another remedy was given the plaintiff for his injury by being kept out of the premises in the way of an action of trespass for mesne profits. Sedgwick on Damages (9th Ed.) § 901. This action is a liberal and equitable one, which will allow every equitable kind of defense. Id. § 915, and note. Nothing is more reasonable than that the bona fide possessor of land should be reimbursed out of the rentals for valuable and permanent improvements made by him, in good faith, while in possession, with the consent and at the instance of the owner; and we find that the practice of permitting such compensation to be offset in actions for mesne profits has prevailed both in this country and in England for many years. For instance, in Coulter's Case, 3 Coke, 30, decided more than 300 years ago, it was said: "The disseisor shall recoup all the damages which he hath expended in amending the houses." And in Viner's Abridgment, title "Discount," case 3, it was said: "Damage of 40 shillings and no more was found by the assize, because the land sown and the houses well amended and so recouped the damages." Approaching nearer to our own time, it was said by Kent, J., in Murray v. Gouverneur, 2 Johns. Cas. (N. Y.) 438, 1 Am. Dec. 177: "As to the sum expended by the appellant for repairs, it may be left for liquidation in an action for the mesne profits, if the respondents should think proper to sue for the rents and profits. The action for mesne profits is a liberal and equitable action, and will allow of every kind of equitable defense." In our own state this right of recoupment was not considered broad enough to permit the doing of justice in all cases, inasmuch as it afforded the occupant no relief, except out of the rents and profits, while it was thought that in those cases in which the occupants make improvements not only in good faith, believing themselves to have good title, but not having any notice of the title or claim asserted by the true owner, they should have a broader and more complete remedy. To meet this supposed want, the law was enacted which is now embodied in section 2401, and following, of the Revised Statutes of 1909. That this law was not intended to take away any remedy that had theretofore existed, but to afford a more complete remedy out of the body of the improved estate in those cases that come within its provisions, is settled by numerous adjudications in this state. Mann v. Doerr, 222 Mo. 1, 121 S. W. 86; Dawkins v. Griffin, 195 Mo. 430, 94 S. W. 525; Tice v. Fleming, 173 Mo. 49, 72 S. W. 689, 96 Am. St. Rep. 479; Henderson v. Langley, 76 Mo. 226; Fenwick v. Gill, 38 Mo. 510; Dothage v. Stuart, 85 Mo. 251.

In those jurisdictions where the recovery of rents and profits in ejectment is permitted, the same rule applies as in actions for mesne profits at common law. The improvements may be recouped against the damages recovered on account of rents and profits. It is recognized that this is just, because, in most cases, as in this, it is the improvements that earn the rental. In cases arising under the Missouri statute to which we have referred, a separate suit must be brought, according to the practice there prescribed, to charge the improvements against the land. The statute, however, takes away no right of this character that existed before the enactment. It excludes by its terms all actions between vendor and vendee and between landlord and tenant, because vendees and tenants have notice of the titles of their vendors and landlords. It is useless to speculate here as to what other relations, in which the common-law remedy was so allowed, may be included in or excluded from the terms of this statute; but one or the other of these remedies applies in all cases in which the right existed at common law.

[4] While the defendant is not entitled to the relief he asks in his answer, we think the facts stated constitute a good defense against the damages alleged in the petition. The plaintiff had, as was his right, exercised his election to forfeit the contract of sale, instead of proceeding to collect the purchase price by charging it upon the land, which would have permitted the defendant to reimburse himself for his improvements out of any surplus which might be left after satisfying that claim. This left no other course open to defendant than to seek, somewhere in the proceeding, compensation for his improvements, made not only with the acquiescence of, but under an agreement with, the plaintiff. He filed an answer disclosing his rights, which was held bad on demurrer; and, notwithstanding his general denial was still left, a default was entered and immediately proceeded upon to final judgment. That this was in direct disregard of the statute cannot be questioned; but it is answered that as only nominal damages were assessed no substantial right of the defendant was violated. It is a sufficient answer to this to say that the plaintiff, in pursuit of his strict legal rights, must conform to the remedies the law has prescribed as conditions to its aid.

The judgment of the Greene county circuit court is accordingly reversed, and the cause remanded to be proceeded with in accordance with this opinion.

PER CURIAM. The foregoing opinion of BROWN, C., is adopted as the opinion of the court. All concur.

1. EXCEPTIONS, BILL OF (§ 56*)—FILING—RECORD.

The judge's statement, at the end of a paper purporting to be a bill of exceptions, that it was allowed, signed, sealed, "filed, and made a part of the record," does not prove that fact, but merely shows that it was signed in proper form and ready to file.

BROWN, C. This is a suit for $20,000 damages for personal injuries alleged to have been suffered by the plaintiff from falling off a defective sidewalk in defendant city. It was instituted in the circuit court for the county of St. Louis, from which it was removed to the circuit court for the city of St. Louis, in which the transcript was filed February 7, 1908. The cause seems to have been tried at the June term, 1908, of that court. The trial resulted in a verdict for defendant, which was set aside upon motion for a new trial, upon the ground that the court had erred in giving improper instructions at defendant's request. The appeal is taken from the order sustaining the motion for a new trial, as is shown by the short transcript filed. The abstract of the record consists of the certified transcript of the proceedings in the circuit court for St. Louis county. It contains no entry whatever from the records of the circuit court for the city of St. Louis.

[1] Following the transcript is what purports to be a "bill of exceptions," beginning as follows: "Be it remembered that, on the 20th day of April, 1908, at the April term, the above-entitled cause came on for trial in division No. 4 of said court, before Hon. Matt G. Reynolds, Judge, and a jury, and the following proceedings were had therein, to wit." Then follows the evidence, the instructions of the court, the verdict, the motion for a new trial, and the statement that it was sustained, and time granted to file a bill of exceptions. It then closes as follows: "Inasmuch as the above matters and things do not appear of record, and in order that they may be preserved and made of record, and presented to the Supreme Court of Missouri for review, the defendant tenders this its bill of exceptions, and prays that the same may be allowed, signed, sealed, filed, and made a part of the record in this cause, which is accordingly done this 20th day of November, 1908, in the October term of said court. Matt G. Reynolds, Judge of the Circuit Court, City of St. Louis, State of Missouri, Division No. 4." The abstract contains nothing more. It will be seen that it does not appear from it that any order was entered upon the records of the circuit court for the city of St. Louis during the progress of the case. If the statement, contained in the paper entitled "Bill of Exceptions," that a motion for a new trial was filed and overruled, would otherwise raise a sufficient implication of those facts, we are still confronted with the difficulty that, although the judge's statement at the end of the bill recites that it was allowed, signed, sealed, filed, and made a part of the record in term time, this has no tendency to prove that fact, but merely shows that it was signed in proper form and ready to file in the court whenever the appellant should think proper to do so.

[2, 3] Under the repeated decisions of this court that matters of exception will not be reviewed here unless it is shown in the abstract of the record proper that a bill of exceptions was actually filed, as well as signed, and that matters required to be presented in a motion for a new trial will not be reviewed unless it appears from the abstract of the record entry of the court that such motion was filed and passed on, the only question involved in this appeal is not so presented that we can examine and determine it. Noble v. Brinson, 231 Mo. 640, 132 S. W. 1068; Wallace v. Libby, 231 Mo. 341, 132 S. W. 665, and cases cited. It is seldom that our attention has been directed to a more flagrant disregard of this rule, which has been enforced with such uniformity that there can no longer be any reasonable excuse for its violation.

It follows that the order and judgment of the circuit court granting a new trial must be affirmed.

PER CURIAM. The foregoing opinion of BROWN, C., is adopted as the opinion of the court. All concur.

STATE ex rel. McDERMOTT REALTY CO.
et al. v. McELHINNEY, Judge.

(Supreme Court of Missouri. Nov. 26, 1912.)

1. PRIVATE ROADS (§ 2*)—PROCEEDINGS FOR ESTABLISHMENT—PETITION.

Under Rev. St. § 10,447, providing that if any inhabitant shall present a petition setting forth that he is the owner of land and that no public road passes through or touches it, and asking for the establishment of a private road at some convenient point, the court shall appoint commissioners, it is not necessary that the petition aver that the petitioner is an inhabitant of the state, although proof of that fact is jurisdictional.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Private Roads, Cent. Dig. §§ 3-21; Dec. Dig. § 2.*]

2. PRIVATE ROADS (§ 2*)—PROCEEDINGS FOR ESTABLISHMENT—APPEAL TO THE CIRCUIT COURT—PROOF OF JURISDICTIONAL FACTS.

In view of Rev. St. 1909, § 4091, providing that appeals from the county courts shall be determined in the manner governing appeals from a justice's court, and that they shall be heard de novo in the circuit court, and as an appeal in a proceeding to establish a private road is not governed by section 10,440, which controls appeals in proceedings to establish public roads, but by section 3956, providing that the circuit court shall have jurisdiction of all appeals from the county court unless otherwise provided for, the record of the proceeding to establish a private road, begun in a county court, need not, to confer jurisdiction on the circuit court to hear the appeal, show that the petitioner was a citizen of the state.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Private Roads, Cent. Dig. §§ 3-21; Dec. Dig. § 2.*]

3. MANDAMUS (§ 31*)—PROCEEDING WITH SUIT.

As it is not a function of a writ of mandamus to direct the course of judicial action, but the writ may issue to compel a judicial officer to proceed with the cause, mandamus may issue to a circuit court judge to proceed with a cause to establish a private road, though it is improper to direct the appointment of commissioners or in any way govern his action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. §§ 74, 75; Dec. Dig. § 31.*]

In Banc. Original application for mandamus by the State, on the relation of the McDermott Realty Company and another, against John M. McElhinney, as Judge of the Circuit Court of St. Louis County. Peremptory writ issued.

John C. McAtee, of Clayton, for relators. Boyle & Priest, of St. Louis, and J. O. Kiskaddon, A. E. L. Gardner, and R. H. Stevens, all of Clayton, for respondent.

KENNISH, J. This is an original proceeding in mandamus, the purpose of which is to obtain a writ from this court, commanding the respondent, as judge of the circuit court of St. Louis county, to assume jurisdiction of a proceeding pending in his said court on appeal from the county court of said county, in which relators are seeking to establish a private road, and also commanding him to appoint commissioners to lay out said road and assess damages therefor. Upon the filing of the petition an alternative writ was issued, and in due time respondent made return thereto. Relators filed a motion for judgment on the pleadings, and the cause has been submitted for decision on the issues of law thus made.

The substance of the allegations of relators' petition, briefly stated, is as follows: On August 22, 1910, they filed in the county court of St. Louis county a petition for a private road. That petition alleged that relator McDermott Realty Company, a domestic corporation, was the owner, and that relator John W. Bellairs was the lessee, of a tract of land therein described, located in said county, and that no public road passed through or touched said tract of land, and prayed that a private road be opened from said tract, through and over the lands of the United Railways Company and others, to Marine avenue, a public road in said county. Upon a hearing in the county court the petition was denied and petitioners appealed to the circuit court. The respondent, as judge of the circuit court, heard the cause on appeal, made a finding in favor of petitioners, adjudged that the petition should be granted, and remanded the cause to the county court for further proceedings therein. After the cause was so remanded, the United Railways Company instituted a suit in this court to prohibit the judges of the county court from taking further cognizance of the cause. This court held in that suit that the county court did not have jurisdiction of the proceeding, for the reason that the appeal to the circuit court gave the latter court exclusive jurisdiction, on a trial de novo, to take all action necessary to a complete determination and disposition of the proceeding. See State ex rel. v. Wiethaupt et al., 238 Mo. 155, 142 S. W. 823. The United Railways Company also prosecuted an appeal to this court from the judgment of the circuit court remanding the cause to the county court. On motion of appellees (relators herein), that appeal was dismissed because no final judgment had been entered in the circuit court and the appeal was therefore premature. The appellant filed a motion to set aside the order dismissing the appeal, and that motion was overruled by this court. See McDermott Realty Co. v. United Rys. Co., 240 Mo. 146, 144 S. W. 103. After this court had granted the writ of prohibition against the county court and had dismissed the appeal of the United Railways Company, respondent made and entered of record an order vacating so much of the former judgment of the circuit court as purported to remand the proceeding to the county court, and thereupon appointed commissioners to mark out the road and assess the damages. The commissioners laid out the road, assessed damages, and made their report to the court, to which report the United Railways Company filed exceptions. Respondent sustained the exceptions and set aside the report, on the ground that the proceedings of said commissioners were irregular and not according to law. The petitioners thereupon filed a motion to again refer the matter to the same commissioners or to appoint new commissioners to lay out the road and assess the damages. This motion was overruled, respondent giving as a reason for such ruling that the court was without jurisdiction to proceed in the case. No further steps were taken, and the cause thus remained on the docket when the alternative writ herein was issued. The prayer of the petition is that a writ of mandamus be issued, commanding respondent to again assume jurisdiction of the cause and make an order appointing new commissioners to lay out the road and assess damages or refer the matter to the former commissioners for the performance of such duties.

After setting out the history of the litigation substantially as stated in the petition, respondent alleges in the return that the term of the circuit court at which it was adjudged by him that he was without jurisdiction to proceed further has long since adjourned; that said judgment stands in full force and effect and no appeal has ever been taken therefrom. It is also alleged in the return that: "It does not appear by or in the petition of said relators for a private road, or in any of the records or proceedings of the said county court in said cause, that the relators and petitioners were inhabitants, or that either of them was an inhabitant, of this state, at the time of presenting said petition to said county court, or at any other time."

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep't Indexes

Relators contend: First, that respondent, as judge of the circuit court of St. Louis county, has jurisdiction to hear and determine the cause; and, second, that they are entitled to relief by the peremptory writ of mandamus of this court. Both of these contentions are controverted by respondent.

[1] I. In overruling the motion for the appointment of new commissioners, the court made and entered of record the following order: "Ordered by the court, after due and full consideration of the motion heretofore filed to appoint other commissioners, that the said motion be and the same is hereby denied upon the ground that the petition filed herein does not state, and the record of the county court does not show, that the petitioners are inhabitants of the state, and this court is therefore without jurisdiction to proceed further." We are of opinion that the circuit court was not without jurisdiction, and for the reasons following:

It is provided by section 10,447, Revised Statutes 1909, that: "If any inhabitant of this state shall present a petition to the county court of the proper county, setting forth that he or she is the owner of a tract or lot of land in such county, or in an adjoining county, and that no public road passes through or touches it, and asking for the establishment of a private road from his or her premises, to connect with some public road of the county in which the proceedings are had, at some convenient point, and shall describe the place where said road is desired, and the width desired, the court shall appoint three disinterested commissioners to view the premises and to mark out the road, and to assess the damages to the owner or owners of the land through which it will pass."

It will be observed that, although the statute expressly designates what facts shall be set forth in the petition, it does not require that it shall thus appear that the petitioner is an inhabitant of this state. While the right to a private road is conferred only upon "any inhabitant of this state," and therefore the record should show that the petitioner is such an inhabitant, it is not essential that such fact should appear in the petition. Snoddy v. County of Pettis, 45 Mo., loc. cit. 363; Fisher v. Davis, 27 Mo. App., loc. cit. 325. In the Snoddy Case, supra, this court said: "It is claimed that these proceedings were erroneous: First, because the petition does not show that twelve of its signers were householders of the township, etc. The statute is express that it must be signed by that number of householders, etc., three of whom shall be of the immediate neighborhood of the road. But it does not say that they shall be so described in the petition; and, if they were so described, it would have been no evidence of the fact." And in the case of Fisher v. Davis, supra, discussing the question of the sufficiency of a petition for a private road, the court said: "We can find no warrant for the assumption that the qualification of the petitioners must be recited in the body of the petition. That is a matter of evidence to be determined by the court, on the hearing of the petition."

[2] The statutory requirement as to the inhabitancy of the petitioners not being alleged in the petition, was it essential to the jurisdiction of the circuit court that it should have appeared in the record of the county court? We think not. The statutory provisions applicable to an appeal from a judgment of the county court, in a case for the establishment of a public road, are radically different from those governing an appeal in a case for the establishment of a private road, and consequently decisions as to the effect of an appeal under one proceeding are correspondingly inapplicable to a case under the other. In a public road case no appeal is allowed unless the petition is sustained in the county court, and even then the entire cause is not removed to the appellate court, nor does the appeal operate as a supersedeas of the judgment of the county court. Section 10,440, R. S. 1909; State ex rel. v. Wlethaupt et al., 238 Mo. 155, 142 S. W. 323. In such case it may well be said that such jurisdictional facts should appear of record in the county court. On the other hand, either party is entitled to an appeal in a private road case, from any judgment or order of the county court not expressly prohibited by law (section 3956, R. S. 1909; Colville v. Judy, 73 Mo. 651; State ex rel. v. Wlethaupt et al., supra), and the effect of such an appeal (section 4091, R. S. 1909) is that "the appellate court shall thereupon be possessed of such cause, and shall proceed to hear and determine the same anew, and in the same manner as if such cause had originated in such appellate court, without regarding any error, defect or informality in the proceedings of the county court." A consideration of these several provisions makes it apparent that in a private road case the county court, by its judgment, might cut off the proceedings in that court before the petitioner reached the stage of making proof of the jurisdictional facts, or might, after hearing the evidence, make an adverse finding as to such facts. And it would be a most unreasonable construction of the law to hold that, although an appeal from such judgment would remove the case to the circuit court for trial de novo, yet, because proof of certain jurisdictional facts and a finding accordingly were not shown by the record of the lower court, the appellate court was without jurisdiction of the cause. The statute (section 4091, R. S. 1909), in providing that the appellate court shall proceed to hear and determine the case "in the same manner as if such cause had originated in such appellate court," was evidently intended to prevent such an unreasonable result. In appeals from inferior courts, where provision for an unrestricted trial de novo is made, it is well-recognized law that the judgment appealed from is vacated, and any finding of fact in the lower court, although of record, does not dispense with proof of such fact on appeal. The case on appeal stands for trial anew, and the appellant has the right, and it is incumbent on him, to make proof of every material fact necessary to entitle him to judgment. Nor is it material at what stage of the proceedings such proof be made, for if made at any stage, and a finding to that effect is shown, that is all that is necessary. In the case of Chandler v. Reading, 129 Mo. App., loc. cit. 70, 107 S. W. 1041, discussing this subject, the court said: "As jurisdiction attached to hear and determine the cause by the filing of the petition and the service of notice on defendant, we think it was immaterial at what stage of the proceedings the court found the road proposed was a road of necessity, or that petitioner was an inhabitant of Pike county. It is enough to know that the court found these facts affirmatively at some stage of the proceedings; they were found and are recited in its final judgment; this is sufficient."

For the foregoing reasons we have concluded it was not essential to the jurisdiction of the circuit court that it should have appeared either in the petition or in the record of the county court that the petitioners were inhabitants of this state, and further that the circuit court was possessed of complete jurisdiction to proceed to hear and determine the cause.

[3] II. The question remains: Are the relators entitled to a peremptory writ as prayed for?

We have held that the circuit court was possessed of jurisdiction, and as respondent refused to appoint new commissioners and did not proceed with the cause, and as no final judgment from which an appeal would lie was entered, relators are entitled to relief. State ex rel. Kansas City v. Field, 107 Mo., loc. cit. 450, 17 S. W. 896. The alternative writ commanded that the respondent "assume jurisdiction of the cause of petitioners in their application for a private roadway of necessity and make an order appointing new commissioners, with like powers and duties as the former commissioners, or to order the former commissioners to again proceed with the duties enjoined upon them in their order of appointment, or show cause," etc. It is not the function of a writ of mandamus to direct the course of judicial action in a given cause, but the writ may issue to compel a respondent, clothed with judicial power, to proceed with the cause. The alternative writ commanded action in excess of that authorized in this proceeding, and therefore a peremptory writ should be issued, commanding respondent, as judge of the circuit court of St. Louis county, to assume jurisdiction of the cause and to proceed in the exercise thereof to final judgment.

It is so ordered. All concur, except WOODSON, J., not sitting.

LACLEDE-CHRISTY CLAY PRODUCTS CO. v. CITY OF ST. LOUIS et al.

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 2
Nov. 13, 1912. Rehearing Denied Dec.
10, 1912.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 654*) — STREETS—EVIDENCE OF USE—INJUNCTION— REMOVAL OF OBSTRUCTIONS.

Evidence, in an action to enjoin the removal of obstructions from a street, held to show that from 1862 to 1890 the street was a public highway which was fenced and had a well-defined track over which the public traveled, though in bad weather it was almost or entirely impassable for loaded wagons.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1428; Dec. Dig. § 654.*]

2. HIGHWAYS (§ 28*)—ESTABLISHMENT—SUF- FICIENCY OF PETITION.

An order of the county court establishing a road was void where the petition was signed only by 8 persons instead of 12, as required by law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Highways, Cent. Dig. §§ 40-46; Dec. Dig. § 28.*]

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 654*) — STREETS—ESTABLISHMENT—EVIDENCE.

In an action to enjoin the removal of obstructions from a street, a void order made by the county several years before and establishing a public road, now such street, was material to show demand for the road at that time, the county court's opinion thereon, and that the route was practical.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1428; Dec. Dig. § 654.*]

4. HIGHWAYS (§ 6*)—ESTABLISHMENT BY USE.

The use of a road for 10 years, with the acquiescence of the owner, makes it a valid road.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Highways, Cent. Dig. §§ 8, 9; Dec. Dig. § 6.*]

5. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 647*) — STREETS—TITLE.

Under St. Louis Scheme of Separation, § 10, providing that the interest of the county in public roads should vest in the city, title to a road established by use vested in the city.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1420; Dec. Dig. § 647.*]

6. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 657*) — STREETS—ABANDONMENT BY NONUSE.

Rev. St. 1909, § 10,446, providing that non-user by the public for 10 years continuously of any public road shall be an abandonment of the same, does not apply to city streets.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 722, 844, 1429, 1436; Dec. Dig. § 657.*]

7. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 657*) — STREETS—ABANDONMENT.

The right of city and public to the use of a street was not lost by abandonment or adverse possession, though the street was in the possession of individuals for more than 10 years, and though the street commissioner declared it not a street, and the city by ordinance condemned a right of way for the purpose of laying sewers and water pipes.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 722, 844, 1429, 1496; Dec. Dig. § 867.*]

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; Moses N. Sale, Judge.

Action by the Laclede-Christy Clay Products Company against the City of St. Louis and others. From a decree for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

This case involves the question as to whether Sulphur avenue, running south from Manchester avenue to Wilson avenue in the city of St. Louis, a distance of about 1,800 feet, is a valid street. The plaintiff, about two years before the trial, constructed a building known as the shipping shed, extending from the west to a point 10 feet within the alleged street. It also built a brick kiln 38 feet in diameter on the street. The city was proceeding to remove those structures as obstructions to the street when the suit was begun to enjoin such action on the part of the city. The decree was for the plaintiff, and the injunction was made perpetual. The city has appealed.

The river Des Peres' crosses the alleged street about 700 feet south of Manchester avenue. Appellant claims that Sulphur avenue has been traveled as a public highway since 1862 until within the last few years, while the respondent claims that it was never a defined and recognized line of public travel, but that such travel as there was on or near that portion south of the river was the random and irregular travel such as occurs ad libitum over open land, and not confined to a definite track; and that the travel north of the river was of the same character except in dry weather.

Our attention is called to the language used by the learned trial judge during the trial, as follows: "I am very much impressed with what evidence I have heard so far that the use that was made of that road ought not to be dignified by calling it a user. There never was any use of that road any more than there was of any open land in the county over which people might drive; there never was any road there, and never was any public work done on it, and absolutely the only thing from the testimony that would lead anybody to suppose that there was a road there was the fact that there was a bridge across the river Des Peres." Owing to that claim made by the plaintiff and the above language of the trial court, we will state at some length what are the conceded facts or facts established by the evidence for the plaintiff.

On July 24, 1862, the territory through which the street runs was outside the city and in St. Louis county. The county court of that county on that date made an order establishing the road under the name of Cheltenham avenue, now the street in controversy, 30 feet wide on the line between lots 12 and 13 in Graham's subdivision of the Sulphur Springs tract. Lot 13 is on the east and lot 12 on the west. That order was void by reason of the fact that the petition on which it was based was signed by only 8 persons instead of 12 as the law required, and it was void for other reasons not necessary to mention. In 1865 Samuel Hambleton and James Green purchased lot 13 from Thomas Allen. There were at that time several railroad tracks crossing the property near the north end, and other tracks have been built since. Mr. Green, who is the president of the plaintiff company and has been in business on that land ever since 1865, testified that he knew the land since about two years before his purchase in 1865, and that there was then "a little bit of a country road over there," and that it was fenced on both sides from Manchester avenue to Wilson avenue with good fences—plank fences—except that the part on the east side north of the river was a hedge fence. About the time the road was opened, a bridge was built by the county across the river Des Peres. The following instrument was read in evidence: "Cheltenham, Mo., May 20, 1866. To the Hon. John H. Long, St. Louis, Mo.—We, the undersigned citizens of Cheltenham, do petition the honorable county court of St. Louis county, Mo., to widen the space between the bridge and the fence of the new road at Cheltenham so that the stock can have easy access to the water"—which was signed by Charles D. Devlin and six others.

The following was also in evidence: "St. Louis, June 25th, 1866. To the Honorable County Court of St. Louis County—Gentlemen: The undersigned petitioners, having been notified to remove their fence from the stone buttments of the bridge across river Des Peres on county road at Cheltenham, Cheltenham avenue, would most respectfully beg leave to state if they should be required by your honorable body to remove the fence it would be almost impossible for them to protect their property from trespass of their neighbors' cattle. They would have to erect flood gates, which, in our opinion, would wash away at every freshet of the river, which rises and falls very rapidly, and a very large quantity of drift floats down the river at every heavy rain, and consequently would carry away any gate we could possibly construct; and, we would further state the removing of our fence would not benefit any person in the neighborhood, and the majority of the petitioners who ask for the removal of the fence are not property holders, and as we believe the petition was gotten up for the express benefit of Mr. Charles Devlin, and your petitioners would most respectfully ask your honorable body to allow our fences to remain as it now is. If granted their request, they will ever pray, etc. [Signed] Samuel Hambleton. James Green. Charles M. Field."

Also this report: "Office Genl. Road Supt., Sept. 3, 1866. To the Hon. County Court of St. Louis County—Gentlemen: The petition of Charles Devlin and others at Cheltenham, St. Louis county, for widening Cheltenham avenue, at the crossing of the river Des Peres so that the stock can have easy access to the water has been referred to me, Samuel Hambleton, James Green and Chas. M. Field, having joined their fences and the wing walls of the bridge across the said river together, have been notified to remove their fences from the property of the county, whereupon the said Samuel Hambleton, James Green and Chas. M. Field have filed their petition for allowing their fences to remain as they are, which having also been referred to me by your order, I have examined the place of complaint, and beg leave to report as follows: Cheltenham avenue is 30 feet wide, and the bridge is in the middle of the road; the bridge and wing walls occupy 26.4 feet in width, so that 1.9 feet space will be left between the wing walls and the fences to give the stock access to the water in case the fences should be removed; this narrow space is, in my opinion, insufficient for stock to strain itself through the narrow space into the said river. No stock of any kind can go back easy, because the river bank is too steep and the space between the wing walls too narrow. If Cheltenham avenue would be 40 feet wide I should recommend the opening of the said river, but as the width is only 30 feet and the stock cannot get an easy access to the water, I respectfully recommend to allow the fences to remain as they are. Respectfully, your obedient servant, John Alt, Genl. Road Superintendent."

Also the following: "St. Louis, January, 23rd, 1875. To the Hon. County Court of St. Louis County—Gentlemen: We, the undersigned citizens and property owners of Central township, petition your honorable body to grant your disposition regarding the grading of Cheltenham avenue from the Old Manchester road to the New Manchester road"—which was signed by the Laclede Fire Brick Company, by James Green, president, and by 45 others.

And this report:

"County Engineer's Office, February 22, 1875. Hon. County Court, St. Louis County—Gentlemen: I beg leave to report the following upon this petition referred to me, of Charles B. Gratiot et al., for the grading of Cheltenham avenue. The avenue has a width of only 30 feet, and is about a mile in length connecting the Market street road at Cheltenham, with the Old Manchester road, near the Watson road. It passes over very rough and steep ground, and to excavate it, even to very steep grades will require quite a large amount of work. A new bridge also will have to be built over the river Des

Peres, as the present one will not be adequate if the avenue is to be improved. The following is an estimate of the approximate cost of improving said avenue, as called for in the petition, viz:

|---|------------------|
| Excavation, 14,000 cu. yds. at 20 cts. | $2,800 00 |
| Bridge & culvert masonry 300 perches at $5 | 1,500 00 |
| 56 lineal feet of new superstructure, at $12 | 672 00 |
| | <hr/> $4,972 00 |

"As this road is under the control of the general road superintendent, I am unable to say whether this amount can be spared at the present time from his appropriation to be applied to the improvement petitioned for. Respectfully, yours obediently, John G. Kelly, County Engineer."

Also the following: "Office General Road Superintendent. St. Louis, April 19, 1875. To the Hon. County Court—Gentlemen: Respecting the inclosed petition of Charles B. Gratiot et al., for the grading of Cheltenham avenue, I have the honor to report as follows: This avenue runs from the Manchester road at Cheltenham station to the Old Manchester road, near its intersection with the Watson road, and is about one mile in length. If properly graded it would no doubt become an important thoroughfare, but at present it is nearly impassable for loaded teams. The proposed improvement, according to the estimate of the county engineer, would cost in round figures the sum of $5,000.00 dollars, which estimate is based upon a maximum grade of 7.5 feet in 100 feet, and a clear width of 24 feet, which still would leave the road in an unsatisfactory condition because the road being only 30 feet wide, the embankments would have to be made partly on private property, and the sides of the excavations would have to be made nearly perpendicular, which is very objectionable in such narrow cuts. I cannot recommend this work at the present time; first, because there are not sufficient funds credited to my department for the present year; and, secondly, because the road is only 30 feet in width, and the proposed work cannot be done properly unless the road is widened to at least 60 feet. Respectfully, Aug. Elbring, Genl. Road Superintendent."

In 1869 Hambleton and Green incorporated their business under a charter running 20 years. The corporate name was the Laclede Fire Brick Manufacturing Company, and in 1889 its charter was renewed under the same name, which has since been changed to its present name. In 1882 the plaintiff acquired that part of lot 12 lying south of the river under two different deeds; each conveying an undivided half, and both expressed to be "subject to the public road lying between lots 12 and 13." In 1889 the old expiring corporation made to the new one a deed to its property in lots 12 and 13; the description of the land in lot 12 being followed by the words, "Containing 11.77 acres, including one-half of Sulphur avenue, and 11.26 acres excluding said avenue." In 1876, by the "scheme and charter," the territory which includes Surphur avenue was taken inside the city of St. Louis. In 1882, by ordinance, the name of the street was changed from Cheltenham avenue to Sulphur avenue. On February 14, 1889, the city by ordinance provided for replacing the old bridge with a new one of iron and appropriating $1,000 for that purpose. The new bridge was thereupon constructed.

Mr. Davis, a member of the St. Louis bar, testified for plaintiff: "Originally when you looked south from Manchester road—Manchester avenue now—on the right hand was called the Sulphur Spring Cottage. I think a man by the name of Fields lived there, and I think he had a boy about my age that used to be there quite often, and afterwards Jack Howard and somebody else had a road-house there and a picket fence on the outside and hedge fence on the inside; that is, going down to the creek. On the left-hand side there was, I believe, an osage orange hedge fence. Where the office of the Laclede Fire Brick Company now is, in the corner of the place, was a flower bed and an asparagus bed, and so forth, put there by the Icarians. As you went south to the bridge, it is flat and level ground, and, as you cross the bridge, there is a little depression. From there on up the hill, there was originally what you might call a country road. There were wagon tracks there, fenced on both sides, and that condition existed until it slid in. It slid north and slid east, and then the rain actually made gutters in it, and it was an utter impossibility to go up and down there. Q. You are describing up and down from the bridge, up to what is now Wilson avenue? A. Wilson avenue is over in the next hollow. It then became impassable. I tried to drive over it myself and couldn't. Q. How long would you say that it was that you tried to drive over it? A. A good many years ago. It is more than 20, and possibly 25. It may be 30. I can recollect well the occurrence of trying to go up there with a wagon that had side springs, the only one my father had, and the gutters would let the horse down so low that the buckler would come up over the top of his back. Q. And under those conditions you couldn't go up the hill? A. I could go over it horseback; I have ridden it that way. Q. On the same theory, you could go over a mountain? A. Yes, sir; it slid in and gutters washed in there."

Mr. Green further testified for the plaintiff as follows: "Q. Now, Mr. Green, the fact is, is it not, that this whole land here has, so to speak, caved in here (indicating in plat) from the brick kiln up to Wilson avenue? A. No, it is caved in about halfway up to Wilson avenue. Q. Do you know how that happened? To what was that due? A. When we were digging out that cliff alongside, right straight through there, it would slide in most every day. Q. When did that begin to slide in, or cave in? A. Oh, 15 or 20 years ago. It used to come pretty near down to the river. Q. What is that? A. The slide of that used to come pretty near into the river. Q. You mean when the land slid, the earth used to come almost down to the river Des Peres? A. Yes, sir; when we built No. 2, as the rain came down. Mr. Charles: When you built what? A. Factory No. 2. Mr. Swarts (resuming examination): Q. Some of that land that was cut, you mean, from the slide there, came down and slid? A. Yes, down onto the second story of the building." The evidence shows that factory No. 2 was constructed at the foot of the hill, about 20 years before the trial, and that near the same time excavations were made along the base of the hill for railroad switch tracks, and also for the factory, and that, by reason of those excavations, the land began to slide toward the river and eastward in and along Sulphur avenue. At some time thereafter the road became impassable and ceased to be used.

The following letters were put in evidence: "St. Louis, September 27, 1902. Charles Varrelmann, Esq., Street Commissioner, City Hall, City—Dear Sir: We wish to call your attention to the bridge over the river Des Peres, on Sulphur avenue. The roadway is full of holes, and if something is not done soon the city is liable to have a damage suit on its hands, as a horse would be very apt to break his leg if he went through. We simply thought we would call your attention to this matter. Yours very respectfully, Laclede Fire Brick Company, George R. Blackford, Secretary." "City of St. Louis. Street Department, Commissioner's Office. Chas. Varrelmann, Commissioner. W. O. Hemenway, Asst. Commissioner. Julius G. D. Bischoff, Secretary. St. Louis, Mo., Sept. 30, 1902. Geo. R. Blackford, Secretary Laclede Fire Brick Co., Manchester & Sulphur Avenues—Dear Sir: Replying to your letter of the 27th inst., relative to the condition of the roadway of the bridge over river Des Peres on Sulphur avenue, I would respectfully advise that the same was referred to Mr. Gayler, bridge engineer for the city, who reports that said avenue, not being a public highway, the city is not liable for the maintenance of said bridge. In view of the above report, I feel that I can take no action in the matter. Respectfully, Chas. Varrelmann, Street Commissioner." Also an ordinance of the city as follows:

"An ordinance to condemn a right of way for sewers and water pipes over a part of proposed Sulphur avenue between Wilson avenue and Manchester avenue.

"Be it ordained by the Municipal Assembly of the city of St. Louis, as follows:

"Section 1. For the purpose of permitting the construction or laying, repairs and perpetual maintenance of sewers and water pipes, a certain strip of land thirty feet in width shall be condemned for the uses above mentioned. The center line of said strip of land to be coincident with the dividing line between lots 12 and 13 of 'D. W. Graham's subdivision of Sulphur Spring tract,' said center line also being coincident with the center line of proposed Sulphur avenue as laid out in said subdivision.

"Sec. 2. The city counselor is hereby authorized and instructed to cause said strip of land to be condemned for the purposes hereinbefore mentioned, according to law.

"Approved March 30th, 1905."

That ordinance has never been repealed. The evidence shows that, from about the time that territory was taken inside the city, the bridge over the river Des Peres was repaired by the city every year or two until about 1900. Some of the evidence for the plaintiff tended to support its claim that there was never a well-defined passable road from the river south to Wilson avenue, while the evidence for the defendant tended to show the constant use of Sulphur avenue by the public over its whole length. All the evidence, however, showed that the hill, beginning about 300 feet south of the river, was steep, and at muddy seasons almost, if not entirely, impassable for loaded wagons.

Chas. W. Bates, Benj. H. Charles, Lambert E. Walther, and T. P. Young, all of St. Louis, for appellants. Lyon & Swarts, of St. Louis, for respondent.

ROY, C. (after stating the facts as above).

[1] 1. On the question of fact, we have no hesitation in holding that, from 1862 until about 1890, the street in question was a public highway, with fences on both sides thereof, and with a well-defined track over which the public traveled. It was at times in muddy weather a very bad road, almost or entirely impassable for loaded wagons, but it was nevertheless a public highway and so considered by everybody concerned, including this plaintiff.

[2, 3] The order of the county court opening the road was void. However, we can consider it to the extent of concluding that there was a demand at that time for a road there, and the county court was of the opinion that there was sufficient demand to justify opening it, and that the route was a practical one. In 1866 Mr. Green, who has always been a strong force in the business of the plaintiff, signed the communication to the county court recognizing the road and showing that the fences were there on both sides of the road. Mr. Green stated that, two years before he and Hambleton bought, there was a road there with good fences on both sides of it. In 1875 the plaintiff and 45 others petitioned the county court in regard to grading the road. In 1882 the plaintiff acquired the land west of the road and south of the river by deeds, which stated that they were subject to the road. In 1889 the plaintiff, in the character of the first corporation whose charter was expiring, made a deed to itself as a new corporation, showing by the language of that deed the existence of the street. In 1889 the city replaced the old bridge with a new one, and repaired it until about 1900; and even as late as 1902 the plaintiff in its letter to the street commissioner recognized the existence of Sulphur avenue and wanted the city to repair the bridge. When that road was taken into the city under the scheme and charter in 1876, it was a well-defined public road, fenced on both sides, on which there was a bridge over the river, and it had been traveled as such by the public for more than 10 years, and such use had been acquiesced in by the owners of the land over which it passed.

[4] The use of a road for 10 years with the acquiescence of the owner makes it a valid road. State v. Wells, 70 Mo. 635; State v. Walters, 69 Mo. 463; Milling Co. v. Riley, 133 Mo. 574, 34 S. W. 835; Bauman v. Boeckeler, 119 Mo. loc. cit. 200, 24 S. W. 207. Section 10,446 of the Revised Statutes, prescribing how a road may be acquired by user, had no application to this street at the time it was taken into the city, as that statute was not enacted until 1879.

[5] When taken into the city, the road became a city street, as provided by section 10 of the scheme of separation, which provided that the interest of St. Louis county in all public roads and highways should vest in the city of St. Louis. Independent of such a provision, it would seem that such would be the result of taking a public road into a city. It was so treated in Wright v. City of Doniphan, 169 Mo. 601, loc. cit. 606, 70 S. W. 146.

[6] It is contended that section 10,446 of the statute above quoted applies to city streets, and that an abandonment for 10 years destroys the right of the public to use the street. It is not clear in this case that there was such a nonuse for 10 years; yet, even if such were the case, we hold that the statute does not apply. It does not purport to do so. It is a special statute of limitations applicable to public roads outside of incorporated cities.

[7] There is a long line of cases in this state based upon the doctrine that the right of a city and the public to the use of a street cannot be lost by abandonment or adverse possession. St. Louis v. Railroad, 114 Mo. 13, 21 S. W. 202; Williams v. St. Louis, 120 Mo. 403, 25 S. W. 561; Wright v. City of Doniphan, supra. The application of that section of the statute to city streets was not discussed in those cases, and for a good reason. It was not supposed to have any reference to city streets. The wisdom of section 1886, R. S. 1909, providing that the statute of limitations shall not apply to "lands given, granted, sequestered or appropriated to public use" has been so thoroughly justified by experience, and so often approved by this court, that it is now too late to assail it. There are greater reasons why city streets should not be subject to destruction by nonuse or adverse possession than can be found applicable to any other kind of property. No other kind of public property is subject to more persistent and insidious attacks or is less diligently guarded against seizure. The city was not estopped by the act of the street commissioner when he declared that Sulphur avenue was not a street, nor by the ordinance condemning the right of way for the purpose of laying sewers and water pipes, nor by any other act or omission of the city officers shown in evidence.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to enter a decree dissolving the injunction and dismissing the plaintiff's bill, and for such other proceedings as may be in accordance with the law.

PER CURIAM. The foregoing opinion is adopted as the opinion of the court.

WRIGHT v. GROOM et al.

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 1.
Nov. 30, 1912.)

PLEADING (§ 236*)—AMENDMENTS—DISCRETION—LAND DESCRIPTIONS.

Rev. St. 1909, § 1848, relating to amendments, is in aid and declarative of the common-law rule that amendments were peculiarly within the sound discretion of and favored by the courts; hence, where, in ejectment, the court ordered a survey which survey differed from a prior survey, throwing the land into a different section, a refusal to allow plaintiff to amend the description in his petition would have been gross error, he claiming by limitations.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 601, 605; Dec. Dig. § 236.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Shannon County; W. N. Evans, Judge.

Action by Armada J. Wright against Arch Groom and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

A. H. Livingston, of Westplains, for appellants. Swain & Sizemore, of Eminence, Shuck & Cunningham, of Eminence, and L. O. Neider, of Mansfield, for respondent.

LAMM, J. Ejectment in the Shannon circuit court. Defendants (claiming a departure) challenge an amended petition by motion to strike out. Unsuccessful, they refuse to appear further, stand on their motion, suffer judgment, duly except, and appeal.

The departure is said to arise in an amendment changing the description of the land. Monthly rents and profits, damages, date of ouster, and parties are the same in both petitions. The change in description appears in the following excerpts, one from the first and the other from the last petition:

Original Petition.

"Beginning at the southeast corner of section 15 in township 27, range 6 west, running thence north four rods; thence west eighty rods; thence south four rods; thence east to the place of beginning, containing two acres, more or less; the same being a part of the southeast quarter of section 15, in township 27 north, range 6 west."

Amended Petition.

"Beginning at the northeast corner of section twenty-two, in township twenty-seven north, range six west, running thence south one hundred feet, thence west eighty rods, thence north ninety-two feet, thence east eighty rods to the place of beginning, containing three acres more or less, the same being a part of the northeast quarter of section twenty-two, in township twenty-seven north, range six west."

Comparison shows that the township and range are the same, and, since section 22 always lies adjoining and south of section 15 in the same township and range, it follows that the northeast corner of 22 coincides with the southeast corner of 15; therefore, though the verbiage differs, the point of beginning in each description is the same. It will be observed, further, that the east and west distances, 80 rods, are the same; hence (since the beginning point is the same) the north line of the second description in point of fact coincides with the south line of the first description. Moreover, it is apparent that the description in the amended petition is of land lying immediately south of that described in the first, the amendment covering a trifle more land.

An additional abstract of the record proper furnished by respondent shows that at appellants' instance and request, after issue joined on the first petition (and before the filing of the amended petition), the court ordered a survey of the tract in dispute, and to that end continued the cause. As a sensible convenience in determining disputed land titles, such request and order are within a statutory power (R. S. 1909, § 11,299; Id. § 11,305); and, as the court ordered the survey to be made by the county surveyor, presumably the order was made under section 11,299. Out of excess of abundant caution the order was directed to a board of three, to wit, the surveyors of Dent, Oregon, and Shannon counties. This excess of caution did not vitiate the order; for the maxim is: Abundant caution injures no man. Two of them (the surveyors of Oregon and Shannon) served; and the record shows they made return to the order, filing a plat of their survey, which plat is submitted to us. This plat shows that the trouble in description had its root in where the true line of division between said sections 15 and 22 actually lay, and was marked on the earth's surface. It seems that by a former survey that line was located so far south of where the county surveyors, acting under the order of the court, located it, that a description of the disputed tract at the time the suit was brought put it on the south side of the southeast quarter of the southeast quarter of section 15, as the original petition did; whereas, the survey ordered by the court shoved the division line between those two sections to the north several rods. The record also shows that, after the survey and plat thereof was filed, plaintiff filed her amended petition, and thereby accepted the last survey and described the land in dispute accordingly. It is allowable to say that presumably plaintiff relied on the old survey in drawing her original petition, and on the new in drawing her amended petition. The judgment shows that plaintiff's title was by limitation; and, while the area of the second description a little exceeds the area of the first, there is nothing to show that the actual land on the earth's surface, actually in defendants' possession and actually claimed by plaintiff, was any other or separate tract than that intended to be sued for in both descriptions. In other words, the actual land, the real thing, the subject-matter of the suit (apart from the mere arbitrary and conventional description of it), was the same under each petition. So the ouster complained of was the same, and for aught appearing here the muniments of title would be the same. Certainly the parol evidence of title by limitation would naturally be the same under both petitions.

Under such circumstances, we are of opinion the motion to strike out was well ruled.

This, because:

(a) At common law the power of amendment (subject to limits not pertinent here) was considered an essential incident of the exercise of all judicial power. 1 Ency. of Pl. and Pr. p. 508. Therefore, even at common law, amendments were peculiarly within the sound (that is, judicial) discretion of the court. Chouteau v. Hewitt, 10 Mo. loc. cit. 134. Speaking generally, at common law the amendment of pleadings was regarded as a matter so exclusively addressed to the discretion of the trial court that its allowance or refusal could not be reviewed upon error. 1 Ency. of Pl. & Pr. p. 524. Broadly, the statute on amendments, applicable here, is in aid and declarative of the common law. Vide Chouteau Case, supra. Accordingly, it has always been construed most liberally to further its benign purpose. Amendments are favored by courts. House v. Duncan, 50 Mo. 453. They avoid delay in joining issue on the true merits of a cause, and tend to bring litigated controversies to an end. Under the statute on amendments, the trial court's discretion is not immune from review on appeal, but it will not be interfered with unless palpably abused by grafting a separate and independent suit on the stem of the original proceeding. Joyce v. Growney, 154 Mo. loc. cit. 263, 55 S. W. 466. Speaking to the right to amend, this court through Bliss, J. (Allen v. Ranson, 44 Mo. loc. cit. 267, 100 Am. Dec. 282), said: "This is necessarily so much a matter of discretion in the court trying the case that we must presume that discretion was soundly exercised unless the contrary is shown by a full exhibit." That statute reads (section 1848, R. S. 1909): "The court may, at any time before final judgment, in furtherance of justice, and on such terms as may be proper, amend any record, pleading, process, entry, return or other proceedings, by adding or striking out the name of any party, or by correcting a mistake in the name of a party, or a mistake in any other respect, or by inserting other allegations material to the case, or, when the amendment does not change substantially the claim or defense, by conforming the pleading or proceeding to the facts proved." Attending to that statute, not only do the cases cited show it, but our reports abound in nearly every volume with cases showing a most liberal trend in reviewing the discretion of trial courts in the matter of allowing amendments before judgment in furtherance of justice on such terms as the circumstances of each case bespeak. The case at bar must be ruled in the light of that statute, and of the foregoing decisions, and not otherwise.

(b) Coming closer to the point, the single question involved on this appeal, to wit, the power of the trial court in the exercise of a judicial discretion to permit the amendment of a land description in an ejectment suit and kindred cases, is far from new to appellate courts. Such amendments, on substantially equivalent statutes, have been allowed in other jurisdictions. For example, in Gilman v. Cate, 56 N. H. 160, an action of trespass qu. cl. fr., such amendment, correcting a misdescription of the locus in quo, was allowed. Helbron v. Heinlen, 72 Cal. 376, 14 Pac. 24, was ejectment. In that case the complaint originally described the land as in range 20. Presently plaintiffs were permitted to amend by striking out "20" and inserting "19," and it was held well enough as against the contention that the amendment substituted a new and different cause of action. Cooper v. Granberry, 33 Miss. 117, was ejectment. In describing the land in controversy the complaint put it in the "northwest" quarter of a given section when in truth and fact it was in the "northeast" quarter. An amendment was permitted correcting this mistake. Error being assigned on that ruling, the court on appeal observed: "The object of the suit was to recover a particular tract of land, and it would have been simply useless litigation, after the error was confessed, if the amendment had not been permitted. The object of the amendment was to bring before the court the true subject of litigation, and not to go through the forms of a trial in regard to a subject, about which there was no controversy between the parties." Leeds v. Lockwood, 84 Penn. 70, was ejectment. There a misdescription of the land was amended by filing a new description and it was held that, saving to defendants the right of a defense, if any, on the ground of limitations, they had no right to object to the amendment merely because of the substitution of a new tract of land. In this connection we refer to a case (Bricken v. Cross, 163 Mo. 449, 64 S. W. 99) where, under the particular facts disclosed by the record, the statute of limitation was allowed as a defense in ejectment where a new tract of land was introduced by amendment. But that point is not involved here, and we need not review the learning on it. Whether the statute of limitation would or would not be eked out and tolled (Walker v. R. R., 193 Mo. loc. cit. 474, 92 S. W. 83, et seq.) in case of an amendment correcting a mere clerical error in a land description or a mere palpable mistake therein is not here for decision at this time. And in cases involving titles in this jurisdiction the same liberal doctrine in interpreting our own statute on amendments obtains, thus: Sage v. Tucker, 51 Mo. App. 337, was an action for penal damages for tearing down the fences and gates on the land of Mrs. Sage. Commenced in a justice court, it was sent to the circuit court on defendant's affidavit putting title in issue. In the circuit court an amendment was permitted giving a different description of the locus in quo. The assignment of error in that behalf was overruled on the authority of Callaghan v. McMahan, 33 Mo. 111. Callaghan v. McMahan, supra, was a suit in two counts, one in equity for land under a resulting trust, the other a claim for money had and received and not expended in the entry of the land. After the evidence was in, plaintiff was permitted to amend by describing a different tract of land, and thereby correcting a misdescription in the petition. Referring to the statute quoted, supra, in disallowing the assignment of error, this court observed: "This section is broad enough to embrace the amendment made. It was a mere misdescription of the land which seems not to have been noticed by either of the parties upon the trial, and the object of the amendment was to make the petition conform to the facts proved. It does not appear that the defendant was taken by surprise, or in any wise prejudiced." The McMahan Case was followed in the late case of Blanchard v. Dorman, 236 Mo. loc. cit. 443, 139 S. W. 395. That was a partition suit begun in the circuit court of Henry and transferred to the circuit court of Cass. In the latter such steps were taken as amounted to an amendment in the description of the land. It was held that, if the court had not permitted the amendment, it would have been error. In deciding the point it was aptly pointed out by Brown, C., that "one of the most common grounds for amendment to a pleading is to correct a mistake in the description of the subject-matter of the litigation, and such mistakes occur nowhere more frequently than in the technical description of lands." Waverly Timber Co. v. Cooperage Co., 112 Mo. 383, 20 S. W. 566, was a suit for damages for a wrongful entry and cutting timber and staves, etc., on plaintiff's land in Tennessee, and converting same to defendant's use. The original complaint described the land specifically as "north" of Turkey creek, etc. Depositions were on file showing the land was "south" of Turkey creek. Plaintiff offering to amend was refused permission, and that ruling we held error.

Doubtless other cases in point could be found if there was any call to take time for a more extended research. The above must suffice. We have examined the cases cited by appellants, and there is nothing in them, when carefully analyzed and discriminatingly applied, militating against the exercise of a wise discretion in correcting land descriptions in pleadings on such statutory terms imposed as may be just. The facts of the instant case, heretofore set forth, are more persuasive in favor of the exercise of a wise discretion in allowing an amendment below than in many of the cases referred to; for here the trial court, in informing himself on the right to amend and leading up to the exercise of a discretion, could take judicial notice of the entries in the same case. By that token he knew he had ordered a survey at the instance of defendants, knew it had been made, and that the dispute was over a boundary line, that plaintiff claimed by limitation, and that the offered amendment related to the identical land embraced in the old petition, but which by a new survey had now a new description. It would have been gross error to have refused the right to amend under the facts before him. There are provisions of our statutes providing for continuances and for other terms, in the form of costs, in cases of amendment, but here defendants, asking no terms, stood stoutly and unwisely on their motion, raising a mere improvident and barren point. They put all their eggs in that one basket. The basket fell. Their eggs broke and rightly so; for there is no showing made disclosing an abuse of discretion nisi in allowing the amendment. Fortunately for defendants, if they actually have title and the right to possession, it may be the courts are still open to them in another action in ejectment, if, after suffering ouster in this suit, they wish to put the issue to the touch, but that question is beside this case and may not be passed on now.

The judgment is affirmed. All concur.

LOCKE v. BOWMAN.

(St. Louis Court of Appeals. Missouri. Nov. 12, 1912.)

1. INSURANCE (§ 219*)—LIFE INSURANCE—ASSIGNMENT OF POLICY—RIGHTS OF ASSIGNEE.

Where a person who received an assignment of a life insurance policy from one to whom it had been assigned had no greater right in the policy than that which he derived from his assignor, he acquired only such rights therein as were held by such assignor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 488, 489, 494-496; Dec. Dig. § 219.*]

2. INSURANCE (§ 122*)—ASSIGNMENT OF POLICY—VALIDITY—ASSIGNMENT OF CREDITOR.

An assignment of an insurance policy made to one who has no interest in the life of the insured is prima facie void, unless he is a creditor, when it may be valid only to the amount of the advances made.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 166, 167; Dec. Dig. § 122.*]

3. INSURANCE (§ 212*)—ASSIGNMENT OF POLICY—VALIDITY—ACTIONS TO SET ASIDE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Where in an action to have an assignment of a life insurance policy made by an assignee of the insured set aside, and the policy surrendered to the insured, a showing by the pleadings of an assignment prima facie void places on the defendant who asserts its validity the onus of showing such facts as will render it valid and binding.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 481, 482; Dec. Dig. § 212.*]

4. EQUITY (§ 346*)—ESTOPPEL (§ 116*)—BURDEN OF PROOF.

One setting up estoppel or laches has the burden of making out the facts upon which they rest.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. §§ 725, 726; Dec. Dig. § 346.* Estoppel, Cent. Dig. § 306; Dec. Dig. § 116.*]

5. INSURANCE (§ 219*)—ASSIGNMENT OF POLICY—RIGHT OF ASSIGNOR TO SET UP TITLE.

An assignor of a policy of life insurance is not estopped to set up his title as against the assignee, contrary to the ordinary rule regarding the right of a pledgor of personalty to set up his title against the pledgee.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 488, 489, 494-496; Dec. Dig. § 219.*]

6. EQUITY (§ 69*)—LACHES—DEATH OF PERSON ACQUAINTED WITH DETAILS.

Though, in a proceeding in equity to redeem a policy of life insurance in the hands of an assignee, the complaint disclosed that the action was brought after the death of a person to whom the policy was originally assigned, and who, in turn, assigned it to the defendant, there is no such showing of laches as will bar the suit where it is not shown that the defendant was injured by the delay, or that the plaintiff had knowledge of his rights and opportunity to establish them before the first assignee died, or for any considerable time before the bringing of suit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. §§ 197-199; Dec. Dig. § 69.*]

7. INSURANCE (§ 222*)—ASSIGNMENT OF POLICY—RIGHT TO REDEEM—NECESSITY OF TENDER BEFORE SUIT.

In an equitable proceeding to redeem a policy of life insurance assigned absolutely, allegations and proof of a tender before suit of the amount of the debt necessary to be paid in order to redeem the policy is not necessary.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 492; Dec. Dig. § 222.*]

8. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 889*)—AMENDMENT OF PLEADINGS—EFFECT OF TRIAL COURT'S ORDER.

Where a trial court ordered a reply to be amended to meet an objection thereto, it will be regarded on appeal as having been made, whether the verbal changes were made or not.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3621, 3622; Dec. Dig. § 889.*]

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; George H. Shields, Judge.

Action by George W. Locke against Joel W. Bowman. From an order granting a new trial after a dismissal, defendant appeals. Affirmed and remanded.

In equity. When this cause came on for hearing in the circuit court, the question was raised as to whether under the pleadings the plaintiff or the defendant had the burden of proof. The trial court decided that plaintiff must assume that burden, whereupon, the plaintiff declining to offer any evidence, the court rendered judgment dismissing his bill. Afterwards, because it considered that it had erred in ruling that plaintiff had the burden of proof, the court granted a new trial on plaintiff's motion, and the defendant has appealed.

The sole question presented on this appeal is whether the plaintiff or the defendant had the burden of proof under the pleadings. The petition alleges, in substance, that the plaintiff procured from an insurance company a paid-up life insurance policy for $5,532 on his own life payable to Fannie G. Locke, his wife, if living at his death, and, if not living at his death, to the executors, administrators, or assigns of plaintiff; that thereafter, on September 14, 1905, plaintiff and his said wife assigned the policy to E. M. Schwarzkopf in consideration of the latter paying $250 which the plaintiff owed the St. Louis Trust Company; that said assignment, although on its face an absolute assignment, was, in fact, executed as security to Schwarzkopf for the repayment to him of said $250; that Schwarzkopf died in June, 1907, and at the date of his death plaintiff was indebted to him in the sum of $250 advanced as aforesaid, together with interest thereon from September 14, 1905, such advance being secured by the aforesaid pledge of the policy; that prior to the date of his death Schwarzkopf pledged the policy with defendant Bowman as security for advances made by said Bowman to Schwarzkopf in a sum far in excess of the amount of plaintiff's indebtedness to Schwarzkopf, and thereafter, Schwarzkopf making default in the amount owing to Bowman, the latter caused the policy to be sold to satisfy Schwarzkopf's indebtedness to him and at said sale purchased the policy himself and is now in possession, claiming to be the owner thereof; that Fannie G. Locke is dead. Plaintiff further avers his readiness and willingness to pay to either defendant the said sum of $250, together with interest thereon, and to do all things which, in equity, he should do to protect the interests of the defendants. The prayer of the petition is that "the court adjudge and decree that the said policy is now held by the said Bowman only as security for the payment of the said sum of $250, with interest due thereon from September 14, 1905, and upon payment by the said plaintiff to said Bowman of said amount the court order and direct the said Bowman to surrender to plaintiff the said policy herein described. And plaintiff prays for such other and further judgments, orders, and decrees as may be necessary to fully protect his interests and the rights and interests of the defendants." The defendant executrix does not appear to have answered or appeared, though duly summoned. Defendant Bowman answered, admitting the transaction as alleged, except that he avers that the consideration for the assignment to Schwarzkopf in addition to the payment by Schwarzkopf of $250 to the trust company "was for premiums paid on the policy by Schwarzkopf and other valuable consideration." He denies that the assignment to Schwarzkopf was executed as a mere assignment to secure the repayment of the $250, and avers that it was in fact "an unconditional and an absolute sale and assignment of said policy in writing for a valuable consideration." He pleads that, the assignment being absolute on its face, plaintiff is estopped from denying that it was so in fact. He alleges that the amount of the loan for which Schwarzkopf pledged the policy to him was $2,000, which was evidenced by a note; that the sale by defendant Bowman at which he bought the policy in was made in accordance with the terms of the pledge, etc.; and that by said sale he became the absolute legal and beneficial owner of the property. Defendant also states facts relied upon by him as creating an estoppel, and constituting laches, sufficient to bar plaintiff from relief. Defendant further pleads that he made the loan to Schwarzkopf in good faith, relying on the assignment of the policy to Schwarzkopf as an absolute one, and without knowledge or notice of plaintiff's claim or alleged equities. The reply was a general denial of "each and every allegation of new matter" in the answer contained. When the case was called for trial and the pleadings were read, the trial judge asked if the reply contained the word "new." Being answered in the affirmative, he said: "You better strike it out. The Supreme Court has held that the court and the other party are not bound to plow through the pleadings to find out what is new matter and what is not. Just let it be a general denial of the allegations of the answer."

Hall & Dame, of St. Louis, for appellant J. D. Johnson and Loomis C. Johnson, both of St. Louis, for respondent.

CAULFIELD, J. [1] It is clear that, considering the state of the pleadings, the trial court erred in holding that the burden of proof lay with the plaintiff, and not the defendant, and did not err in granting plaintiff a new trial on that account. On the admitted facts defendant has no right except such as he derived through Schwarzkopf, who, in turn, was a mere assignee of the policy. He acquired no greater right in the policy than Schwarzkopf had. Heusner v. Mutual Life Ins. Co., 47 Mo. App. 336, 345.

[2] The assignment to Schwarzkopf, being made to one having no interest in the life of the insured, was prima facie void, and, if he was a creditor, it could be valid only to the amount of his advances. Deal v. Hainley, 135 Mo. App. 507, 116 S. W. 1; Jenkins v. Morrow, 131 Mo. App. 288, 109 S. W. 1061; Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Richards, 99 Mo. App. 88, 72 S. W. 487; Singleton v. Insurance Co., 66 Mo. 63, 27 Am. Rep. 321; Warnock v. Davis, 104 U. S. 775, 26 L. Ed. 924; Heusner v. Mut. Life Ins. Co., supra.

[3] Being prima facie void, the onus was on the one asserting its validity to show such facts as rendered it valid and binding. Singleton v. St. Louis Mut. Ins. Co., 66 Mo. 63, 75, 27 Am. Rep. 321; Ryan v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 117 Mo. App. 688, 93 S. W. 347. The plaintiff admitted its validity to the amount of $250 and interest, and to that extent defendant might have enforced his right without offering evidence. He could not, however, rest his claim for a larger amount upon that admission, but must show that Schwarzkopf advanced the larger amount claimed. As the case stood on the pleadings, with both parties declining to offer evidence, the plaintiff would have been entitled to a decree as specifically prayed for in his petition.

[4] As to estoppel and laches, the onus is on the party setting them up to make out the facts on which they rest. The petition does not disclose such facts.

[5] It does disclose that plaintiff delivered the policy to Schwarzkopf, together with an assignment which is absolute in form and that Schwarzkopf pledged it to defendant, but the rule that the owner of personalty will be estopped from setting up his title as against a pledge of it when he has clothed the pledgor with evidence of ownership of it has been held to have no application to a life insurance policy. Heusner v. Insurance Co., supra.

[6] Neither does it appear on the face of the petition that plaintiff has been guilty of such laches as to bar his right to relief in equity, or to put him to an explanation of his delay in bringing suit. It is true that plaintiff alleges that Schwarzkopf died in June, 1907, having theretofore pledged the policy with defendant Bowman for a larger sum, etc., but that is not sufficient. There must be something more than mere delay or death of a participant before the relief asked should be refused. It must appear that the other party was injured by the delay, and that plaintiff had had knowledge of his rights being infringed and opportunity to establish them. St. Louis Safe Deposit & Savings Bank v. Kennett's Estate, 101 Mo. App. 370, 74 S. W. 474. The cases which hold that equity views with disfavor a suit that is brought after the death of a party acquainted with the "whole business" proceed on the theory that the plaintiff had knowledge of the infringement upon his rights and ample opportunity to establish them before the party died. Lenox v. Harrison, 88 Mo. 491; Burdett v. May, 100 Mo. 13, 12 S. W. 1056; State ex rel. v. West, 68 Mo. 229; Dexter v. Macdonald, 196 Mo. 373, 95 S. W. 359. The petition in this case does not disclose that defendant was injured by the delay or that plaintiff had knowledge of his rights and opportunity to establish them before Schwarzkopf died, or, indeed, for any considerable time before bringing this suit.

[7] It was unnecessary for plaintiff to allege and prove a tender before suit of the amount of the debt necessary to be paid in order to redeem the policy; this being a proceeding in equity to redeem. Haydon v. Railroad, 222 Mo. 126, 121 S. W. 15.

[8] Defendant's counsel contend that, as the reply denied the "new matter" of defendant's answer, it is insufficient, and therefore the averments in the answer must stand as admitted. The contention will be ruled against the defendant. The trial court having ordered the reply to be amended so as to meet that objection, it is to be regarded here as having been made, and it is immaterial whether the verbal changes were made or not. Underwood v. Bishop, 67 Mo. 374; Shantz v. Shriner, 150 S. W. 727 (decided October 8, 1912).

The judgment is affirmed and the cause remanded.

MATTHEWS v. EBY.

(St. Louis Court of Appeals. Missouri. Nov. 12, 1912.)

1. ATTACHMENT (§ 32*)—DEBT FRAUDULENTLY CONTRACTED—REPRESENTATIONS.

From one's statement just after the price to be paid by him for mules was agreed on, and just before they were turned over to him, "I haven't got my checkbook here, and I can't pay you now, but I will send you a check when

I get home," an implied affirmation that nothing stood between immediate payment but absence of his checkbook, that the money was in bank, and that it was a mere matter of getting to the checkbook, in order that payment might be made, if not inevitable, is permissible, making the debt one fraudulently contracted, as regards right to attach therefor; he not having had the money in bank.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attachment, Cent. Dig. §§ 81-87; Dec. Dig. § 32.*]

2. ATTACHMENT (§ 233*)—FRAUDULENT ATTACHMENT—JURISDICTION.

Where one desiring to prevent removal from the county of property of his debtor temporarily there, having a single cause of action for a sum too great for the jurisdiction of a justice, split it and had the property seized on two attachments issued by a justice, and then, in the absence of the debtor, dismissed them and seized the property on attachment in a suit in the circuit, the latter attachment, obtained by means of the other fraudulent attachments, gives no jurisdiction.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 352*)—REVIEW—THEORY BELOW.

The denial of a motion to dismiss will be reviewed, on the theory that the motion was a proper mode of raising the question of jurisdiction; both parties and the trial court having proceeded on that theory, and no question in that regard being raised on appeal.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Scott County; Henry C. Riley, Judge.

Action by R. C. Matthews against Bert Eby. Judgment for plaintiff; defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

Marshall Arnold, of Benton, and Brown & Gallivan, of New Madrid, for appellant. Joe Moore, of Sikeston, for respondent.

CAULFIELD, J. The appeal in this case was prosecuted to this court, but was thereafter transferred by it to the Springfield Court of Appeals, under the provisions of the act of the Legislature, approved June 12, 1909. See Laws of Missouri, 1909, p. 396. See, also, section 3939, R. S. 1909. In due time the cause was disposed of by the Springfield Court of Appeals through an opinion prepared by Judge Nixon of that court, as will appear by reference to Mathews v. Eby, 149 Mo. App. 157, 129 S. W. 1016. Subsequently the Supreme Court declared the said legislative act, which purported to authorize the transfer of cases from this court to the Springfield Court, to be unconstitutional. The cause was thereafter transferred by the Springfield Court of Appeals to this court, on the theory that the jurisdiction of the appeal continued to reside here, and the proceedings had in the Springfield Court with reference thereto were coram non judice.

The case has been argued and submitted here and duly considered. Upon reading the record, we are satisfied with and adopt, so far as it relates to the question whether the debt sued for was fraudulently contracted, the statement of facts set forth in the opinion of the Springfield Court of Appeals, above referred to, as follows: "This was an action brought in the circuit court of Scott county on an account in the sum of $375, and a writ of attachment was sued out in aid thereof; the ground for attachment being that the debt sued for was fraudulently contracted. This writ was levied on three mules, the subjects of this controversy. The defendant filed a plea in abatement, which, among other things, denied that the debt sued for was fraudulently contracted. The verdict of the jury sustained the attachment. The defendant then answered; but upon plaintiff's motion a part of the answer was stricken out, and, defendant declining to plead further, judgment was rendered for plaintiff for the amount sued for. Defendant has appealed, and insists that the attachment should not have been sustained, because the evidence does not show that the debt sued for was fraudulently contracted."

This litigation had its inception in the sale of three mules. The evidence shows: That plaintiff was a dealer in mules, maintaining a mule barn in Sikeston, Scott county, Mo. That about the 1st of April, 1908, defendant appeared at plaintiff's mule barn, and, after having examined several mules, had two hitched to a wagon and tried them, and said he would take them, together with another mule he had examined. The two mules were priced at $190 each, and the separate mule at $175, making a total of $555; but plaintiff told defendant he would sell the three for $550. There is a direct conflict in the evidence as to what then occurred. Plaintiff testified that defendant went uptown, and then came back and caught the mules, and said: "I haven't got my checkbook here, and I can't pay you for this now, but I will send you a check when I get home." Plaintiff says he went uptown and asked a man who was well acquainted in that country what he thought about letting the mules go on that kind of a promise, and that he was told it would be perfectly safe. That plaintiff then told defendant he could take them, but to send the check at once. That he waited about two weeks and then wrote to defendant. Not receiving a reply, he wrote again, but to no avail. Plaintiff says that after about five weeks he sent Alfred Emery to the defendant; that the defendant sent back $100, with a promise to pay the balance at once; that after waiting about a week longer he wrote again, and then defendant came from his home in New Madrid county to Sikeston and wanted to turn back the two mules which had been priced at $190 each, but plaintiff refused to take them and told defendant to get the matter settled up by the following Monday; that defendant returned on Monday and left the two mules at plaintiff's mule barn in plaintiff's absence. They met later, however, and had some words, defendant saying one of the mules was not worth $1.50. Plaintiff then offered him $150 for the mule, but defendant would not take less than $165, which plaintiff refused to give, because the mule had become lame, and both of them had deteriorated in value. Defendant then paid him $75 more, leaving a balance due of $375, and plaintiff prepared a note for that amount and gave it to the defendant, with directions to get it signed by certain named persons, so that he would have something to show for the sale. Plaintiff states that he then saw defendant "acting peculiar," and that defendant slipped back and got the bridle he had had on one of the two mules which he had brought to the barn and wrapped it up in his rain coat, walked around "back there" a while, and then went out; that plaintiff was then convinced that defendant was trying to beat him by leaving the mules there anyhow; that he went out and found that defendant had also brought the third mule to town, and he at once started attachment proceedings and secured possession of the three mules. Defendant's testimony was that he did not agree to send a check at once, but that he was to take the mules home and pay at a future date, when his brother had secured some money on a loan; that nothing was said about a check; that the mules were warranted, and that if they were not "all right" defendant could return them. Defendant's own evidence shows that he had no money in the bank, but was relying upon his brother to make a loan and obtain the money.

[1] Our learned Brethren of the Springfield Court of Appeals treated the case, upon the foregoing facts, as if there was nothing more by way of fraud than the defendant's promise to send plaintiff a check on his arrival home, and concluded that such mere promise was not such a false representation as to constitute a fraud, though it was unperformed, citing Bullock v. Wooldridge, 42 Mo. App. 356; Stocking v. Howard, 73 Mo. 25. We cannot agree that the case should be so treated. In order for a debt to be fraudulently contracted on his part, "the debtor must have been guilty of some material deceptive act, word, or concealment, done or suffered by him with the intent to induce the opposite party to consent to the debt. The opposite party must have relied upon such false acts or manifestations of the debtor, and yielded his consent to the contract on the faith thereof." Finlay v. Bryson, 84 Mo. 664. It is clear from this definition or rule that the false representation need not be express, but may be by conduct as well as by words; and such is the law. "If one intentionally acts in such a manner as to reasonably lead another to believe in the existence of facts which do not exist, and to act on such belief to his prejudice, it is as much a fraud as if he made a positive statement as to the existence of such facts." 14 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d Ed.) p. 80. Thus the drawing of a check upon a bank in which the drawer has no funds, and uttering it, is a fraud. It amounts to a false affirmation that the money is there to meet it. Peterson v. Union Nat. Bank, 52 Pa. 206, 91 Am. Dec. 146. Now, in the case at bar, the purchaser (defendant) did not actually draw the check, but he used the words which were equivalent as an affirmation. He said: "I haven't got my checkbook here, and I can't pay you now, but I will send you a check when I get home." Who can doubt that this language implied that the money was in bank to meet the check as soon as it was given? It amounted to a statement that nothing stood between the parties and immediate payment but the absence of defendant's checkbook; that the money was in bank, and it was a mere matter of getting to the checkbook, in order that payment might be made. If such implication was not inevitable, it was at least permissible, and was a matter for the jury. That such implied affirmation was false is clearly shown, and, of course, defendant must have known it was false. It related to a material fact; for if the money had been in bank payment could have been made as soon as the defendant could reach his checkbook, while if the contrary was true the payment, or at least the time thereof, was dependent upon the ability of defendant's brother to make a loan, which was a very uncertain matter. That plaintiff relied upon such affirmation may be inferred; for it concerns a fact of which defendant had, or was supposed to have, knowledge, while the plaintiff had no such knowledge, and no ready means of acquiring it. That the false impression was given by defendant with intent to induce plaintiff to consent to the debt, and that plaintiff yielded his consent on the faith thereof, may be inferred; for the language which created it was part of the negotiation for the sale of the mules, and was followed immediately by the mules being turned over to the defendant. We are satisfied that there was sufficient evidence on which to base a finding that the debt was fraudulently contracted.

[2] But the point is made that the judgment should be reversed by reason of the action of the circuit court in overruling defendant's motion to dismiss the cause for want of jurisdiction. The cause was instituted in the circuit court of Scott county, and the jurisdiction depends upon the validity of the attachment, because the defendant resided in another county, and was not served with summons in Scott county, where the plaintiff resided. Section 1751, R. S. 1909; Brckett v. Brckett, 61 Mo. 221. The objection raised by the motion to dismiss is aimed at the means by which the court acquired jurisdiction through the execution of its attachment process.

The following facts were disclosed at the hearing upon the motion: On May 4, 1908, defendant resided and had the three mules in New Madrid county. The plaintiff resided and had his mule barn at Sikeston, in Scott county. On that day the defendant came from New Madrid county to Sikeston, in Scott county, bringing with him the three mules. One, a bay mule, he drove, in his buggy, and the other two, the gray mules, he led. Arrived in Sikeston, he tied the bay mule at the usual hitching place and took the two gray mules to plaintiff's mule barn, where he insisted on plaintiff taking them back as unsound. He testified that plaintiff did take them back and received a payment, which finished paying for the bay mule. According to plaintiff's version, however, he refused to consent to any such arrangement and repudiated defendant's suggestion that the amount paid ($175) paid for one mule, and insisted that that sum was to be credited on the three mules; that the transaction had been a sale of three mules for $550 which could not be divided. Plaintiff told defendant to take the mules out of his barn and take them home. But afterwards the plaintiff testified he judged from the defendant's actions that he was going to try to get out of town with the bay mule, leaving the gray mules on plaintiff's hands. He determined to stop this and keep the bay mule in Scott county by means of a writ of attachment from the justice of the peace; but, as the sum demanded by him ($375) exceeded the amount of the justice's jurisdiction, he split his cause of action into two parts and sued out two writs before the justice for the two parts. Under the first writ, which was issued that day, May 4, 1908, he succeeded in having the bay mule seized and held by the constable before the defendant had a chance to get it, and in spite of the defendant's attempt to do so. The constable and plaintiff then took the bay mule and put it with the two gray mules in the plaintiff's barn. Under the second writ, which was sued out the next day, May 5, 1908, the plaintiff had the two gray mules levied upon. All the mules continued to be kept in plaintiff's barn. On his cross-examination plaintiff frankly admitted that he divided his cause of action because he wanted to keep defendant from getting out of town with the mule, and so as to get the matter into the justice court. The two attachment suits before the justice were set down for hearing on the 14th day of May, at which time the defendant was present; but the causes were continued on account of the sickness of the plaintiff. Thereafter, and while the defendant was out of the county and the mules were still in plaintiff's barn, held under the attachment, the plaintiff, without defendant's knowledge, dismissed both suits before the justice and immediately sued out the writ of attachment in the case at bar and caused the mules to be levied upon thereunder. He stated, on cross-examination, that he had had this attachment sued out right away after dismissing the others, so that he could hold the mules, as he was afraid "they would beat me out of them."

What is the effect of plaintiff's conduct, as above disclosed, upon this proceeding? The law is that an attachment levy effected by unlawful or fraudulent means is illegal and void, and confers no jurisdiction. Rosencranz v. Swofford Bros. Dry Goods Co., 175 Mo. 513, 75 S. W. 445, 97 Am. St. Rep. 609; Drake on Attachment (6th Ed.) § 193. This is upon the principle that courts will not lend their assistance to effectuate fraudulent or unlawful practices of suitors (Holker v. Hennessey, 141 Mo. 527, loc. cit. 536, 42 S. W. 1090, 39 L. R. A. 165, 64 Am. St. Rep. 524); or, as otherwise stated, no one should be permitted to take advantage of his own wrong, and no lawful thing can stand on an unlawful foundation. Rood on Attachment, § 186, citing Holker v. Hennessey, supra. So, where one came into possession of goods of another in one state fraudulently or as a trespasser, and took them into another state without the consent of the owner, in order that a writ of attachment in that state could be levied upon them, it was held that the levy conferred no jurisdiction, and was void. Rosencranz v. Swofford Bros. Dry Goods Co., supra; Powell v. McKee, 4 La. Ann. 108. A like ruling was made where a slave was decoyed into the jurisdiction of the court and there attached. Timmons v. Garrison, 4 Humph. (Tenn.) 148. So it was held that if the levy be made by means of a trespass it is vitiated. Bailey v. Wright, 39 Mich. 96. Likewise, where the sheriff in one county seized the property, pretending that he seized it by virtue of a writ of attachment, and carried it back to his own county, where he made a formal levy under a writ in his possession, the levy was held to be void. Pomroy v. Parmlee, 9 Iowa, 140, 74 Am. Dec. 328. In some instances the fraudulent contrivance for obtaining possession of defendant's property involves an abuse of legal process. As in the case of Gilbert v. Hollinger, 14 La. Ann. 441, where, by means of a writ of attachment issued by the United States Circuit Court on a false affidavit that the defendant was a citizen of the state, goods were brought into the territorial jurisdiction of the state court and there attached under the state court writ, on the ground that the defendant was a non-resident of the state. The case of Byler v. Jones, 79 Mo. 261, illustrates the same principle, though it does not involve a seizure of property. It was there held that the criminal process of the state cannot be used to take a person from one county to another, for the purpose of having him served with civil process in the latter county; and that courts of the county into which he was so brought could acquire no rightful jurisdiction over his person in any civil proceeding by means of such a contrivance and wrong. There are many other cases, but the foregoing are sufficient to illustrate the principle involved.

Now, in the case at bar, in order to detain the property in Scott county, in order that it might be subjected to attachment process therein, the plaintiff used the writs of attachment issued by the justice of the peace. The justice had no jurisdiction, as plaintiff knew, to issue a writ to secure the sum demanded by him, so, in order to accomplish his purpose, regardless of the law, plaintiff conferred upon the justice a fictitious appearance of jurisdiction by splitting his cause of action and bringing two suits. This was an unlawful practice—a proceeding which the law never tolerates. Robbins v. Conley, 47 Mo. App. 502; note to Reynolds v. Jones, 44 Cent. Law J. 306; Wagner v. Jacoby, 26 Mo. 532; Laine v. Francis, 15 Mo. App. 107. It was a fraud in law. Yet by this means fraudulent and unlawful attachment writs were procured, the property taken into custody and held until the defendant had left the county and was off his guard, when plaintiff dismissed the justice suits, and, fearful of losing the unlawful advantage he had gained thereby, hurriedly sued out this writ and caused the property to be seized thereunder before defendant had a chance to be advised. It is clear that this proceeding is but an attempt to reap the fruits of the unlawful practice by which it was made possible; and to permit plaintiff to prevail herein would be but to lend our assistance to effectuate such unlawful practice. Under the law it is our duty to refuse to do so, as it was the duty of the trial court. Jurisdiction cannot be unlawfully acquired as in this case.

[3] We may add here that we have proceeded on the theory, without deciding, that the motion to dismiss was a proper mode of presenting the question of jurisdiction. We have done this, because both the parties, as well as the trial court, proceeded on that theory, and no question in that regard is raised here. That the trial court did not overrule the motion because it was an improper mode of raising the question of jurisdiction is made clear by the record, which discloses that the court struck out, on plaintiff's motion, a like plea to the jurisdiction from defendant's plea in abatement of the attachment, and from defendant's answer to the merits; the defendant duly excepting.

For the reasons above stated, the judgment is reversed and the cause remanded, with directions to the circuit court to set aside its order sustaining the attachment and enter an order dismissing the cause.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Holt County; Francis H. Trimble, Judge.

Action by Felix Gambrel against Thomas H. Hines, in which Joseph G. Wilson and another interpleaded. From judgment for interpleaders, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

H. B. Williams, of Craig, and W. E. Stubbs, of Mound City, for appellant. John W. Stokes, of Craig, and J. B. Dearmont, of Mound City, for respondent.

BROADDUS, P. J. Garnishment and interpleas. On the 15th day of January, 1907, Gambrel obtained a judgment in the circuit court of Holt county against Thomas Hines for $56.08 and costs, the costs amounting to $125.95, making the total judgment $182.03. One or more executions were issued upon the judgment and returned nulla bona. The execution which has reference to the subject of this controversy was issued on the 16th day of January, 1909.

[1] A short time prior to the issuing of this execution, Hines, the execution debtor, advertised certain personal property to be sold at the farm, upon which he was residing, at public sale, on the 19th day of January, 1909, in which advertisement he stated that he intended to remove from the state. On the day of sale, the sheriff of the county went to the farm mentioned to levy upon the personal property so advertised for sale as the property of Hines. It seems that there was to be other personal property than that of Hines also to be sold at that time. Upon arriving at the farm, the sheriff made his business known to Hines, whereupon Hines, to prevent injurious effect upon the sale, agreed with the sheriff that, if the sheriff would not seize the property under the execution, he (Hines) would leave in the hands of Fred Burnett, who was the clerk of the sale, enough of the proceeds derived from the sale of said property to satisfy the execution in the hands of the sheriff, and that the sheriff could seize said proceeds in lieu of, and as for the property itself. Whereupon Hines, the sheriff, and Burnett inspected the property, and Hines pointed out to Burnett the property from the sale of which the proceeds were derived, which said proceeds were seized by the sheriff under the execution in his hands, and which are the subject of this litigation. In the morning of the day of sale Hines executed a bill of sale of the property mentioned to Joseph G. Wilson, his father-in-law, and J. P. Hines, his brother; the consideration being an existing indebtedness. Plaintiff had no notice of this bill of sale previous to the seizure of the property. The funds having been garnished in his hands, Burnett asked leave to deposit them with the court, and for an order for claimants to interplead for the funds. Wilson and J. P. Hines filed their interpleas, and, issue being made, the cause was heard by the court sitting as a jury. The bill of sale was not recorded, nor was the property mentioned in the bill of sale pointed out to interpleaders at the time of the execution of said instrument, and no physical possession was taken by them. Both interpleaders were present, and Wilson was the auctioneer who cried the sale. They were not parties to the agreement made between the sheriff and the debtor, Hines, that the property should be sold and the proceeds held by Burnett, subject to seizure by the sheriff, as stated, and also to be held subject to garnishment. At the close of the evidence the plaintiff offered a demurrer to interpleaders' evidence, which the court overruled. The plaintiff then asked the court to declare the law in the following language: "The court, sitting as a jury, declares the law to be that although he may believe from the evidence in the case that interpleaders, Joseph G. Wilson and J. P. Hines, did in good faith purchase from Thomas Hines the property mentioned in evidence, yet, if you further believe and find from the evidence that said property so purchased had never been actually delivered unto said purchasers prior to the levying of the execution mentioned in evidence, then and in that event such sale, if any, is void as to plaintiff, Felix Gambrel, and your verdict should be against the interpleaders and for plaintiff." The court refused the declaration, and rendered judgment in favor of the interpleaders, and plaintiff appealed.

The contention of plaintiff is that the sale of personal property to interpleaders was void as to creditors. Section 2887, R. S. 1909, provides that: "Every sale made by a vendor of goods and chattels in his possession or under his control, unless the same be accompanied by delivery in a reasonable time, regard being had to the situation of the property, and be followed by an actual and continual change of possession of the things sold, shall be held to be fraudulent and void, as against the creditors of the vendor, or subsequent purchasers in good faith," etc. This section was construed by this court, wherein it is held that in the case of a sale of goods there must be an actual delivery—"a substantial change of possession." Harmon v. Morris, 28 Mo. App. 326. "A mere-symbolical delivery of personal property, without any outward or visible change of possession within a reasonable time, such as the nature and situation of the property admit of, will not constitute such a change of possession as the statute requires as against creditors of the vendor, especially when the vendor continues to sustain the same relation to the property in respect to its possession as before the sale." Dyer v. Balsley, 40 Mo. App. 559. And so it is held in State ex rel. v. Hall, 45 Mo. App. 299, and many other cases since determined.

There was no attempt made by interpleaders to take possession of the property in question. On the contrary, the property was suffered to remain in the debtor's possession after the sale in question, and was allowed, without objection or protest by vendees, to be sold by the auctioneer at public sale; Wilson, one of the interpleaders, being the auctioneer. It is true that as to the corn and household property perhaps interpleaders did not have sufficient time to remove the same from the farm. But, as to the other property, it was subject to the immediate control of interpleaders had they seen fit to take it into their possession. However, the evidence discloses that they did not intend to take possession of any part of the property at any time, but left it in the debtor's possession for the purpose of having it sold as his property.

[2] It is insisted that the debtor has a right to prefer interpleaders, who were his creditors. This is true, but that fact does not place them in any better position than that of purchasers, as the same rule would apply in both instances.

The question is not one of fraudulent intent, but fraud as a matter of law. The plaintiff's demurrer should have been sustained.

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; Daniel G. Taylor, Judge.

Action by the Scientific American Club against Louis Horchitz and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

See, also, 128 Mo. App. 575, 106 S. W. 1117.

Frank K. Ryan, of St. Louis, for appellants. Bishop & Cobbs, of St. Louis, for respondent.

REYNOLDS, P. J. Plaintiff commenced its action before a justice of the peace to recover a debt claimed to be due it by the defendant Horchitz. On trial before the justice there was a verdict and judgment for plaintiff. Seven days after the judgment was rendered, defendant appealed to the circuit court, giving an appeal bond with appellant Levin as surety. No notice of the appeal having been served on plaintiff, and after the lapse of several terms of the circuit court, plaintiff filed its motion to affirm the judgment of the justice for failure to give notice of the appeal. At the same term defendant Horchitz filed a motion to dismiss the appeal for the reason that plaintiff was a foreign corporation, organized under the laws of the state of New York and that at the times mentioned in the petition or statement in the case it was not authorized to do business in this state by its failure to comply with the provisions of what is now section 3039, R. S. 1909, and under what is now section 3040, it could not maintain any action or suit. This motion was stricken from the files by the circuit court and the motion to affirm the judgment of the justice sustained, the judgment being rendered in the circuit court in favor of respondent, plaintiff below, and against Horchitz, the defendant in the case, and Levin his surety on his appeal bond. Whereupon defendant Horchitz appealed to this court, where the judgment of the circuit court was affirmed. See Scientific American Club v. Horchitz, 128 Mo. App. 575, 106 S. W. 1117. Execution thereupon issued out of the office of the clerk of the circuit court against Horchitz and Levin, who thereupon filed their motion to quash the execution, alleging the same grounds as set out in the former motion, that is failure of plaintiff to comply with the provisions of section 3039, supra, and upon the further ground that the summary judgment against defendant Levin, surety on the appeal bond, and issue of execution thereon deprived him of his property without due process of law, in violation of the provisions of the Constitution of this state and of that of the United States, "and deprived him of that right and justice and the administration thereof guaranteed by section 10, art. 2, of the Constitution of Missouri." This motion was sworn to by defendant Horchitz, who filed an affidavit to the effect that he was well acquainted with the ownership and management of plaintiff and its method of doing business and that he knew that plaintiff had not obtained a license to do business in this state, having made an examination in the office of the Secretary of State; that he had also received a letter from the Secretary of State, attached to the affidavit, to the effect that the Secretary of State was unable to locate any foreign corporation licensed in this state under the name of Scientific American Club. Beyond filing this affidavit it does not appear that anything else was done concerning the motion to quash the execution. It does not appear that any evidence was offered in support of the motion, it not even appearing that this affidavit was ever presented to or called to the attention of the trial judge. The court overruled the motion to quash the execution, defendants excepting. Praying an appeal to the Supreme Court of this state and filing bond, defendants duly perfected their appeal to that court. The Supreme Court transferred the cause to this court on the ground that the amount involved did not exceed the sum of $7,500 and that the Supreme Court had no jurisdiction of the cause on appeal.

[1] It follows from this that the constitutional questions sought to be raised are out of the case, the only matter remaining for our consideration being the action of the circuit court in overruling the motion to quash the execution.

Learned counsel for appellants contend that suing out the execution is a new and distinct suit or action and that defendants are at liberty to attack that execution on the ground that the plaintiff corporation was not and is not authorized to do business in this state and cannot maintain any action or suit in this state.

[2-4] Without going into an examination of the authorities cited by counsel or an elaborate discussion of the proposition, it is sufficient to say that the judgment in the case which was originally entered, was rendered by a court having jurisdiction over the parties and the subject-matter, and is conclusive on the parties to it as to all matters which were in issue or which could have been brought up in the trial of the cause. Whether the right of plaintiff to maintain the action was or was not there in issue or tried, it was an issue which could have been there tried and, "the plea of res judicata applies, except in special cases, not only to points upon which the court was actually required by the parties to form an opinion and pronounce a judgment, but to every point which properly belonged to the subject of litigation, and which the parties, exercising reasonable diligence, might have brought forward at the time." 2 Taylor on Evidence (8th Ed.) p. 1454, § 1702, cited and quoted approvingly by our Supreme Court in Chouteau v. Gibson, 76 Mo. 38, loc. cit. 46. Defendant Levin, as surety on the appeal bond, is in privity with the defendant Horchitz and that judgment is binding on both of them. Taylor on Evidence, Id. § 1684. If however, we are to go behind the judgment of the justice and enter upon an attack on the execution, it is clear that defendants have not produced any proof tending to sustain that attack. It is a well-settled rule in our state that the fact that plaintiff is a foreign corporation, raises no presumption that it is not authorized to do business in this state. That is an affirmative defense to the action which must be made and sustained. See American Ins. Co. v. Smith, 73 Mo. 368; Parlin & Orendorff Co. v. Boatman, 84 Mo. App. 67; State to use v. Hudson, 86 Mo. App. 501; Scientific American Club v. Horchitz, supra. The mere filing of an ex parte affidavit, without any showing that it was ever presented to or considered by the court, is very far from such an attack, very far from establishing the truth of the matter set up in that affidavit. So that even granting for the sake of the argument that defendants were at liberty to attack this execution for the reasons stated in the motion to quash, they have entirely failed, by any affirmative testimony, to establish the averments of their motion.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed. NORTON and CAULFIELD, JJ., concur.

HARTWIG et al. v. SECURITY MUT. LIFE INS. CO.

(Kansas City Court of Appeals. Missouri. Nov. 25, 1912.)

1. JUDGMENT (§ 585*)—RES JUDICATA—QUESTIONS CONCLUDED.

A judgment denying relief to insured in a life policy suing for the premiums paid, on the theory that a forfeiture of the policy by insurer for nonpayment of premiums at maturity was wrongful, is not res judicata in a subsequent action by insured's widow and children for the amount of the policy, on the theory that Rev. St. 1889, § 5886, in force at the time, extended the insurance beyond the date of insured's death, notwithstanding nonpayment of premiums, in the absence of a showing that the former judgment adjudged that the policy did not come within the statute of extended insurance.

2. JUDGMENT (§ 713*)—CONCLUSIVENESS—QUESTIONS CONCLUDED.

A judgment bars a subsequent action between the same parties on the same cause of action as to all matters which might have been litigated in the prior action, whether in fact litigated or not; but where the subsequent action is for a different cause of action the judgment only concludes the parties as to the points actually determined.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. §§ 1063, 1066, 1099, 1234–1237, 1239, 1241, 1247; Dec. Dig. § 713.*]

3. ELECTION OF REMEDIES (§ 11*)—ACTS CONSTITUTING.

An election of remedies presupposes the existence of more than one remedy at the time the election is made; and, where one believes he has a remedy when he has not, the rule of election of remedies does not apply, for there is a difference between an election of remedies and a mistake of remedies.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Election of Remedies, Cent. Dig. § 8; Dec. Dig. § 11.*]

4. ELECTION OF REMEDIES (§ 9*)—ACTS CONSTITUTING.

An unsuccessful action by insured in a life policy for the premiums paid, on the ground of the insurer's wrongful forfeiture of the policy, does not bar, on the theory of election of remedies, an action by his widow and children for the amount of the policy.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Election of Remedies, Cent. Dig. § 6; Dec. Dig. § 9.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Chariton County; Fred Lamb, Judge.

Action by Elizabeth Hartwig and others against the Security Mutual Life Insurance Company. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Sparrow, Page & Rea, of Kansas City, and H. D. Hinman, for appellant. Busby Bros. & Withers, of Carrollton, for respondents.

ELLISON, J. Plaintiffs are the widow and children of John Hartwig, and they instituted this action on a policy of life insurance issued on the 21st of August, 1891, on the life of Hartwig, who died in September, 1910. He was to pay premiums semiannually, and he did so up to and including that for the first half of the year 1906. He failed on the last half of that year, due in August, and the defendant for that reason thereafter declared his policy forfeited and of no further force. He felt that the forfeiture was wrongful; for he insisted there was a custom under which defendant had permitted him, at past times, to pay premiums a few days after they were due, and by such conduct had led him to believe that no serious result would follow the delay in the instance referred to. On the idea that the custom allowed him to delay payment, he based his contention that the policy had been wrongfully forfeited, and, realizing that by the forfeiture his insurance was cut off, and yet defendant had retained the premiums which he had been paying for about 15 years, he shortly thereafter brought his action against defendant for damages, being the premiums and interest on each from the time it was paid. He was defeated at the trial, and did not appeal. After Hartwig's death in September, 1910, the present action was begun, as already stated. There was a judgment for plaintiffs in the trial court, and defendant has brought the case here.

The theory upon which the action was instituted is based on the statute (section 5886, R. S. 1889), which provides that a life insurance policy shall not be forfeited after the payment of two annual premiums, but its net value shall be computed on the American mortality tables and the amount, less any note or other debt owing to the insurance company on account of premiums, shall be taken as a net single premium for temporary or extended insurance for a length of time to be ascertained by calculation on the mortality tables. Such calculation, considering Hartwig's age, extended his policy to a date beyond the time he lived. In other words, the policy, by force of the statute, was in force at the date of his death.

Defendant presents four defenses: First, that the policy, by its own terms, was forfeited absolutely by defaulting in the premium; second, that the suit for damages which Hartwig instituted, with the judgment in defendant's favor, became res adjudicata and barred the present action; third, that by the institution of that action Hartwig made an election of his remedy, and he cannot now try another; fourth, that he abandoned his contract.

[1,2] The second and third are all that require serious attention. Res adjudicata, in general terms, means the thing has been once adjudicated. The action here interposed as a former adjudication was based upon an alleged wrongful forfeiture of a life insurance policy, whereby the insured was damaged in the amount of the premiums he had paid, with interest thereon; while this action is by the widow and children of the plaintiff in that case, and has for its object a recovery of the amount of the policy. In the former case the cause stated was to recover premiums and nothing on the policy, and the issue was whether defendant had not waived a payment of premium, and therefore illegally forfeited the policy. This case seeks to recover the whole amount of the policy, and no premiums, and the right to so recover was not necessarily involved in the former action. This case depends upon the policy being kept alive by the statute of extended insurance. The two causes of action are in no sense the same. "When the very cause of action once decided is again brought forward in a subsequent suit between the parties, the judgment in the first action is conclusive, and constitutes a perfect bar to the prosecution of the second, as to all matters which might have been litigated therein, whether in point of fact they were or not; for no one ought to be twice vexed about the same dispute or claim. * * * But the judgment in the first case enjoys no such prerogative if the second action is for a different cause of action from that contested in the first one. This is the distinction to be always seized as vital to the right determination of pleas of res judicata; and it will clear up a great deal of the confusion in the multitudinous decisions on the subject. In the second class of cases the judgment only concludes the parties as to points actually determined—that is, as to issues tendered or joined by the pleadings and decided—not those which might properly have been, but were not; for the rights of parties ought not to be construed away." Barkhoefer v. Barkhoefer, 93 Mo. App. 373, 67 S. W. 674; Dickey v. Helm, 48 Mo. App. 114. A part of the record in the former case was introduced in evidence in this; but it does not prove, nor tend to prove, that this policy did or did not come within the statute of extended insurance. A plausible argument was made by defendant to show that the issue here was found in the other case. But "it is not enough that it may be argumentatively inferred from the judgment that the point was involved in the former case." Dickey v. Helm, supra. The rule does not extend to points incidentally or collaterally considered. Ridgley v. Stillwell, 27 Mo. 128.

[3] It is next insisted that plaintiffs' present action is barred by the former action, under the rule as to election of remedies. It is said that Hartwig concluded to consider the policy canceled by defendant's wrongful conduct, and elected to sue for the premiums he had paid. There are several reasons why the rule cannot be allowed application in this case. An election or choice necessarily presupposes two or more things out of which a choice is to be made. There must, therefore, be more than one remedy existing at the time the choice is said to have been made. Therefore, if one believes he has a remedy when he has not, the rule does not apply; "for there is a difference between an election of remedies and a mistake of remedies." McLaughlin v. Austin, 104 Mich. 489, 62 N. W. 719.

If there be not two remedies in fact, there cannot be a binding choice made. The following authorities justify these statements of the law: Johnson-Brinkman Co. v. Railway Co., 126 Mo. 344, 28 S. W. 870, 26 L. R. A. 840, 47 Am. St. Rep. 675; Henry v. Herrington, 193 N. Y. 218, 86 N. E. 29, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 249; Sullivan v. Ross' Estate, 113 Mich. 311, 318, 71 N. W. 634, 78 N. W. 309; Metcalf v. Williams, 144 Mass. 452, 11 N. E. 700; Snow v. Alley, 156 Mass. 193, 30 N. E. 691; Fuller-Warren Co. v. Harter, 110 Wis. 80, 85 N. W. 698, 53 L. R. A. 603, 84 Am. St. Rep. 867; Clark v. Heath, 101 Me. 530, 64 Atl. 918, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 144; Bank v. Danckmeyer, 70 Mo. App. 168; Hill v. Combs, 92 Mo. App. 242; 7 Ency. Plead. & Prac. 361; 15 Cyc. 252; 24 Amer. & Eng. Ency. (2d Ed.) 816.

[4] It is manifest that Hartwig did not have two remedies in point of fact. We may concede that he supposed he had, when he instituted the action for damages. But he was in error in thinking he had that right. The record shows he lost. Defendant defeated him in his effort to get back the premiums, and now, if it defeats the policy also, it will have gained, through the law, an unconscionable victory. The fact that a party wrongly supposes he has two rights and chooses the one to which he is not entitled "is not enough to prevent his exercising the other, if he is entitled to that. There would be no sense or principle in such a rule." Snow v. Alley, supra. "The plaintiff's previous action was fruitless, because she had no right to maintain it upon her own showing; but that did not preclude her from subsequently bringing an action in which she asserted a right which she possessed. She had made no election, for there was no choice of remedies against the defendant, and in suing him with others, as for a conspiracy, she mistook, or misconceived, her remedy and was dismissed; but she did not forfeit her legal right to bring this action to recover from the defendant what he owed her. Any step or action taken by her, which was fruitless because proceeding upon a misconception of the rights which the law gave her, left her unaffected as to any legal remedy which she did possess." Henry v. Herrington, 193 N. Y. 218, 86 N. E. 29, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 249.

In Capp v. Insurance Co., 117 Mo. App. 532, 94 S. W. 734, there was no refusal of premium by the insurance company; none was offered. The insured, after having paid a number of premiums, tired of the contract and quit paying, and the company undertook to forfeit the policy, when, in fact, under the statute, it was nonforfeitable, since he was entitled to extended or paid-up insurance, based on the value of his policy when he ceased to pay. He brought his action, basing it upon the statute for extended insurance, of the benefit of which statute, he alleged, defendant had deprived him by the forfeiture. We decided that the statute for extended insurance was a part of the contract, and that therefore there had not been and could not be a forfeiture, and that the policy was still a subsisting contract for the statutory extended time; and therefore no damages had accrued to him. While the point here involved was not discussed, it was assumed that Capp's unsuccessful action for damages would not bar an action on the policy, if he died within the extended time. It was not decided in the Capp Case that, where one wishing to continue his insurance tenders his proper premium, and the insurance company wrongfully refuses to receive it, he cannot treat the contract as at an end and sue for all premiums which he had theretofore paid. We did not consider that proposition; and, though we have been cited to Smith v. Insurance Co., 173 Mo. 329, 72 S. W. 935, as holding that an insured cannot waive his statutory right to extended insurance, except as provided by the statute, and to Bishop v. Insurance Co., 85 Mo. App. 302, as, in effect, deciding that he could, we do not believe that question to be involved in this case. It is true Hartwig brought the former action for damages on the ground that his policy had been wrongfully forfeited; yet it was shown by the result that he had mistaken his remedy, and we have already seen such mistake will not bar the present action.

The further ground is claimed that Hartwig abandoned the policy. We do not see any evidence in the record of an intention to abandon. It was not pleaded, and was not submitted as an issue.

Other suggestions against the judgment have been noted, but we have not found anything to justify a reversal; and it is therefore affirmed. All concur.

PARKVIEW REALTY & IMPROVE-MENT CO. et al.

(St. Louis Court of Appeals, Missouri, Dec. 8, 1912.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 519*)—SPECIAL ASSESSMENTS—PRIOR INCUMBRANCES.

Special taxes assessed against specific property for street improvements are a lien on the property superior to all other incumbrances thereon.

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 525*)—SPECIAL TAX BILLS—ENFORCEMENT.

A suit to enforce special tax bills is in the nature of a proceeding in rem, and compulsory payment of the judgment can only be made by a sale of the assessed property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1240, 1241; Dec. Dig. § 525.*]

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 565*)—SPECIAL TAX BILLS—ENFORCEMENT—PARTIES.

Beneficiaries of prior incumbrances on land subject to a lien for special taxes are not necessary, but proper, parties in a suit to enforce the bills.

4. COURTS (§ 93*)—CONTROLLING DECISIONS—STARE DECISIS.

A decision of the Supreme Court that the lien of special tax bills is superior to prior incumbrances is a rule of property binding on all courts in proceedings involving the same question.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Cent. Dig. §§ 336-339; Dec. Dig. § 93.*]

5. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 565*)—SPECIAL TAX BILLS—ENFORCEMENT—PARTIES.

The owner against whom a special tax bill has been issued, and who was the legal owner at the time the lien of the tax bill attached, is the only necessary party defendant in a suit for the enforcement of the lien.

7. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 565*)—SPECIAL TAX BILLS—"OWNER."

The word "owner" in the St. Louis city charter, providing for special taxes for street improvements, against the property benefited, and providing that tax bills shall be a lien on the property charged therewith, and that suits for the enforcement thereof shall be brought against the owner of the land, is used in its restricted sense, and means the "legal owner," though the term in its wider sense may include any person beneficially interested in the property.

8. INTEREST (§ 38*)—LEGAL INTEREST—JUDGMENT.

Under Rev. St. 1909, §§ 7179, 7181, fixing 6 per cent. as the legal rate of interest, and declaring that judgments shall bear 6 per cent., and that judgments on contracts bearing more than 6 per cent. shall bear the same interest as fixed by the contracts, a judgment enforcing a special tax bill draws interest at the rate of 6 per cent., though the charter of the city authorizing the issuance of the bills provides for 8 per cent. interest in case of default.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Interest, Cent. Dig. §§ 79-82; Dec. Dig. § 38.*]

9. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 301*)—QUESTIONS REVIEWABLE—ERROR APPARENT ON THE RECORD.

The error in a judgment enforcing a special tax bill which provides for interest at 8 per cent. per annum from date of judgment until paid, while the judgment draws only 6 per cent., appears on the face of the record, and the court on appeal must review it, though the motion for new trial does not complain of it.

Norton, J., dissenting.

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; Eugene McQuillan, Judge.

Action by the Granite Bituminous Paving Company against the Parkview Realty & Improvement Company and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed, and cause certified to the Supreme Court for final determination.

Bland & Cave and Carter, Collins & Jones, all of St. Louis, for appellants. Sturdevant & Sturdevant, of St. Louis, for respondent.

ROMBAUER, Special Judge. This is a suit on a special tax bill issued in pursuance of the charter provisions of the city of St. Louis relating to street improvements. The suit was tried by the circuit court without the intervention of a jury, and resulted in a judgment for plaintiff in the sum of $1,615.25, with interest at the rate of 8 per centum per annum from date, charging the lot against which said tax bill was issued, with the amount of the judgment, interest, and costs, and ordering the sheriff of the city of St. Louis to sell the same to satisfy the amount thus found to be due. From this judgment all the defendants appealed, assigning for error that the judgment is against the law and the evidence, was excessive as far as the interest was concerned, and was erroneous, because the tax bill was barred by limitation, as far as all defendants were concerned save the Parkview Realty & Improvement Company, who had ceased to be an owner, its title having been divested prior to the trial of the case by foreclosure proceedings. The appeal was heard at the last term of this court, and resulted in a reversal of the judgment. Upon a motion for rehearing filed by respondent some doubts were entertained by the court as to the correctness of that ruling, and, in view of the grave importance of the question to the municipality as well as to individual owners of real property within the city, full argument on the motion for rehearing was ordered at the present term. One of the judges being disqualified to sit, the undersigned was with the consent of all parties appointed special judge.

In order to pass intelligently upon the contention of the defendants that the judgment is erroneous for reasons hereinabove stated, it is necessary to set out certain provisions of the charter of the city of St. Louis relating to street improvement. Section 14 of article 6 levies the tax against the property benefited. Section 24 directs the issuance of the tax bill, but does not require that any one be named therein as owner. Section 25 provides that the tax bills shall be a lien on the property charged therewith, but does not impose any personal liability on the owner. This section further provides that suit for the enforcement of the tax bills shall be brought in the name of the contractor against the owners of the land, and that such tax bills shall be barred by limitation after two years from their maturity, unless proceedings in law shall have been commenced to collect the same within two years from their maturity.

[1] It was a mooted question in this state at one time whether special taxes assessed against specified property for street improvements stood as to their superior lien over prior incumbrances upon the same footing as general taxes assessed by the state. This question has since the trial of the cause in the lower court been set at rest by the opinion of the Supreme Court in the case of the Morey Engineering & Construction Company v. St. Louis Artificial Ice Rink Co. (Sup.) 146 S. W. 1142, which decides that question in the affirmative.

[2, 3] The further question, however, which is the vital question in this case, namely, whether prior incumbrancers of the property charged with the special tax lien, are necessary parties to a suit brought by the contractor against the owner, not only for the purpose of subordinating their lien to the superior lien of the special tax bill, but also for the purpose of keeping alive the lien of the special tax bill for more than two years after its maturity, is a question which has not been decided by that case, and is one which must be determined by the rules of law defining the respective rights of the holders of senior and junior incumbrances in proceedings brought to foreclose the senior lien. The Supreme Court in the Morey Engineering Case, supra, quoting from Barber v. St. Joseph, 183 Mo. 451, 82 S. W. 64, holds that "proceedings to enforce special tax bills are in the nature of proceedings in rem, and compulsory payment of the judgment can only be made by a sale of the assessed property"; and, quoting from the case of Keating v. Craig, 73 Mo. 507, further holds that the lien of a special tax bill like the lien of general taxes is superior to any incumbrance, with which the owner may charge the land. If this be so, beneficiaries of prior incumbrances upon the land hold the same right against the lien of a special tax bill as the junior mortgagee holds against the prior mortgagee. The former is a proper party to any proceeding to enforce the superior lien by foreclosure, but he is not a necessary party. If not made a party, he is not confined to his right to redeem, but may attack the validity of the prior incumbrance in any subsequent proceeding because he had no day in court. To use a terse definition of his rights, his right of entry is gone, but his right of action remains. His right to redeem before foreclosure sale remains intact, even if he is made a party to the foreclosure proceedings.

Having thus stated the general rules of law applicable to a case stated, we shall apply them to the uncontroverted facts in this case. The special tax bill sued upon was issued to the plaintiff July 1, 1905. At that time there were the following recorded liens by deed on the property: One dated April 30, 1901, in favor of Isaac H. Orr, trustee, to secure certain notes. One dated July 1, 1902, to the Lincoln Trust Company to secure certain bonds, and one dated August 1, 1902, to the Lincoln Trust Company to secure certain other bonds. The Parkview Realty & Improvement Company was the legal owner of the property when these two last mortgages were made and recorded, and was also the legal owner of the property when the tax bill in question was issued. On July 19, 1905, notice of the issue of this tax bill was served on the Parkview Realty & Improvement Company, and on June 28, 1907, and within two years from the maturity of said tax bill, suit was brought against the Parkview Realty & Improvement Company, Isaac H. Orr, trustee in the mortgage of April 30, 1901, and the Lincoln Trust Company, trustee, in the two mortgages of July 1 and August 1, 1902. None of the beneficiaries in these mortgages were made parties defendant. These mortgages are not set out in the abstract of the evidence of the appellant, nor does it appear that they were ever offered in evidence. The plaintiff's amended petition, however, on which the cause was tried, stated that the mortgage of July 1, 1902, of the Parkview Realty & Improvement Company to the Lincoln Trust Company, as trustee for bondholders secured 5,000 bonds, and the mortgage of August 1, 1902, between the same parties secured 2,000 bonds, and that the Nina Realty Company became the purchaser of the property charged with the plaintiff's lien on the foreclosure sale of these mortgages, subsequent to the issue to plaintiff of the tax bill in question. While these allegations are denied by the defendants' answers, they are admitted to be true in the briefs of counsel, and we have taken them to be true, otherwise we cannot see how the defendants could have any standing in this court. All the defendants except the Parkview Realty & Improvement Company in their separate answers set up the fact that the tax bill, owing to the two years limitation of the lien contained in section 25 of the charter of the city of St. Louis, hereinabove set out, has become invalid. During the pendency of the suit, the Nina Realty Company became purchaser of the property, under foreclosure of the mortgages to the Lincoln Trust Company, and it was made a party defendant to the suit by amended petition on November 20, 1908, when more than two years had elapsed from and after the maturity of the tax bill. We may state at the outset that it is next to impossible to reconcile the various conflicting decisions of the appellate courts in this state on the question whether in proceedings for enforcement of special tax bills incumbrancers prior in time and record are necessary parties to enforce the bill against the property.

[4] Prior to the decision in the Morey Engineering & Construction Company Case, supra, the same conflict existed on the question as to whether the lien of a mortgage prior in time and record to the issue of a special tax bill constituted a superior or inferior lien on the property to the lien of a tax bill. When that case decided that the lien of the tax bill was superior, it necessarily decided, by analogy to the rights of other prior and subsequent lienors, that the incumbrancer whose lien was subordinate was not a necessary party to the proceeding. This decision establishes a rule of property which on well-settled principles is binding on all courts of the state in proceedings involving the same question.

[5] It logically follows from the foregoing that, under the recent decision of the Supreme Court, the owner against whom the bill has been issued, and who was the legal owner at the time the lien of the tax bill attached, is the only necessary party defendant in proceedings for the enforcement of its lien, and, if the suit is instituted against him within two years after maturity of the bill, it is sufficient to preserve the lien of the bill, although parties beneficially interested in liens on the property prior in time, or becoming owners by the foreclosure of such liens, may never be made parties defendant.

[6, 7] There is another consideration equally potent which leads to the same conclusion. It is a maxim of judicial procedure that, where two conclusions are equally admissible in construing a law, the one should be adopted by the court which will best carry out the object which the lawgivers sought to reach. The term "owner" in its restricted sense means the legal owner, and in its wider sense any person beneficially interested in the property. The city charter in providing for the pay of the contractor in special tax bills must have used the term owner in its more restricted sense, since otherwise the lien of the special tax bill in preference to existing liens created by deed would have become practically unenforceable, and furnish the contractor no security whatever. Of this the facts disclosed by the record in this case furnish the fairest illustration. The two trust deeds held by the Lincoln Trust Company, as above seen, secured 7,000 bonds. Nothing to the contrary appearing in the record, we must assume that these bonds, as all other bonds of a similar character, were negotiable by delivery, and may have been negotiated to seven thousand different persons, each of whom under the rule well established in this state would have become a pro tanto beneficial owner in the property charged by the tax lien, and under the defendants' contention of the proper construction of the law a necessary party defendant to the foreclosure of plaintiff's tax lien. Yet the plaintiff could not have ascertained by the greatest diligence the name of such parties, since the law requires no registry of these transfers. On the other hand, the contractor's claim is based upon records accessible to all interested in the property from its inception to the date of the issue of the tax bill. The work performed by him is bound to be performed in the immediate vicinity of the property to be charged with the tax lien, and there is nothing to prevent those beneficially interested from informing themselves of its character and extent.

The law puts the onus on the contractor to ascertain who is the legal owner of the property benefited when the tax bill against it is issued, and who hence is a necessary party to a suit for its enforcement against the property. Prima facie the owner of record is the legal owner, unless the contractor is aware of an unrecorded conveyance changing the ownership. Vance v. Corrigan, 78 Mo. 94. The exception to this rule is ownership by descent, because the contractor can always ascertain by reasonable inquiry whether the apparent record owner is living or dead, and, if dead, who his heirs are. The case of Jaicks v. Sullivan, 128 Mo. loc. cit. 186, 30 S. W. 890, furnishes an apt illustration. In that case Richard L. Sullivan was sued as owner four years after his death. The plaintiff sought to amend his petition by bringing in his widow and heirs after the two-year limitation had barred the tax bill. The Supreme Court held that the lien of the tax bill had expired because the suit against a dead man could not be considered the institution of a suit against the owner on any principle.

The point has been made upon the argument that the tax bill is under the charter prima facie evidence only against the owner, and hence, if the other defendants other than the Parkview Realty Company were not owners within the purview of the charter provisions, no judgment could be rendered affecting their interests upon the evidence of the tax bill alone. That objection is not sustained by the record which shows that the plaintiff offered in evidence the ordinance and contract under which the work was done, and proved by its general manager that the plaintiff had performed the work called for by the contract.

The foregoing considerations lead to the conclusion that the judgment of the court was correct, and should be affirmed, unless, the defendants' contention that it is excessive in interest is born out of the record proper. An argument was pressed upon us that the judgment is excessive, as far as part of the interest is concerned. It suffices to say in disposing of this objection that the judgment is not challenged on that ground by the motion for new trial.

[8, 9] Section 7179 of the Revised Statutes provides that creditors shall receive interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum when no other rate is agreed upon for all moneys after they become due and demand of payment is made. Section 7181 provides that all judgments for money shall bear 6 per cent. interest per annum until satisfaction be made by payment, and that judgments upon contracts, bearing more than 6 per cent. interest, shall bear the same interest as borne by such contracts. The 8 per cent. interest which the charter provides if default be made in the payment of a tax bill is penal interest, and not one provided by contract, hence the judgment in this case, as far as it recites that the judgment rendered shall bear 8 per cent. interest, is excessive to that extent. This error appears by the record entry of the judgment, and we are bound to take cognizance of it, although the defendants' motion for new trial does not complain of it, because the judgment to that extent is a judgment against the law.

It is therefore ordered that the motion for rehearing be sustained, and that so much of the judgment entry as contains the words, "with interest at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum from the date of the judgment until paid," be stricken from the record, and that the judgment as thus amended be affirmed, and that the cause be remanded to the trial court to enter up judgment in conformity with this opinion.

REYNOLDS, P. J., concurs. CAULFIELD, J., not sitting. NORTONI, J., dissents in a separate opinion, and asks that the case be certified to the Supreme Court, deeming the majority opinion in conflict, with decisions of the Supreme Court and the Kansas City Court of Appeals referred to in his opinion.

It is accordingly ordered by the court that this case be certified to the Supreme Court.

NORTONI, J. (dissenting). This is a suit on a special tax bill issued in accordance with the charter provisions of the city of St. Louis in compensation for street improvement. Plaintiff prevailed in the suit, and the court gave judgment establishing the lien of the tax bill against the lot of defendant Nina Realty Company in the amount of $1,600.23 and interest thereon.

There are several defendants and all of them appeal from this judgment, but the Nina Realty Company alone, as owner of the lot on which the lien is enforced, is the substantial party in interest. The other defendants are prior owners of the property and trustees in certain deeds of trust thereon, and it will be unnecessary to set them forth here, as they are without any beneficial interest in the property and the judgment is in no sense a personal one against them. At the time the judgment was entered, the lot on which the lien of the tax bill is sought to be established was owned by defendant Nina Realty Company, who succeeded to the title of the Parkview Realty & Improvement Company by virtue of the foreclosure of certain deeds of trust thereon under which the Nina Realty Company purchased. The lot of ground involved is parcel of city block No. 3878, fronting 405.17 feet on Union boulevard in the city of St. Louis. Plaintiff contractor reconstructed Union boulevard adjacent thereto in accordance with an ordinance of and under a contract with the city of St. Louis to that end. At the time of the improvement and the issue of the tax bill therefor, the lot was owned by the Parkview Realty & Improvement Company, a corporation, subject, however, to two deeds of trust then outstanding thereon. The first of these deeds of trust was executed on July 1, 1902, by the Parkview Realty & Improvement Company, owner, to the Lincoln Trust Company, trustee, to secure certain bonds. The second of such deeds of trust was executed on August 1, 1902, to the Lincoln Trust Company, trustee, to secure certain other bonds, and both of such deeds were duly recorded about the time of their execution. While these deeds of trust were in force and the indebtedness evinced by the bonds therein described was subsisting and unpaid, the city provided by ordinance for the reconstruction of Union boulevard. This ordinance appears to have been passed in February, 1903, and the contract for such reconstruction work was duly let thereunder to plaintiff. Plaintiff performed the work in accordance with the ordinance and contract, and on July 1, 1905, the tax bill sued on was issued to him therefor. Thereafter, on July 19, 1905, notice of the issuance of the tax bill was duly served by the city marshal on the defendant, Parkview Realty & Improvement Company, owner of the fee, but on no other defendant. As originally issued, the tax bill was payable in installments, but upon the failure of the owner of the property to pay the first installment when due, plaintiff exercised its option under the city charter, and declared all installments thereof due and payable. Under the provision of the charter, the first installment of the tax bill became due 30 days after notice thereof was served on the owner—that is, on August 19, 1905—and subsequent installments became due immediately likewise because of the owner's failure to pay the first installment. Thereafter, on June 20, 1907, and within two years from the maturity of the tax bill, August 19, 1905, plaintiff instituted this suit to the end of establishing and enforcing the lien thereof against defendant Parkview Realty & Improvement Company, owner, and the trustee in the two deeds of trust, but omitted to make the beneficiaries in such deeds of trust parties thereto. Subsequently, and after the expiration of more than two years from the maturity of the tax bill, the property was sold at trustee's sale under the two deeds of trust above mentioned, and the Nina Realty Company became the purchaser thereof. Such sales under the two deeds of trust were had on November 2, 1908, and it was on that day the Nina Realty Company succeeded to the title of the prior owner, Parkview Realty & Improvement Company, through its purchase at the trustee's sale. The Nina Realty Company, having thus become owner of the fee during the pendency of the suit, was made a party defendant thereto on November 20, 1908. By filing an amended petition on that date plaintiff set forth the trustee's sales and the fact that the Nina Realty Company had purchased the lot thereunder, made that company a defendant, and prayed that its interests as owner of the property should be subject to the lien of the tax bill in suit.

Among other things, section 25, art. 3, of the city charter, provides the lien of any tax bill that is not entered satisfied within two years after its maturity, unless proceedings in law shall have been commenced to collect the same within that time and shall still be pending, shall be destroyed and of no effect against the land charged therewith. In view of this provision of the charter, the defendant Nina Realty Company interposed its answer to the effect that the lien of the tax bill had expired and was unenforceable against its interests in the property for the reason that no suit had been instituted thereon within two years after the maturity of the bill against the beneficiaries in the deed of trust under which it purchased. Though the Parkview Realty & Improvement Company, owner at the time, was sued within the two-year period, the case concedes that the beneficiaries in the two deeds of trust under which defendant Nina Realty Company purchased were not made parties thereto at any time. Indeed, the first move made toward bringing the interests of the beneficiaries before the court was the amended petition filed on November 20, 1908, adding the Nina Realty Company, who succeeded to their rights as a defendant, and this was long after the expiration of the two-year period prescribed in the charter, for that period commenced to run when the tax bill matured on August 19, 1905, and terminated August 19, 1907. Notwithstanding all of this, the court gave judgment for plaintiff, establishing and enforcing the lien of the tax bill against the lot of ground described and the interests of both the Parkview Realty & Improvement Company and the Nina Realty Company therein, as though it were unnecessary to include the beneficiaries in the deeds of trust in a suit for the enforcement of the tax bill within the two-year period prescribed to charge them or their successors as owners of the property with the consequences of the lien.

Obviously error lies in this judgment, for it involves and affirms the idea that one's rights may be concluded as though a valid claim existed against him or his property without having his day in court until long after such claim had become extinguished of its own force. By section 25, art. 6, of the charter, it is provided the tax bill shall become a lien upon the property charged therein, and may be collected of the owner of the land and in the name of and by the contractor as any other claim in any court of competent jurisdiction. From this it appears that the lien is to be enforced against the land in the name of the owner thereof, and by subsequent provision of the same section the lien of the tax bill, it is declared, "shall be destroyed and of no effect against the land charged therewith," unless proceedings shall have been commenced to collect the same within two years from the maturity of the bill and still be pending. Therefore, the proceedings must be commenced on the tax bill and against the owner of the land within such two-year period in order to preserve and establish the lien, for otherwise it is destroyed and extinguished perforce of the very words that gave it life. The authorities are abundant and of one accord, to the effect that the suit must be instituted against the owner within the two-year period prescribed, as will appear by reference to the following cases: The case of Eyer mann v. Scollay, 16 Mo. App. 498, declares and affirms the rule under the St. Louis charter. And the following are to the same effect with respect to the charter of Kansas City: Smith v. Barrett, 41 Mo. App. 460; Jaicks v. Sullivan, 128 Mo. 177, 30 S. W. 890; Smith v. Boese, 39 Mo. App. 15; Forrey v. Holmes, 65 Mo. App. 114; Parker-Washington v. Kemper, 143 Mo. App. 244, 128 S. W. 271. For rulings to the same effect under the St. Joseph Charter, see St. Joseph v. Baker, 86 Mo. App. 310; St. Joseph v. Baker, 113 Mo. App. 691, 88 S. W. 1122. The doctrine declared by all of the cases is that the two-year period prescribed after which the lien is to terminate is not a mere statute of repose to bar actions but is rather a limit to the existence of the lien, and therefore, unless the suit is instituted against the owner within that time, such lien expires, and it may not be revived and enforced against the interests of the owner in the land. Smith v. Barrett, 41 Mo. App. 460. But it is said, though such be true, the present suit was instituted against the Parkview Realty & Improvement Company, owner, within the two-year period, and that will suffice to establish the lien against the derivative title of the Nina Realty Company, though the beneficiaries in the deeds of trust were not made parties; for, it is said, such beneficiaries possess nothing more as against this plaintiff lienor than the right to redeem therefrom. There can be no doubt that the lien of a subsequent special tax bill duly established prevails over the lien of a prior mortgage or deed of trust, and becomes senior thereto. Such is the effect of the recent decision of the Supreme Court in Morey Engineering, etc., Co. v. St. Louis Artificial Ice, etc., Co. (Sup.) 146 S. W. 1142. This is undoubtedly the rule where both the owner of the land and the beneficiaries in the mortgage are made parties to the suit prior to the expiration of the lien, for in the case last above cited all parties in interest were before the court. See, also, to the same effect Keating v. Craig, 73 Mo. 507, where both the owner and the mortgage were parties to the suit to enforce the lien of the tax bill. But though it be the rule that the lien of the subsequent tax bill becomes senior to the lien of the prior mortgage, which is remitted to the position of the junior lienor when all parties in interest are before the court, it is the rule, too, that the rights of the beneficiaries in the mortgage are not concluded by the judgment, unless they are made parties to the suit. For a judgment to this effect on a tax bill, see Forrey v. Holmes, 65 Mo. App. 114. As to such beneficiaries who have been omitted from the suit to foreclose the state's lien for taxes, the Supreme Court has, in a number of cases, affirmed that, though title passed by the execution sale, their right to redeem was still available, as will appear by reference to Stafford v. Fizer, 82 Mo. 393; Gitchell v. Kreidler, 84 Mo. 472; Corrigan v. Bell, 73 Mo. 53; Allen v. McCabe, 93 Mo. 138, 6 S. W. 62. Considering the thought reflected throughout all of these authorities, it is obvious that the beneficiary in the deed of trust or mortgage is required to be made a party to the suit, for the reason that he is an owner within the sense of that term as employed in the charter provision and as employed in the statute with respect to general taxes levied in behalf of the state. Some of the cases put the rule expressly on the ground that the beneficiary is an owner. See Stafford v. Fizer, 82 Mo. 393; Gitchell v. Kreidler, 84 Mo. 472. Furthermore, the Supreme Court, in the recent case of Morey Engineering, etc., Co. v. St. Louis Artificial Ice, etc., Co. (Sup.) 146 S. W. 1142, in construing the St. Louis charter, declared the beneficiary in the deed of trust an owner within the sense of that term, to the end of raising the lien of the tax bill from the position of the junior, where it otherwise lay, to that of senior lien over a mortgage prior thereto in point of time. To the end of evincing that the charter contemplated the lien of the tax bill should prevail over the rights of a prior mortgage, the Supreme Court quoted from section 25 of the charter as follows: "Said tax bills shall be and become a lien upon the property charged therewith, and may be collected of the owner of the land and in the name of and by the contractor as any other claim in any court of competent jurisdiction." Touching the words thus quoted, the court says: "Construed in the light of the case last cited, this means that the tax is a lien upon the property, to be enforced by a proceeding in rem against the property. And, as ruled above, the word 'owner' includes incumbrancers." If, then, the beneficiary in the deed of trust is to be regarded as an owner of the property for the purpose of postponing the lien of his prior mortgage to the lien of the subsequent tax bill, it would seem that he should be regarded as an owner in whose favor the requirement to institute suit within the two-year period in order to preserve the lien obtained. On a like question the Kansas City Court of Appeals, under the charter of that city, declared that, unless the beneficiary in the mortgage was made a party to the suit within the two-year period, the lien as to his interests amounted to naught, or, in other words, had expired. See Forray v. Holmes, 65 Mo. App. 114.

But it is argued that the junior lienor is never a necessary party to a proceeding for the enforcement of the senior lien, and that a valid judgment may be had against the res enforcing the lien, though the junior lienor is not a party, but subject, however, to his right to redeem. The argument is obviously sound in those cases where the lien is a continuing one, and so comprehensive by the terms of the statutes as to include all interests in the land in whosoever name it may be. The cases of Stafford v. Fizer, 82 Mo. 393, Gitchell v. Kreidler, 84 Mo. 472, Allen v. McCabe, 93 Mo. 138, 6 S. W. 62, and numerous other authorities declare the rule where the lien of the state for taxes has been enforced. In the argument advancing this proposition, it is said the junior lienor, the holder of the mortgage here, at best has a lien only on the equity of redemption or a right to redeem from the prior lien of the tax bill, and that this continues and may be availed of to the very day of sale under the tax judgment; that, though defendant Nina Realty Company was not made a party until after the two years had expired and the beneficiaries in the mortgages to whose rights it succeeded were never made parties at all, its right to redeem is still open, and this defendant has been given its day in court with respect thereto, for it may redeem even after the judgment is affirmed and at any time before the property is sold in execution thereunder. Obviously this argument assumes a subsisting lien against the interests of the

Nina Realty Company from which a redemption may be made. If the lien continued to exist as in the tax cases and obtained upon the realty without regard to the ownership, the argument would be persuasive, indeed. But here the lien of the tax bill expired before it was ever asserted, as the charter requires, against the beneficiaries in the mortgages or the Nina Realty Company, which succeeded to their rights, and, furthermore, the lien of the tax bill does not obtain against the land without regard to the ownership. The general taxes in favor of the state are declared by section 11385, R. S. 1909, to obtain against the land "no matter who is the owner nor in whose name it was assessed." And the lien with respect to such taxes obtains accordingly there; that is, on every interest in the land. It is true that the owner of the land must be made a party to the tax suit for the purpose of enforcing the lien of the state, to the end of conferring the jurisdiction over the res, but the tax itself is affixed against the land as a matter of law without regard to the owner thereof. Such is not true as to a tax bill representing special assessments as for benefits because of improvements made, for, unless the improvements are made, no tax can obtain, and that such improvements were made is a fact to be proved as a basis for the lien. Special tax bills become a lien upon the property, and may be collected of the owner of the land, it is true, but to this end proof is required against the interest of the owner as a condition precedent to affixing the lien upon his interest in the land. This proof, according to section 25 of the charter, may be made by the tax bill itself, which is sufficient prima facie evidence "of the liability of the person therein named as the owner of the land charged with such bill to pay the same." The tax bill here involved names the Parkview Realty & Improvement Company as the owner of the land, and in no way refers to the beneficiaries in the mortgages. Obviously, then, the bill itself is sufficient to evince the right of a lien against only the Parkview Realty & Improvement Company. In the sense of the charter, as before pointed out, the beneficiaries in the mortgages are regarded as owners of the property too, and it is essential when others appear to be owners than those named in the tax bill that proof aliunde the bill shall be made in order to affect the rights of such owners not named therein. See Farrell v. Rammelkamp, 64 Mo. App. 425; McCormick v. Clopton, 150 Mo. App. 129, 130 S. W. 122. That the tax bill is not prima facie evidence of the right to the lien against a mortgagee not named therein has been expressly decided, as will appear by reference to Kansas City to the use, etc., v. American Surety Co., 71 Mo. App. 315. Obviously the charter intends that every person interested as owner in the property sought to be subject to the lien of the tax bill shall have a right to defend against the assertion of such lien, and most assuredly the assertion of the lien should be made while the right to it continues to exist and not after it dies, for then defense would be unnecessary. From these considerations alone, it would seem that the rule which prevails as to the right of the junior incumbrancer to redeem from the general tax lien, and, except for that, a judgment to which he is not a party concludes him, is without force here, for, unless this lien is established by evidence aliunde the tax bill, no lien whatever obtains against the rights of such owner as the Nina Realty Company; whereas, in the case of the lien for general taxes, it comprehends the whole estate and every interest in the land, without regard to matter of ownership whatever, and obtains against both prior and subsequent incumbrancer at all hazards. In the case of the special tax bill, the lien obtains against the owners and their interests in the land only by virtue of its being established against their interest in the land by proof and not because it comprehends such interests whether or no as a matter of law. Unless the lien is asserted within the two-year period and subsequently established, there is naught from which redemption should be made.

It seems to me the opinion of the court in this case overlooks the fact that there is no lien here until established, and treats the matter as though there were a subsisting lien as in the case of general taxes or in the case of a mortgage, both of which liens obtain without any proof whatever. In this cause, instead of there being a lien upon the land, there exists only a right to establish a lien which attaches provided competent proof is made against the owner within two years. If the mortgagee is an owner, as declared in Morey Engineering & Construction Co. v. St. Louis Artificial Ice Rink Co. (Sup.) 146 S. W. 1142, then such mortgagee should be sued within the two years limitation prescribed by the charter in favor of an owner. For the reasons given above, I respectfully dissent. I deem the judgment of the court to be in conflict with that of the Supreme Court in the case last cited, in that it denies to the mortgagee the right of an owner to be sued within two years, as prescribed by the charter. Furthermore, the judgment of the court in this case is in conflict with the judgment of the Kansas City Court of Appeals in the case of Forrey v. Holmes et al., 85 Mo. App. 114, which is directly in point, to the effect that, unless the mortgagee is sued within two years, the right to establish a lien against his interests expires.

Because I deem the judgment to be in conflict with that given in the two cases last above cited, I request that the cause be certified to the Supreme Court for final determination.

GRANITE BITUMINOUS PAVING CO. v. PARKVIEW REALTY & IMPROVEMENT CO. et al.

(St. Louis Court of Appeals. Missouri. Dec. 3, 1912.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 564*)—ENFORCEMENT OF SPECIAL TAX BILLS—LIMITATIONS.

Under St. Louis City Charter, art. 6, § 25, providing for the maturity of special tax bills 30 days after service of notice on the owner, an action to enforce a tax bill brought within two years after maturity of the bill by service of notice against the owner, wherein the purchaser at a mortgage foreclosure sale is made a party defendant, is not barred by limitations.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1273; Dec. Dig. § 564.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 195*)—QUESTIONS REVIEWABLE—QUESTIONS NOT RAISED IN TRIAL COURT.

Where, in a suit to enforce a special tax bill, no question was raised as to the validity of the amendment of the bill so as to name one as owner, and no objection was made to the admission of the amended tax bill as evidence, the question of the validity of the amendment was immaterial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 1149; Dec. Dig. § 195.*]

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; Eugene McQuillan, Judge.

Action by the Granite Bituminous Paving Company against the Parkview Realty & Improvement Company and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Bland & Cave and Carter, Collins & Jones, all of St. Louis, for appellants. Sturdevant & Sturdevant, of St. Louis, for respondent.

ROMBAUER, Special Judge. The record in this cause is identical with the record in cause 12,563, 151 S. W. 479, in which an opinion has been filed to-day, except in three respects, namely: First. That the amount of the special tax bill sued upon was only for $160.81. Second. That the tax bill as originally issued was subsequently amended by the comptroller, so as to insert the name of the Parkview Realty Company as owner; the bill originally issued being one against the United Railways Company alone. Third. Notice and demand of payment was served on the Parkview Realty & Improvement Company named as owner in the special tax bill on February 28, 1907, and not before.

[1] Section 25 of article 6 of the charter of the city of St. Louis provides the conditions under which a special tax bill matures. The maturity of any installment of the bill, or of the entire bill as may be, is 30 days after notice is served on the owner; hence the special tax bill sued upon in this case matured as against the Parkview Realty Company on March 30, 1907. The Nina Realty Company, which is the successor in title of the Parkview Realty & Improvement Company as well as of all the beneficiaries of the two mortgages of the Parkview Realty Company to the Lincoln Trust Company, was made a party defendant in the case on March 28, 1907, and within two years after the tax bill matured against the Parkview Realty Company and those claiming under it. Since it cannot be claimed on any rational theory that the beneficiaries in a deed of trust or mortgage are necessary parties defendant to a suit for its enforcement, after its foreclosure, and when the legal and beneficial title alike have vested in the purchaser at foreclosure sale, and since the purchaser, namely, the Nina Realty Company, was made a party defendant, within two years after the maturity of the bill, the question of limitation does not arise in this case.

[2] That the special tax bill was amended so as to name the Parkview Realty & Improvement Company as owner is, of course, immaterial, since no question is raised as to the validity of the amendment, and no objection was made by defendant to the admission of the amended tax bill as evidence. The same error appears by the record in making the judgment bear 8 per cent. interest from date of its rendition as in case 12,563.

It is therefore ordered that the motion for rehearing be sustained, and that so much of the judgment entry as contains the words "with interest at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum from the date of the judgment until paid" be stricken from the record, and that the judgment as thus amended be affirmed, and that the cause be remanded to the trial court to proceed in conformity with this opinion.

GRANITE BITUMINOUS PAVING CO. v. PARKVIEW REALTY & IMPROVEMENT CO. et al.

(St. Louis Court of Appeals. Missouri. Dec. 8, 1912.)

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; Eugene McQuillan, Judge.

Action by the Granite Bituminous Paving Company against the Parkview Realty & Improvement Company and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed, and cause certified to the Supreme Court for final determination.

Bland & Cave and Carter, Collins & Jones, all of St. Louis, for appellants. Sturdevant & Sturdevant and Charles W. Bates, all of St. Louis, for respondent.

ROMBAUER, Special Judge. The record in this cause is identical with the one in 12,563, except the amount sued for, and the property sought to be charged with the lien of the special tax bill.

It is therefore ordered that the motion for rehearing be sustained, that the record entry of the judgment be amended, as is ordered to be done in cause 12,563 (151 S. W. 479), and as thus amended be affirmed, and that the cause be remanded to the trial court for further proceedings. In this disposition of the case REYNOLDS, P. J., concurs. CAULFIELD, J., not sitting. NORTONI, J., dissents for the reason stated in his dissenting opinion in cause No. 12,563.

The cause is therefore certified to the Supreme Court for final determination.

NORTONI, J. (dissenting). As the judgment of the court in this case involves the identical question and determines it in the same way as that involved in the case of Granite Bituminous Paving Company v. Parkview Realty & Improvement Company et al. (No. 12,563) 151 S. W. 479, between the same parties and decided to-day, I respectfully dissent therefrom for the reasons given in the dissenting opinion filed in the case last mentioned. I deem the judgment of the court in this case to be in conflict with the judgment of the Kansas City Court of Appeals in the case of Forrey v. Holmes, 65 Mo. App. 114, and also with the judgment of the Supreme Court in the case of Morey Engineering & Construction Co. v. St. Louis Artificial Ice Rink Co. (Sup.) 146 S. W. 1142, and therefore request that the cause be certified to the Supreme Court for final determination as provided in the Constitution.

An answer in a suit to enforce a special tax bill which alleges that in making the assessment a tract of land not subdivided was arbitrarily divided into lots and separate tax bills issued against it, one of which was sought to be enforced, etc., alleges new matter which defendant has the burden of establishing by legal evidence to defeat a recovery.

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 485*)—PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS—SPECIAL TAX BILLS—VALIDITY.

Under the St. Louis city charter, making special tax bills prima facie evidence of a proper assessment, a special tax bill was properly adjudged valid as against the claim that in making the assessment a tract of land not subdivided was arbitrarily divided into two lots, and that two distinct tax bills were issued against it.

Norton, J., dissenting.

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; Eugene McQuillan, Judge.

Action by the Granite Bituminous Paving Company against the Parkview Realty & Improvement Company and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed and cause certified to the Supreme Court for final determination.

Bland & Cave and Carter, Collins & Jones, all of St. Louis, for appellants. Sturdevant & Sturdevant, of St. Louis, for respondent.

ROMBAUER, Special Judge. The record in this case is substantially the same as the record in cause No. 12,563, 151 S. W. 479, except touching certain matters hereinafter stated. The tax bill was issued against the Parkview Realty & Improvement Company; the assessment amounting to $1,015.16. The appellants, however, assign an additional error to those assigned in cause No. 12,563. Their answers state, among other things: "That said tract of land is used by this defendant as one lot, is fenced as one lot, tract, or parcel of ground, and has not been in any way subdivided either in fact or as shown by any recorded plats of additions or subdivisions to the city of St. Louis, and constitutes but one lot within the meaning of section 14 of article 6 of the charter of the city of St. Louis; that the assessment district for the improvement of Union avenue, for which the tax bill sued on was issued, extended at this point 1,535 feet west of Union avenue, and included the said tract of land for that distance west of Union avenue, and that, under the provisions of section 14 of article 6 of the charter of the city of St. Louis, all that portion of said tract of land lying and being within the said assessment district should have been assessed as one lot in the proportion that its area bore to the area of the entire district, and one tax bill only should have been issued against the whole of such portion of said tract for such assessment, but that, in fact, in making said assessment, the portion of said tract of ground within the assessment district was arbitrarily and in violation and in contravention of the provisions of said section 14 of article 6, divided into two lots, one including said tract for 1,140 feet west of Union avenue, and the other including the remainder of said tract within said district, and was assessed as two lots and two separate and distinct tax bills issued against it and two suits brought against this defendant on said two tax bills; that tax bill No. 3,655, the bill here sued on, is one of the said two improperly issued tax bills, and tax bill No. 3,648 on which a similar suit is now pending in division No. 8, being cause No. 46,627 in said division, is the other, and that for the reasons aforesaid said tax bill No. 3,655 here sued on is void."

[1] This new matter in the answer was denied by plaintiff's reply, and put the onus of establishing it by evidence upon the defendants, but the defendants offered no legal evidence to substantiate it. Special tax bill No. 3,648 referred to in defendant's answer was not offered in evidence by defendants, nor were the files in cause No. 46,627, referred to in defendant's answer, offered in evidence. The only testimony bearing on that subject is the testimony of Joseph Pasquier, an employé in the street department of the city of St. Louis, who testified on his cross-examination, and being recalled by the defendants, that two tax bills were issued against the property of the Parkview Realty & Improvement Company, one for a frontage of 1,140 feet, and the other for a frontage of 395 feet, that these two parcels were at that time divided by the proposed center line of Belt avenue (since opened), and were in different blocks of the city of St. Louis as established by the street department.

[2] Since the charter makes the special tax bill prima facie evidence of a proper assessment we cannot put the trial court into error for upholding its validity against defendants' contention that one tax bill only should have been issued covering the entire frontage of 1,535 feet. The record also fails to show any objection on the part of defendants to the introduction of the special tax bill in evidence, because the objection contained at the bottom of page 26 of appellants' abstract is confined to the irrelevancy of certain deeds as evidence. We have gone thus fully into this matter, since in the foregoing discussion of the subject, and the conclusion arrived at, all the members of the court agree. The same error appears by the record in making the judgment bear 8 per cent. interest until paid as in case 12,563.

It is therefore ordered that the motion for rehearing be sustained, and that so much of the judgment entry as contains the words, "with interest thereon at the rate of 8 per centum per annum from the date of this judgment until paid," be stricken from the record, and that the judgment as thus amended be affirmed, and that the cause be remanded to the trial court to proceed in conformity with this opinion. REYNOLDS, P. J., concurs. NORTON, J., concurs, in those parts of the opinion, which uphold the validity of the tax bill when issued, but holds the same is barred by limitation. CAULFIELD, J., not sitting.

In conformity with the order made in cause No. 12,563, the cause is certified to the Supreme Court for final determination.

NORTON, J. (dissenting). As the judgment of the court in this case involves the identical question and determines it in the same way as that involved in the case of Granite Bituminous Paving Company v. Parkview Realty & Improvement Company et al. (No. 12,663) 151 S. W. 479, between the same parties and decided today, I respectfully dissent from the conclusion on that question alone for the reasons given in the dissenting opinion filed in the case last mentioned. I deem the judgment of the court in this case to be in conflict with the judgment of the Kansas City Court of Appeals in the case of Forrey v. Holmes et al., 65 Mo. App. 114, and also with the judgment of the Supreme Court in the case of Morey Engineering & Construction Co. v. St. Louis Artificial Ice Rink Co. (Sup.) 146 S. W. 1142, and therefore request that the cause be certified to the Supreme Court for final determination as provided in the Constitution.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

MADDEN v. MISSOURI PAC. RY. CO.

(Kansas City Court of Appeals. Missouri, Nov. 25, 1912. Certified to Supreme Court, Nov. 25, 1912.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 197*)—FELLOW SERVANTS—WHO ARE.

A machinist's helper in railroad shops and a machinist acting as foreman are fellow servants while engaged together in moving a brakebeam from the blacksmith shop to the roundhouse, there to be unloaded and placed under a locomotive.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 489, 490; Dec. Dig. § 197.*]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 180*) — FELLOW SERVANTS—LIABILITY OF MASTER.

The common-law rule that the negligence of a servant causing injury to a fellow servant may not be imputed to the master, and the risk of such injury is assumed by the injured servant, has been abrogated by statute, so far as railroad companies are concerned.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 359-361, 363-368; Dec. Dig. § 180.*]

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 180*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—NEGLIGENCE OF FELLOW SERVANT—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Employees in railroad shops engaged in moving a brakebeam from the blacksmith shop to the roundhouse, to be there unloaded and placed under a locomotive, are within the fellow servant statute of Kansas (Gen. St. Kan. 1909, § 6999), making every railroad company liable for damages to any employee in consequence of the negligence of any other employee.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 359-361, 363-368; Dec. Dig. § 180.*]

4. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 279*)—INJURY TO SERVANT — NEGLIGENCE OF FELLOW SERVANT.

In an action for injuries to a servant while assisting a fellow servant in removing a brakebeam from the blacksmith shop in railroad shops to the roundhouse, evidence held to support a finding of negligence of the fellow servant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 973-975, 978-980; Dec. Dig. § 279.*]

5. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 216*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—ASSUMPTION OF RISK.

Under the rule in force in Missouri that a servant does not assume risks created by the master's negligence, or under the rule in Kansas that a servant who, with full knowledge of the danger of the risk, continues in the service assumes the risk, though caused by the master's negligence, an employee in railroad shops assisting a coemployee in moving a brakebeam from the blacksmith shop to the roundhouse does not assume the risk of the coemployee's negligence in doing his part of the work.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 567-573; Dec. Dig. § 216.*]

6. PLEADING (§ 433*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—PETITION—SUFFICIENCY.

A petition, in an action for injuries occurring in Kansas to an employee in railroad shops, which alleges that plaintiff was a machinist's helper and worked under a machinist, who was a foreman, and that the injury was caused by his negligence in lifting a brakebeam and suddenly dropping it while plaintiff was in a place of danger, does not state a common-law cause of action, but states a cause of action under the fellow servant act (Rev. St. 1909, § 5434), and under Gen. St. Kan. 1909, § 6999, making every railroad company liable for damages done to any employee by the negligence of any other employee, and supports a recovery as against the objection raised after verdict, based on the failure to plead the statute of Kansas.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 1451-1477; Dec. Dig. § 433.*]

7. PLEADING (§ 395*)—ISSUES, PROOF, AND VARIANCE.

A plaintiff cannot plead one cause of action and recover on another.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 1333-1335; Dec. Dig. § 395.*]

8. EVIDENCE (§ 80*) — STATUTES (§ 281*) — STATUTES OF SISTER STATES.

One relying on the law of a sister state for his cause of action must allege in his pleading what the statute is, and his failure to do so subjects his petition to attack by demurrer; but where the petition states a good cause of action under the statutory law of Missouri, and defendant, failing to demur, files answer and invites judgment on the facts as pleaded, the presumption will arise that the law of the sister state is similar to the law of Missouri; and the petition, thus aided, is good after verdict.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 101; Dec. Dig. § 80;* Statutes, Cent. Dig. §§ 380, 381; Dec. Dig. § 281.*]

9. EVIDENCE (§ 80*)—LAW OF SISTER STATE—COMMON LAW—PRESUMPTIONS.

The court cannot presume that the common law is in force in Kansas; but, in the absence of any showing to the contrary, it will presume that the statutory law of Kansas is like the statutory law of Missouri.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 101; Dec. Dig. § 80.*]

10. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 252*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—STATUTORY LIABILITY.

An action under Gen. St. Kan. 1909, § 6999, making every railroad company liable for damages to any employee caused by any negligence of other employees, provided notice of the injury has been given, unless an action is commenced within eight months, brought within eight months after the injury complained of, is maintainable without the statutory notice.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 806; Dec. Dig. § 252.*]

11. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 216*) — INSTRUCTIONS—NONDIRECTION.

The defect in an instruction on the measure of damages, arising from the omission to give the legal elements on which the jury must base a verdict, is but a nondirection and not a misdirection; and defendant, failing to request an instruction, on the subject may not complain.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 216.*]

12. DAMAGES (§ 216*)—PERSONAL INJURIES—INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction, in an action for personal injuries, on the measure of damages is not erroneous because it states the maximum damages the jury may assess, if finding a verdict for plaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. §§ 548-555; Dec. Dig. § 216.*]

13. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1003*)—VERDICT—CONCLUSIVENESS.

A verdict for a party whose evidence is substantial and presents issues of fact will not be set aside as against the weight of the evidence, though the court, on appeal, believes that it is against the weight of the evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3938-3943; Dec. Dig. § 1003.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jackson County; James H. Slover, Judge.

Action by Ralph Morgan Madden against the Missouri Pacific Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed, and cause certified to the Supreme Court.

Martin L. Clardy, of St. Louis, and Ed. J. White, of Kansas City, for appellant. Henry J. Latschaw, of Kansas City, for respondent.

JOHNSON, J. Action by a servant to recover damages for personal injuries he alleges were caused by the negligence of his master. A trial of the issues resulted in a verdict and judgment for plaintiff in the sum of $7,500, and the cause is before us on the appeal of defendant.

The evidence of plaintiff tends to show the following state of facts: Plaintiff was employed in the yards and machine shops of defendant in Kansas City, Kan., as a machinist's helper, and worked under the direction of the machinist. He worked at night, and was injured during the night of January 27, 1910. A heavy metal brakebeam had been taken to the blacksmith shop to be repaired, and after it had been repaired and was still hot it was loaded crosswise on a truck and wheeled by plaintiff from the blacksmith shop into the roundhouse, where it was to be unloaded and placed under a locomotive. The machinist walked beside the truck, and, when it stopped at the place of unloading, directed plaintiff to help unload. The two men stood on opposite sides of the truck, and the order of the machinist contemplated that each should lift an end of the beam, raise the load, and carry it to the place where it was to be deposited. Both men wore heavy gloves, and just before he started to lift his end the machinist took off one of his gloves to enable him to light his pipe. He did not replace his glove, but seized the beam with both hands and raised up his end, when, being burned on the bare hand by the heated metal, he suddenly dropped or threw down the beam end with such force that the truck was swung violently around, and plaintiff, who was stooping and just beginning to lift his end, was struck in the back by the truck and received the injuries of which he complains.

The evidence of defendant contradicts that of plaintiff on all points, and tends to show that plaintiff received no injuries, or, if he did, that they were not received in the manner claimed by him.

The petition alleges, in substance, that the machinist was the foreman of plaintiff, and that the injury was caused by his negligence in lifting the brakebeam and suddenly dropping it while plaintiff was in a place of danger. No reference is made to any statute of Kansas. The petition was not attacked by demurrer. The answer contains a general denial, an allegation that plaintiff and the machinist were fellow servants, and a plea that "a statute known and designated as section 22 of chapter 341 of the Laws of said state of Kansas, was enacted in the year 1905, which section provides that, in case of an injury being sustained by an employé of a railway company, notice in writing that such injury has been sustained, stating the time and place thereof, shall be given by or on behalf of the person injured to such railroad company within eight months after the occurrence of the injury; that the giving of such notice is a condition precedent to the maintenance of a suit for the alleged injury; and that no notice of the alleged injury claimed by plaintiff to have been sustained by him, such as is required by said statutes of Kansas, has ever been given to this defendant; and it pleads these facts in bar of plaintiff's action."

The section of the statutes (to part of which reference is thus made in the answer) was enacted by the Legislature of Kansas in 1905 (Laws 1905, c. 341), amended in 1907, and appears in the General Statutes of 1909 as section 6999. It is the fellow servant statute, and its material parts are as follows: "Every railroad company organized or doing business in the state of Kansas shall be liable for all damages done to any employé of said company in consequence of any negligence of its agents; or by any mismanagement of its engineers or other employés, to any person sustaining such damage: Provided, that notice in writing that an injury has been sustained, stating the time and place thereof, shall have been given by or on behalf of the person injured, to such railroad company within eight months after the occurrence of the injury: Provided, however, that where an action is commenced within said eight months, it shall not be necessary to give said notice."

The statute was introduced in evidence by both parties, by defendant as section 22, c. 341, Laws 1905, and by plaintiff as section 6909, Statutes 1909. Defendant further introduced decisions of the Supreme Court of Kansas, to some of which we shall refer in the opinion. At the close of all the evidence defendant offered an instruction in the nature of a demurrer to the evidence, which the court refused. Counsel for defendant contend that this instruction should have been given, and, first, we shall address our attention to the questions raised in support of this contention.

[1] Though the petition alleges that the machinist was the foreman of plaintiff, and therefore the vice principal of defendant, the pleaded facts relating to the injury which find support in the evidence of plaintiff disclose that the alleged cause of the injury was negligence of a fellow servant, and not of a vice principal. The co-operation of plaintiff and the machinist in unloading the brake-beam from the truck was an act of fellow service; and under the dual capacity doctrine recognized in our jurisprudence the relation of the collaborators in the performance of such service is to be determined by the nature of the service, and not by any difference in rank between the collaborators. McGowan v. Railway, 61 Mo. 528; Stephens v. Lumber Co., 110 Mo. App. 398, 86 S. W. 481; Bokamp v. Railway, 123 Mo. App. 270, 100 S. W. 689.

[2] The machinist will be regarded as the fellow servant of plaintiff, and our next subject is the question of whether or not the evidence of plaintiff discloses that his injury was caused by negligence of his fellow servant, or by a risk incidental to the employment, and therefore assumed by him as a part of his contract with defendant. Before the enactment of the fellow servant statutes, the rule in Kansas, as in this state, was the common-law rule that the principle of respondeat superior did not apply to fellow servants; and therefore that negligence of a servant that caused the injury to a fellow servant could not be imputed to the master, and that the risk of injury from such cause was one of the ordinary hazards of the employment assumed by the injured servant. But the fellow servant statute abrogates the old rule, so far as employes of railroad companies are concerned, and expressly provides that such companies shall be liable for all damages done to any employe of such company by the negligence of a fellow employe. Construing the statute, the Supreme Court of Kansas say, in Railway v. Green, 75 Kan. loc. cit. 512, 89 Pac. 1045: "Under this statute the elements of a cause of action against a railway company are: Negligence of one employe in some matter connected with the operation of the road and damages to another in consequence of such negligence. If, after the master's common-law duties are all performed, a skilled employe negligently chooses and uses an insufficient appliance, or makes a negligent use of an appliance sufficient if properly handled, and as a consequence another employe sustains damage, the master is responsible; and the statute makes no provision for notice to the master, in advance of the act, that the employe is about to do a careless thing."

[3] In that case, as here, the work being done was the repairing of a locomotive, and we regard the decision as authority supporting the view we entertain that service of that character falls within the purview of the fellow servant statute of Kansas, as well as of the like statute of this state. Prash v. Railroad, 151 Mo. App. 410, 132 S. W. 57; Turner v. Railroad, 132 Mo. App. 43, 111 S. W. 841; Huston v. Railroad, 129 Mo. App. 583, 107 S. W. 1045; Orendorff v. Railroad, 116 Mo. App. 348, 92 S. W. 148.

[4] That the conduct of the machinist was negligent, and that the injury was not the result of a mere accident that ordinary care and prudence would not have anticipated, is a conclusion well sustained by the facts and circumstances of the case. This is not a case where the laborer whose act caused the injury was guilty of a mere error of judgment, as, for example, where he overtakes his strength, thinking he can lift or carry a load that turns out to be too heavy for him (Pulley v. Standard Oil Co., 136 Mo. App. 172, 116 S. W. 430), but belongs to the class of cases where one of two or more collaborators, upon whose observance of reasonable care depends the safety of his fellows, negligently fails to exercise such care. Briscoe v. Railroad, 130 Mo. App. 513, 109 S. W. 93; White v. Railroad, 156 Mo. App. 563, 137 S. W. 645.

The jury were entitled to the conclusion that a reasonably careful and prudent person in the situation of the machinist would have realized the danger to plaintiff if he should raise and then suddenly drop his end of the beam while plaintiff was in the act of lifting his end, and that, with knowledge that the beam was hot, he would not have seized it with his bare hand, especially when he had gloves to use on such occasions.

[5] The injury appears to have been the direct result of the negligence of the machinist in failing reasonably to employ means at hand for the safe doing of the work. Since the cause of the injury was negligence for which defendant was liable under the fellow servant rule, it follows that the doctrine of assumption of risk can have no application. In this state the rule is well established that the servant does not and cannot assume risks created by the master's negligence. In Kansas the rule appears to be that if the servant, with full knowledge of the nature and danger of a risk, continues in the service such risk will be regarded as one assumed by the servant, though it be caused by the negligence of the master. Railroad v. Schroeder, 47 Kan. 315, 27 Pac. 965. Under neither rule may the risk in question be considered one assumed by plaintiff.

[6] But it is argued by defendant that plaintiff cannot recover in this action, for the reason that his petition falls to ground his cause on the fellow servant statute of Kansas, and alleges only common-law negligence.

The petition does not state a common-law cause of action. The common law afforded a servant no cause of action against his master for an injury caused by the negligence of a fellow servant, and in common-law states a servant can have a right of recovery against his master in such cases only in virtue of some statute. In this state, where the common law is in force, the only instances in which a servant may hold his master liable for the negligence of a fellow servant are those falling within the purview of section 5434, Rev. Stat. 1909, which applies only to agents and servants engaged in the work of operating a railroad.

Since the petition pleaded facts which characterized the negligent and injurious act as that of a fellow servant, it cannot be said to have pleaded a common-law cause of action. We are aware that this view is not in harmony with that expressed by the Springfield Court of Appeals in Ham v. Railroad, 149 Mo. App. 200, 130 S. W. 407. In that case the petition alleged that the injury occurred in Arkansas, and was caused by the negligence of the plaintiff's fellow servants, who, with him, were engaged in the work of operating a railroad. Our learned Brethren of that court assumed that, since the petition failed to plead the Arkansas fellow servant statute, it bottomed plaintiff's cause of action on a common-law foundation, and held that the proof at the trial of the existence of a fellow servant statute in Arkansas disproved the pleaded cause, "because the common law had been abolished by statute, and plaintiff could not recover on the statute because he had not pleaded it." "Having pleaded his action," say the court, "on a common-law foundation, he must stand or fall by his cause of action as stated, and cannot be allowed, when he finds that he cannot recover at common law, to then shift his position to the statutory liability"—citing Mathieson v. Railroad, 219 Mo. 542, 118 S. W. 9.

[7] Of course, our Brethren are right in saying that a plaintiff cannot plead one cause of action and recover on another; but, in our opinion, they fall into a very material error in holding that the petition stated a common-law cause when, as we have shown, the liability of a master for an injury to his servant inflicted by the negligence of a fellow servant is a rule entirely foreign to the common law and must rest on statute. In that case, as in this, the petition pleaded a statutory cause, and, had the cause accrued in this state, would have been invulnerable to attack, even by demurrer. But, since the cause arose in a sister state, the duty devolved on the plaintiff of alleging in his petition the statute of such state on which his right of recovery depended.

[8] The rule is well settled that when one relies on the law of a foreign country or of a sister state for his cause of action he is required to state in his pleading what that law is, and his failure to do so will subject the petition to attack by demurrer. But where, as here, such petition states a good cause of action under the statutory law of this state, and the defendant, failing to demur, files answer and thereby invites judgment on the facts as pleaded, the presumption arises that the law of such sister state is similar to our own; and the petition, thus aided by answer, will be deemed good, especially after verdict. Lee v. Railway, 195 Mo. loc. cit. 415, 92 S. W. 614; Flato v. Mulhall, 72 Mo. 522; Burdick v. Railroad, 123 Mo. 221, 27 S. W. 453, 26 L. R. A. 384, 45 Am. St. Rep. 528; Biggie v. Railroad, 159 Mo. App. 350, 140 S. W. 602; Coleman v. Luchsinger, 224 Mo. 1, 123 S. W. 441, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 934.

[9] Since the territory now occupied by the state of Kansas was acquired from France in 1803, and at no time was an English possession, we cannot presume, in the absence of proof to the contrary, that the common law is part of the jurisprudence of that state; but in the condition of the pleadings before us we should begin with the initial presumption that Kansas has a fellow servant statute similar to our own. Hurley v. Railway, 57 Mo. App. loc. cit. 682; Flato v. Mulhall, supra. As is said in Lee v. Railway, supra, "in the absence of any showing to the contrary, we will presume that the law of Kansas (a statutory law) is like the law of Missouri." In Flato v. Mulhall, the Supreme Court refused to indulge in any such presumption, holding that, in the absence of an exposition of the foreign law, "the law of the forum must govern." Whether we accept this view, or that expressed later in the Lee Case, the result is the same. A petition that states facts that would constitute a good cause of action under our law should not be held bad after answer to the merits.

[10] We do not find anything in the opinion in Mathieson v. Railroad, supra, greatly relied on by defendant, at variance with this view, which unquestionably finds strong support in Lee v. Railroad, supra. In the Mathieson Case the fellow servant statute of Kansas, considered by the court, contained a provision "that notice in writing of the injury so sustained stating time and place thereof, shall have been given by or on behalf of the person injured to such railroad company within ninety days after the occurrence of the accident." The petition did not allege that provision, nor a compliance therewith; and the court held that it did not state a cause of action and was fatally defective, for the reason that the giving of the notice was a condition precedent that must be satisfied before a right to maintain an action would accrue. If our own fellow servant statute contained such provision, a plaintiff would be required to plead and prove compliance with it, since such compliance would be an indispensable element of his cause of action. Reno v. St. Joseph, 169 Mo. 642, 70 S. W. 123; Strange v. St. Joseph, 112 Mo. App. 629, 87 S. W. 2.

The crucial question in that case was not the one we are considering, but was the question of the omission from the averments of the petition of one of the prime elements of the right of the plaintiff to maintain an action. The fellow servant statute of Kansas now before us is an amendment of that considered by the Supreme Court in the Mathieson Case. The amendment consists of a change in the time for giving the notice from 90 days to 8 months, and of the following additional provision, viz.: "That where an action is commenced within said eight months it shall not be necessary to give said notice."

This suit was commenced in less than eight months after the injury, and consequently the plaintiff was not required to give any notice. The decision in the Mathieson Case can have no application to the present case; and, so far as the issues before us are concerned, the Kansas fellow servant statute should be treated as though it contained no provision for notice. So regarded, it is similar in material features to our statute; and, since the petition states a good cause of action under either statute, it should not be held fatally defective after verdict because of the omission to plead the statute of Kansas on which the action is founded. The demurrer to the evidence was properly overruled.

[11] The only instruction given at the request of plaintiff was on the measure of damages. Defendant complains that the instructions of plaintiff, in omitting to give the jury the legal elements upon which to base a verdict, left them free to explore fields not embraced within the bounds of the pleadings. The writer's own view of instructions of such character coincides with that of defendant; but the decisions of the Supreme Court and Courts of Appeals approve the practice, and regard such omission as being only non-direction, and not as constituting a misdirection of the jury.

[12] The instruction further is criticised by defendant, because it states the maximum damages the jury may assess in their verdict, if it be for plaintiff. Recently the Supreme Court considered the question thus presented, and decided it against the contention of defendant. Stid v. Railway, 236 Mo. 382, 139 S. W. 172.

[13] Finally, defendant argues with much earnestness that the verdict is against the weight of the evidence. We believe it is, and, if we were authorized by law to weigh the evidence, would not hesitate to reverse the judgment. But we are compelled to admit the evidence of plaintiff is substantial, and presented issues of fact for the solution of the triers of fact. Finding the case in such situation, we could not set aside the verdict without assuming an authority the law does not bestow upon appellate tribunals.

The judgment is affirmed; but, as what we have said is in conflict with the decision of the Springfield Court of Appeals in Ham v. Railroad, supra, the cause is certified to the Supreme Court. All concur.

SHELTON v. METROPOLITAN ST. RY. CO.

(Kansas City Court of Appeals. Missouri.
Nov. 11, 1912. Rehearing Denied
Dec. 9, 1912.)

1. TRIAL (§ 140*)—QUESTIONS FOR JURY—CREDIBILITY OF WITNESSES.

Whether the testimony of witnesses as to the appearance, movements, and attitude of a person walking on an elevated railroad above them as they stood in the street at twilight, and while they could see him merely in silhouette, was entitled to credit, was a question for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 334, 335; Dec. Dig. § 140.*]

2. STREET RAILROADS (§ 98*)—INJURIES TO PERSONS ON TRACKS—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

A pedestrian who at night crossed the trestle of a street railway company on which cars ran at frequent intervals is guilty of contributory negligence, where he failed to keep any lookout for approaching cars.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Street Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 204-208; Dec. Dig. § 98.*]

3. STREET RAILROADS (§ 103*)—RAILROADS (§ 390*)—INJURIES TO PERSONS ON TRACKS—“HUMANITARIAN RULE.”

The humanitarian rule which may be invoked against railroads or street railroads for injuries to persons on their tracks applies where, regardless of the cause of the perilous condition of the traveler, the railroad's servant in charge of the engine or car, in the proper performance of duty, could have discovered the danger and averted it, but negligently or wantonly failed to perform that humane duty.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Street Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 219; Dec. Dig. § 103;* Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 1324, 1325; Dec. Dig. § 390.*]

4. STREET RAILROADS (§ 81*)—RAILROADS (§ 370*)—INJURIES TO PERSONS ON TRACK—HUMANITARIAN RULE.

An engineer or motorman is required to keep a sharp lookout for pedestrians only at places where he has reason to expect they may be on the track, but, where a trestle of a street railway company has been used by the public as a footpath so constantly and notoriously as to raise a presumption of knowledge on the part of the company, its servants are bound to exercise the same vigilance in looking for travelers in that place as in places where the public have a right to go on the tracks.

5. STREET RAILROADS (§ 117*)—INJURIES TO PERSONS ON TRACKS—DUE TO STOCK CARS.

While the motorman of a street car is not bound upon seeing a pedestrian upon the track to give him warning or stop the car until something in the appearance or attitude of the traveler shows that he is oblivious to the peril, and cannot save himself, yet, where it appeared that the traveler was oblivious, and the motorman could, in the exercise of ordinary care, have avoided the injury, the question of negligence is one for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Street Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 239-257; Dec. Dig. § 117.*]

6. DEATH (§ 35*)—ACTION UNDER FOREIGN LAWS.

No action for wrongful death occurring in a foreign state can be maintained in the domestic forum, unless the action is granted by the laws of the foreign state.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Death, Cent. Dig. § 50; Dec. Dig. § 35.*]

7. STATUTES (§ 281*)—PLEADING FOREIGN LAWS.

A foreign statute on which a cause of action is based must be pleaded and proven as a fact.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. §§ 580, 581; Dec. Dig. § 281.*]

8. EVIDENCE (§ 80*)—PRESUMPTIONS—COMMON LAW OF OTHER STATE—HUMANITARIAN DOCTRINE.

The humanitarian rule is a common-law, and not a statutory, rule, and, in the absence of proof to the contrary, it will be presumed that it is recognized in the jurisprudence of a common-law state, and so, in an action in the domestic court to enforce a cause originating in a common-law state, it is not necessary to plead and prove the existence of that rule in such state.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 101; Dec. Dig. § 80.*]

9. EVIDENCE (§ 80*)—PRESUMPTIONS—LAWS OF OTHER STATES—COMMON LAW.

The territory of which the state of Kansas is a part, never having been subject to Great Britain, but having been a French possession at the time of its purchase by the United States, no presumption can be indulged that the common law exists therein, hence, one whose cause of action which depends on the common law and arose in Kansas has the burden, upon seeking to recover in another state, of pleading and proving the existence of the common law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 101; Dec. Dig. § 80.*]

10. PLEADING (§ 433*)—DEFECTS CURED BY VERDICT.

Where the petition in an action depending on a rule of the common law, which arose in a state in which the common law had never been in force, failed to allege the existence of that rule in the state, and defendant answered over on the merits, it will after verdict be presumed that such rule did exist in the foreign state.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 1451-1477; Dec. Dig. § 433.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jackson County; Thos. J. Seehorn, Judge.

An action by Ruth Shelton against the Metropolitan Street Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

John H. Lucas and James E. Nugent, both of Kansas City, for appellant. Oldham & James, of Kansas City, for respondent.

JOHNSON, J. Plaintiff commenced this suit in the circuit court of Jackson county to recover damages for the death of her husband which she alleges was caused by negligence of defendant.

The cause of action, if one exists, arose in Kansas, and the petition pleads statutes of that state which, in certain instances, give to the widow of one whose death is caused by the negligence of another the right to maintain an action in damages. Sections 5319, 5320, Dassler's Gen. Stat. of Kansas 1905. Facts are alleged which bring plaintiff within the operation of those statutes, and a cause of action founded on what is known in this state as the "humanitarian doctrine" is pleaded. The petition does not plead the laws of Kansas relating to this species of negligence. Defendant did not attack the petition by demurrer or motion, but filed an answer tendering the general issue. A trial to a jury resulted in a verdict and judgment for plaintiff in the sum of $5,000, and, after unsuccessfully moving for a new trial and in arrest of judgment, defendant appealed. The death of plaintiff's husband occurred a few moments after 9 o'clock in the evening of June 8, 1909, in Kansas City, Kan., at a place where the double tracks of one of defendant's street railway lines cross Reynolds avenue. This is a public street running east and west which crosses Sixth street at right angles. The two streets are on different levels; Reynolds avenue being much lower than Sixth street. Going south and east the tracks of defendant's railway run on Sixth street to a point just north of Reynolds avenue where they deflect to the southeast, leave Sixth street (which continues on south), and cross Reynolds avenue on an open trestle bridge. The bridge on Sixth street over Reynolds avenue is a short distance west of this railroad bridge, which is east of the east line of Sixth street. The latter bridge is about 75 feet long, and is double tracked. South-bound cars run on the west track, and it was one of such cars that killed the husband of plaintiff.

[1] There is strong evidence introduced by plaintiff which tends to show that the railway tracks from Sixth street southeastwardly had become a highway for pedestrians, and that such user had been so general and continuous that defendant must be held to have had knowledge of it and to have acquiesced in it. The husband of plaintiff used this pathway. He approached the trestle bridge from the southeast along the west track and without stopping, and, apparently without looking ahead, proceeded to walk over the bridge. He had advanced some 10 or 12 feet on the bridge, walking on the cross-ties, when a south-bound electric street car struck him, and inflicted fatal injuries. The car carried an electric headlight, the way was unobstructed, and there was nothing to prevent the unfortunate man from seeing the car in ample time to escape injury, nor to prevent the motorman from seeing him in time to save him by stopping the car or giving warning signals. There is credible evidence to the effect that the deceased made no effort to avoid the car, and appeared to be oblivious of its approach until an instant before the collision, and that the motorman did not sound the bell nor attempt to stop until the moment of the collision. The speed of the car was six or eight miles an hour, and under the conditions obtaining the car could have been stopped in approximately 25 feet. The night was dark and a rainstorm was impending, but there was enough light cast by more or less distant street lamps to enable witnesses who lived on Reynolds avenue to observe the man go on the trestle and proceed in a manner indicative to them of inattention to his way. He wore a broad brim soft hat tilted forward and walked with downcast face. Counsel for defendant insist that the darkness was too great for these witnesses to discern these appearances, and that their testimony should be discarded as wholly incredible, but we think their credibility was an issue for the jury. They were on a much lower plane than the bridge, in looking up at the man saw him in silhouette, and it does not seem impossible for his general outlines, attitude, and movements to have been visible to them. The evidence does not show clearly whether the headlight carried on the car was of 16 or 32 candle power. It was one or the other, and we think it a fair inference from the evidence on this subject that a 32 candle power light was carried. The jury were entitled to find from all of the evidence that the headlight was strong enough and illuminated the track ahead a sufficient distance for the motorman to have seen the man on the track in ample time to have stopped the car in the intervening space. Had the man become aware of the approach of the car sooner than he did, he had two avenues of escape open to him, viz., to retrace his steps over the ties to solid ground, and then leave the track, or to cross over to the other track on the bridge. Each track was on a separate trestle, but the two were divided by a space that easily might have been crossed in a single step. These are the salient facts of the case, and the principal issues of law we are called upon to determine are those raised by the demurrer to the evidence which defendant argues should have been sustained.

[2] The first question we shall consider is that of the sufficiency of the facts we have stated to support the charge that the death of plaintiff's husband was caused by negligence of defendant in failing to discharge a humanitarian duty it owed him. That the deceased was guilty of negligence that brought him into a perilous situation is a proposition that cannot be, and is not, disputed. If before going onto the bridge he had but lifted his eyes, he would have seen the car approaching, and would have realized that he could not cross the bridge in safety on the west track. And, even after he was on the bridge, he still could have escaped had he exercised reasonable care, either by turning back or by crossing over to the east track. The car was not coming fast, and its headlight illuminated the track. He was a vigorous man in the possession of unimpaired faculties, and the only reasonable explanation that may be given of his conduct in allowing the car to run him down is that he was walking, as plaintiff's witnesses say, with his attention diverted from the oncoming car and apparently riveted on the way immediately in front on his feet. The darkness was of a degree to require the exercise of special attention in walking over separated cross-ties, and doubtless the deceased found it a difficult and absorbing task to walk the ties in safety. No exculpatory explanation can be given for his conduct in going on the bridge with the car visible and in menacing proximity. He knew a car might come at any moment, and it was his duty to ascertain before going on the bridge that none would dispute his safe passage over a place so dangerous. A railroad track is a place of danger and the use of a railroad trestle bridge by a pedestrian is especially dangerous. In view of the proof of a general and continuous use of the bridge by pedestrians both by day and by night, we shall not say that any attempt of a pedestrian to cross the bridge in the night would be negligent in law, but we do say that one so using the bridge should exercise care commensurate with the dangers of the undertaking, and that the deceased did not exercise any care, but negligently placed himself in a situation of extreme peril. Such negligence precludes a recovery by plaintiff unless the evidence will support a reasonable conclusion that the motorman, had he been observing ordinary care, would have discovered the peril of the deceased in time to have saved him.

[3] The humanitarian rule is designed to deal with instances where, regardless of the cause of the perilous position of the traveler, the engineer or motorman of the approaching engine or car in the proper performance of his duty would have observed the danger and averted it, either by stopping or giving warning signals, but negligently or wantonly failed to perform such humane duty.

[4] It does not follow from the mere fact that a traveler is on the track in a dangerous place that the engineer or motorman must see him at the first moment and hasten to stop the engine or car, or give warning signals. An engineer or motorman is required to keep a sharp lookout for pedestrians only at places where he has reason to apprehend they may be on the track, and is not held to the exercise of watchfulness at places where a pedestrian could not be present except as a trespasser. And the authorities generally and properly say that a railroad trestle bridge is no place for foot travelers, and that an engineer is not required to anticipate the presence of a traveler at such places, and to be on the lookout for him. But where, as in the present case, a bridge of this character has been used by the public as a footpath so constantly and notoriously as to raise the presumption that the company has knowledge of such use and by taking no steps to prevent it has silently acquiesced in it, the company is bound to anticipate that the use will be continued and to maintain the same vigilance in looking for travelers at such place as it would at places where people have a right to go upon the track, such as public crossings. The motorman in the case in hand was bound to anticipate the presence of travelers on the bridge and owed the deceased the duty of reasonable care to discover him there.

[5] The evidence shows that the motorman, with the aid of the headlight, could have seen the deceased some 75 feet away, and could have stopped the car in 25 feet. These facts of themselves would not be sufficient to support an inference of negligence on the part of the motorman. The mere fact that a traveler remains on the track after the approaching car is in threatening proximity would not indicate that he is unaware of the approach of the car, and will not leave the track in time to avoid injury. The humanitarian rule does not call for action on the part of the motorman until something in the appearance or attitude of the traveler proclaims to the watchful eye and careful mind that he is oblivious to his peril, and will not or cannot save himself. Veatch v. Railroad, 145 Mo. App. 232, 129 S. W. 404; Bennett v. Railway, 122 Mo. App. 703, 99 S. W. 480. Travelers often stay on the track until the last minute, and it would be unjust to require the operator of a car to stop or give warning every time he saw an able-bodied man on the track ahead. But we find facts and circumstances disclosed by the evidence that do support a reasonable inference that the peril of the deceased and his obliviousness and helplessness were obvious at a time when the car could and should have been stopped. The trestle presented obstacles to a hasty escape which were enhanced by the darkness. Whether he retreated by the way he came or crossed over to the other track, the deceased had to be careful of his movements, and could not proceed with celerity. In this respect the case is similar to that of Williamson v. Railroad, 139 Mo. App. 481, 122 S. W. 1113. And, further, the forward bend of the head of the deceased, the position of his hat, the close attention he was giving his steps, and his unaltered progress were suggestive of his complete absorption by other objects of attention than the menacing danger. In these particulars the case is analogous to that of Smith v. Railroad, 129 Mo. App. 413, 107 S. W. 22, where we held the engineer was bound to take notice of such suggestive indications of obliviousness on the part of the endangered traveler. We conclude the evidence of plaintiff was sufficient to take the case to the jury on the issue of negligence under the humanitarian rule.

It is argued by counsel for defendant that the petition is fatally defective, and will not support the judgment, for the reason that it fails to allege facts showing that plaintiff had a cause of action under the laws of Kansas for the death of her husband. This insufficiency of the petition was allowed to go unchallenged by defendant until the motion in arrest, and the question we must decide is whether or not the defect is one that cannot be cured by verdict.

[6] Defendant is right in the contention that plaintiff could have no cause of action in this state if she had none under the laws of Kansas. As is said by Lamm, J., in Newlin v. Railroad, 222 Mo. loc. cit. 391, 121 S. W. 130: "No case under the lex loci, then no case under the lex fori." We applied this rule in Chandler v. Railway, 127 Mo. App. 34, 106 S. W. 553, and Rahn v. Railroad, 129 Mo. App. 686, 108 S. W. 570.

[7] Further we concede it was the duty of plaintiff to plead all of the facts constitutive of her cause of action which includes the fact that she had a cause of action under the laws of the state where the injury occurred. "When one relies on the law of a foreign country or of a sister state for his right of action, he is required to state in his pleading what the law of the foreign jurisdiction is. Such a law is to be pleaded and proven as a fact." Lee v. Railway, 195 Mo. loc. cit. 415, 92 S. W. 616.

[8] The humanitarian rule is a common-law, not a statutory, rule, and, in the absence of proof to the contrary, the presumption would be indulged that it is recognized in the jurisprudence of a common-law state, and, in an action prosecuted in our courts to enforce a cause which originated in a common-law state, it would not be necessary to plead and prove that the humanitarian rule obtains in such state, since we would assume, until it otherwise appeared, that the general jurisprudence of a sister state having the common law is the same as our own.

[9] The territory of which the state of Kansas is a part never was subject to Great Britain, but was a French possession at the time of its purchase by the United States. It was a stranger to the common law, and no presumption can be indulged that its fundamental jurisprudence is the same as our own. Consequently the burden devolved on the plaintiff whose cause depends on a common-law rule to plead and prove that such rule belonged to the jurisprudence of the state of Kansas and the omission of such averment from the petition made it vulnerable to attack by demurrer. Mathieson v. Railroad, 219 Mo. 542, 118 S. W. 9.

[10] But in a number of cases the Supreme Court hold that the defect, if allowed to pass unchallenged before trial, will be deemed cured by an answer to the merits. By so answering the defendant, in effect, conceded that the petition stated a good cause under the laws of Kansas, and will not be allowed to take a contrary position in the motion in arrest. As is well said in Lee v. Railway, supra: "The defendant by its answer accepted the issue of fact tendered in the petition in the form as tendered; that is, without express reference to the laws of Kansas, the petition stated that the accident was caused by the negligence of defendant, and the answer expressly denied that fact. By so joining issue the defendant united with the plaintiff in inviting judgment on the facts as pleaded." Though we cannot presume that the common law was adopted in Kansas, we will presume, in the state of the pleadings before us, that the laws of that state are similar to our own laws, and and that the humanitarian rule is recognized and applied there as it is here. Lee v. Railway, supra, 195 Mo. loc. cit. 415, 92 S. W. 614; Burdick v. Railway, 123 Mo. 221, 27 S. W. 453, 26 L. R. A. 384, 45 Am. St. Rep. 528; State v. Clay, 100 Mo. 571, 13 S. W. 827; Coleman v. Lucksinger, 224 Mo. 1, 123 S. W. 441, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 934; Biggle v. Railroad, 159 Mo. App. 350, 140 S. W. 602.

The demurrer to the evidence was properly overruled. In what we have said we have answered the other points made by counsel for appellant in their brief.

The action was fairly tried, and the judgment is affirmed. All concur.

HINSHAW v. WARREN'S ESTATE.

(Springfield Court of Appeals. Missouri.
Dec. 2, 1912.)

1. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 28*)—CONTRIBUTION—LIMITATIONS.

A surety on a note who pays a judgment thereon can recover from his cosurety one-half of the amount paid, provided he sues therefor within the five years fixed by the statute of limitation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. §§ 134, 135; Dec. Dig. § 28.*]

2. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 83*)—SUSPENDING OF RUNNING OF LIMITATIONS—DEATH OF DEBTOR.

Where a surety on a note paid a judgment thereon, the subsequent death of his cosurety suspended the running of limitations as to the time within which the suit for contribution must be brought, until letters of administration were issued.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. §§ 426, 431-438; Dec. Dig. § 83.*]

3. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 228*)—ESTABLISHMENT OF CLAIMS—FILING OF CLAIMS.

A claimant against a decedent's estate who makes out the claim, and takes it to the home of the clerk of the probate court to have it sworn to, without requesting the clerk to file it, does not thereby file the claim within the statute.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 642-647; Dec. Dig. § 228.*]

4. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 118*)—COMMENCEMENT OF ACTIONS—ACTS CONSTITUTING.

Whether an action has been commenced within the statute of limitations is determined by whether plaintiff complied with Rev. St. 1909, § 1756, providing that the filing of a petition in a court of record or a statement of account before a court not of record, and suing out of process therein, shall be deemed the commencement of a suit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. §§ 527, 528; Dec. Dig. § 118.*]

5. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 225*)—PRESENTATION OF CLAIMS—STATUTORY LIMITATIONS.

Rev. St. 1909, §§ 190-194, providing that demands against decedents' estates not exhibited within two years after the granting of letters are barred, and prescribing the manner of exhibiting demands, are, when considered together, a special statute of limitations, without affecting the general statute of limitations, and a surety on a note who pays the judgment thereon must file his demand for contribution against the estate of the deceased cosurety within five years from the date of payment of such judgment, after deducting the time between the cosurety's death and the granting of letters on his estate.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 640; Dec. Dig. § 225.*]

6. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 4*)—TIME TO SUE—LEGISLATIVE AUTHORITY.

The Legislature may fix arbitrarily the time in which different actions may be commenced, and may fix the period of five years as the time in which a surety paying the debt may sue a cosurety for contribution.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. §§ 10, 11; Dec. Dig. § 4.*]

7. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 232*)—EXHIBITING OF CLAIMS—ESTOPPEL.

An administrator who long before the running of limitations agreed to waive service of notice of claim against decedent's estate was not thereby estopped from pleading limitations where claimant delayed the presentation of his claim until limitations had run.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 830; Dec. Dig. § 232.*]

8. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 245*)—ALLOWANCE OF CLAIMS—LIMITATIONS—PLEADINGS.

To invoke the bar of limitations to a claim against a decedent's estate, it is only necessary to call the trial judge's attention to the fact, and it is not necessary to file a written plead-

Error to Circuit Court, Pulaski County;
L. B. Woodside, Judge.

Action by A. J. Hinshaw against the estate of Robert Warren. There was a judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

See, also, 162 Mo. App. 280, 144 S. W. 509.

Geo. M. Reed, of Waynesville, for plaintiff in error. Holmes & Holmes, of Rolla, for defendant in error.

GRAY, J. On the 5th day of October, 1904, a judgment was rendered in the circuit court of Maries county in favor of the Pulaski County Bank against W. W. P. Hinshaw, Robert Warren, and A. J. Hinshaw. On the 30th day of December of that year A. J. Hinshaw paid the judgment and costs in full. Robert Warren died on the 22d day of August, 1909, and letters of administration on his estate were issued on the 27th day of that month. On the 30th day of December A. J. Hinshaw prepared a demand against the estate of Robert Warren for one-half of the amount he had paid on said judgment. This demand was taken to the home of the clerk of the probate court, and there sworn to by Mr. Hinshaw before said clerk, who redelivered it to the representative of Mr. Hinshaw, who, in turn, sent it to Edwin Long, the administrator of the Warren estate, who, by writing entered on the back of the demand, waived notice of presentation of the same. On the 6th day of January, 1910, the demand was filed in the office of the clerk of the probate court. On the 9th day of May, 1910, the probate court refused to allow the demand, and assigned as reason therefor that it was barred by the statute of limitations. From this judgment the plaintiff appealed to the circuit court, and was defeated on trial before the court on the 25th day of March, 1911, and appealed to this court, but his appeal was dismissed, and he afterwards sued out a writ of error in this court.

Was the probate court justified in refusing the demand on the ground that it was barred by the statute of limitations? This is the only question in the case.

[1,2] There was testimony tending to prove that the note on which the judgment of the Maries county circuit court was based was signed by A. J. Hinshaw and Robert Warren as sureties for W. W. P. Hinshaw, and therefore, when the plaintiff in error paid that judgment on the 30th day of December, 1904, he was entitled to recover from Robert Warren one-half of the amount paid, provided he instituted his suit within the five-year statute of limitation. The death of Robert Warren on the 22d day of August, 1909, stopped the running of the statute until letters of administration were issued on the 27th of the same month. If the delivery of the claim to the probate clerk at his home on the 30th day of December, 1909, was a filing of it with him as clerk of the court, or, if the acknowledgment of service on the claim by the administrator, on the 4th day of January, 1910, stopped the running of the five years statute of limitations, then the judgment must be reversed.

[3] The evidence shows that the claim was made out, but not sworn to, and on the evening of the 30th, after the clerk had gone to his home from his office, it was delivered to him, and that he swore the plaintiff to it and fixed his jurat to the oath, and delivered the claim to plaintiff's representative to be sent to the administrator for acknowledgment of service. There was no testimony that the clerk was asked to file the claim, and it was not until the 6th day of January, 1910, that it was taken to the probate office, and there marked "Filed" by the clerk. If the plaintiff had delivered his claim to the clerk in the office of the probate court and requested him to file it, and then obtained possession of it from the clerk for the purpose of sending it to the administrator, we would not hesitate to hold that it was really filed in the office of the clerk on the 30th day of December. But to take a paper to the home of the clerk for the purpose of having it sworn to, and with no request for the clerk to file it, was not, in our judgment, the filing of the paper within the meaning of the law. Did the delivery of the demand to the administrator on the 4th of January stop the running of the general statute of limitations?

[4] Section 1756, Revised Statutes, reads: "The filing of a petition in a court of record, or a statement or account before a court not of record, and suing out of process therein, shall be taken and deemed the commencement of a suit." Our courts have in several cases measured the limitation statutes by this section, and whether a suit was commenced within the statute of limitations has been determined by whether the plaintiff instituted his suit within the meaning of this section.

[5] The plaintiff in error claims the running of the general statute is arrested by serving the claim upon the executor or administrator, under section 194, Revised Statutes 1909, which reads: "Any person may exhibit his demands against such estate by serving upon the executor or administrator a notice, in writing, stating the amount and nature of his claim, with a copy of the instrument of writing or account upon which the claim is founded; and such claim shall be considered legally exhibited from the time of serving such notice, or a waiver of such notice, in writing, by the executor or administrator." In order to properly construe this section, preceding ones must be considered. Section 190 deals with the classification of demands, and requires that general demands be legally exhibited against the estate within one year after the granting of letters in order to become fifth class demands; and that all demands exhibited after the end of one year, but within two years, shall be assigned to the sixth class. Section 191 provides that all demands not thus exhibited in two years shall be forever barred. Now, section 194 deals only with exhibiting of demands, and provides that a claim shall be considered legally exhibited from the time of serving the notice upon the executor or administrator. The Legislature in these sections was not dealing with the general statute of limitations at all, but only the special statute requiring claims to be exhibited and presented within a certain time. This is made apparent by sections 192 and 193, Revised Statutes 1909. The first provides that actions pending against any person at the time of his death, which by law survive against the representative, shall be considered demands legally exhibited from the time of the revival of the action; and section 193 provides that all actions commenced against executors and administrators after the death of the deceased shall be considered demands legally exhibited against such estate from the time of serving the original process on the executor or administrator. Now these two sections clearly provide that, notwithstanding suits were commenced in courts of record which would stop the running of the general statute of limitation, the demands included in those suits must be exhibited to the administrator in order that they may be put in the proper class, and not barred by the administration two years statute of limitations. The exhibiting of a demand to the administrator within the first year so as to get it in the fifth class, or during the second year to keep it from being absolutely barred, and presenting the claim to the court for allowance, are different things. As said in Waltmar v. Schnick's Estate, 102 Mo. App. loc. cit. 139, 76 S. W. 1053: "A preceding section provides that 'all demands not exhibited in two years from the grant of letters shall be forever barred.' Another section provides that 'all demands exhibited after the end of one year and within two years after letters are granted shall be placed in the sixth class.' It seems to us that the object gained by an exhibition of a demand under the statute is to stop the running of the statute of limitations. But it is not the commencement of a suit on the demand; it is only the exhibition of the foundation of a suit to be thereafter commenced." The statute of limitations referred to in the above quotation is the special statute found in the administration law. We concur in this view, that the object gained by exhibiting the demand is to stop the running of the special statute, and is not the commencement of the suit on the demand, but is only the foundation for a suit to be afterwards commenced.

In McFaul v. Haley, 166 Mo. 56, 65 S. W. 995, it is said: "The presentation of the judgment to the probate court in this case was in effect the institution of a suit on the judgment against the executor, as much so as would have been the presentation of a claim in the form of a note against the estate. Therefore the 20-year statute of presumption ceased to run when the claim was presented to the probate court." Our view that section 194 has reference only to the time when claims and demands shall be considered exhibited within the meaning of section 191 is supported by the decision of the Supreme Court in McKee v. Allen, 204 Mo. 655, 103 S. W. 76. On page 675 of 204 Mo., page 82 of 103 S. W., and in construing section 193, the court said: "This section, however, simply has reference to the time when claims and demands shall be considered exhibited within the meaning of section 185, Revised Statutes 1899."

[6] The Legislature has the right to fix arbitrarily the time in which different actions may be commenced, and has fixed, in actions for contribution of judgments, the period of five years, and has provided that suit must be commenced within that time or the action is barred. The statute we have quoted provides that the filing of the petition in the court of record shall be deemed the commencement of the suit. According to our view, the section of the statute found in our administration law providing that demands shall be exhibited within two years, and what shall be deemed a proper exhibit of the demand, in no wise affects our general statute of limitations, and therefore we hold that it was necessary for the plaintiff to file his demand in the office of the clerk of the probate court within five years from the day the plaintiff paid the judgment, after deducting the period of time between the death of the deceased and the granting of letters on his estate.

[7] It is further claimed by the plaintiff in error that the administrator should be estopped from pleading the statute of limitations. We find nothing in the record on which to base an estoppel. It is true several weeks before the claim was presented to him he was notified that plaintiff had a claim, and the administrator agreed to waive service when same was presented. This was long before the statute of limitations had run, and did not estop the administrator from pleading the statute when plaintiff delayed in presenting his claim until the statute had run.

[8] The plaintiff also insists that the statute of limitations must be pleaded in order to be available, and that it was not done in this case. The probate court refused the demand on the ground that it was barred by the statute of limitations, and the evidence shows that this was an issue on the trial in the circuit court, and plaintiff asked instructions relating thereto. It was not necessary to file a written pleading setting up the statute of limitations either in the probate or circuit court. The probate court hears and determines demands in a summary way without formal pleadings, and on appeal to the circuit court the cause is tried anew, without formal pleadings. To invoke the bar of limitation, it was only necessary to bring that defense to the attention of the trial judge. Wencker v. Thompson's Administrator, 96 Mo. App. 59, 69 S. W. 743.

The judgment will be affirmed. All concur.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Wright County; C. H. Skinker, Judge.

Action by H. G. Williamson against G. W. Harris. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

F. M. Mansfield, of Hartville, and Woodruff & Luster, of Springfield, for appellant. E. H. Farnsworth, of Mountain Grove, and Lamar, Lamar & Lamar, of Houston, for respondent.

COX, J. Plaintiff sold defendant a farm in Wright county, and the parties entered into a written contract by which defendant agreed to and did deposit $1,000 in a bank to await the preparation of title papers and the execution of the deed by plaintiff. It was also agreed that on the completion of the terms of sale the $1,000 was to be paid to plaintiff as a part payment on the land; but, if plaintiff should comply with the requirements of the contract upon his part and defendant should refuse to comply, the $1,000 was to be paid to plaintiff as liquidated damages. As appears from the record before us, no question was made that plaintiff had not complied with the terms of the contract; but defendant refused to take the land, and alleged as reason therefor that fraud had been practiced upon him in the sale. The plaintiff brought suit for the $1,000, and defendant sought to justify his refusal to take the land by alleging that he was induced to enter into the contract by fraud of the following character:

That defendant was a stranger in that section of the country and wholly unfamiliar with the character or productiveness of the soil, and that he told plaintiff and his agent with whom he dealt that he wanted a good rich soil that would produce a good crop without the use of commercial fertilizer and that he would not purchase a farm which required the use of such fertilizer at any price, and also told plaintiff that he was not familiar with the character of the soil in that locality but would have to rely upon his honesty to tell him the truth in regard to the character, quality, and fertility of the soil, and that plaintiff and his agent falsely and fraudulently represented that this farm was of a good rich soil and would produce good crops without the use of commercial fertilizer, when in fact the soil was thin and unproductive, and plaintiff knew that fact and had used commercial fertilizer on this land each year for a number of years. The evidence of defendant tended strongly to support the allegations of his answer, but at the close of his testimony the court peremptorily instructed the jury to find for plaintiff, and defendant has appealed.

The trial court held that the burden of proof was upon defendant, and the only question for our determination is whether his proof was sufficient to take his case to the jury on the question of fraud. The rules of law applicable to fraudulent representations generally are well settled and as applied to the facts of this case present only two questions: First. Were the representations of such character as to come within the legal definition of fraud? Second. Did the defendant rely upon these representations in making the purchase?

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

[1] If the representations were mere expressions of opinion as distinguished from representations as to existing facts, they could not be made the basis of an action for fraud. Brown v. Lead & Mining Co., 194 Mo. 681, 92 S. W. 699.

[2] To be actionable, the representations must relate to a material fact inducing the purchase, and not a mere expression of opinion. Do the alleged representations in this case meet that test?

[3] Generally, representations as to whether or not the soil of certain land is productive or will produce a certain amount of grain to the acre, etc., are regarded as mere expressions of opinion, and therefore not actionable; but in this case we have a different situation. This defendant was not acquainted with the character of the soil in that locality, and hence could not form an opinion of his own as to its fertility. Knowing that fact, he fixed a test by which to judge it, which was that it should produce a good crop without the use of commercial fertilizer, and notified plaintiff that he would not buy a farm that required the use of such fertilizer, and also notified him that he (defendant) was not competent to judge the productiveness of that soil and would have to rely upon plaintiff to tell him the truth about it. According to defendant's testimony, plaintiff abused his confidence and intentionally falsely represented to defendant that the soil was rich and fertilizer not required, when in fact the soil was thin and plaintiff had used fertilizer upon it for a number of years and plaintiff knew that a good crop could not be produced without the use of such fertilizer. When defendant fixed a test by which to judge the soil and notified plaintiff that he could not determine the question of fertility but would have to rely upon plaintiff's honor to tell him the truth about it, it would seem that common honesty would have required plaintiff to give defendant such information as he had, and the concealment of the fact that he had used a commercial fertilizer on the land for years, and the assertion that the use of such fertilizer was unnecessary, and the fact that defendant had notified him that he would not purchase land requiring the use of such fertilizer, in our judgment takes the representations out of the realm of mere expression of opinion and brings them under the rule of misrepresentation as to a material fact and is actionable. Judd v. Walker, 215 Mo. 312, 114 S. W. 979.

[4] Did defendant rely upon these representations? He testified that he did. He also testified that he sent his son to examine the land to ascertain whether or not there was hardpan under the soil. The son made the examination and reported that he found none. Respondent contends that this evidence shows that defendant did not rely upon the representations of plaintiff, if made. If the representations as to character and fertility of the soil were true, yet, if there was hardpan under it, this fact might, in certain seasons, prevent a good crop, while in other seasons it would not. In the absence of any testimony as to the effect upon the soil of hardpan under it, we cannot say that the presence or absence of hardpan had any necessary connection with the fertility of the soil, and the fact that defendant made an investigation as to the presence or absence of hardpan upon his own account does not necessarily conflict with his testimony that he relied upon the representations of plaintiff as to the fertility of the soil.

We are of the opinion that the question whether the representations were mere expressions of opinion and should have been so regarded by defendant, or were misrepresentations of facts, and also the question as to whether defendant in fact relied upon the representations, were, under the evidence in this case, questions for the jury, and the court erred in giving a peremptory instruction to find for plaintiff.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded. All concur.

WARREN v. COWDEN.

(Springfield Court of Appeals. Missouri.
Dec. 2, 1912.)

1. ANIMALS (§ 51*)—RUNNING AT LARGE—RESTRAINING—NOTICE TO OWNER.

The owner of a cow running at large having been personally informed that it was restrained, and the parties, though discussing it, not having agreed on the damages, Rev. St. 1909, § 773, dispensing with the written notice, provided by section 772, of the restraining, as a condition to recovery of damages, where it appears the owner had actual notice and the parties could not agree on the damages, applies.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Animals, Cent. Dig. §§ 158-171; Dec. Dig. § 51.*]

2. ANIMALS (§ 51*)—RUNNING AT LARGE—RESTRAINING—NOTICE TO OWNER.

Where Rev. St. 1909, § 773, dispensing, under certain circumstances, with necessity of giving written notice, under section 772, of the restraining of a cow running at large, applies, it is immaterial, as regards the rights of the one restraining to recover damages, that he gave an insufficient written notice.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Animals, Cent. Dig. §§ 158-171; Dec. Dig. § 51.*]

3. NEW TRIAL (§ 40*)—GRANTING ON COURT'S MOTION.

Though defendant did not except to instructions, the court may of its own motion notice error therein and grant him a new trial on account thereof.

4. ANIMALS (§ 51*)—RUNNING AT LARGE—DISTRAINT—LIEN—DEPOSIT OF AMOUNT ADMITTED DUE.

Authorizing recovery by plaintiff in replevin for his cow, restrained, when running at large, by defendant, without plaintiff having deposited the amount which, by his tender, he admitted to be due defendant on account thereof, or without an instruction to render verdict for that amount, if the jury found for plaintiff as to the other issues, was error.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Polk County; C. H. Skinker, Judge.

Replevin by L. P. Warren against W. T. Cowden. From an order granting defendant a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Rechow & Pufahl, of Bolivar, for appellant. B. J. Emerson and L. Cunningham, both of Bolivar, for respondent.

NIXON, P. J. This is an action in replevin originating in a justice's court. On appeal, plaintiff obtained judgment, and the court, on motion, granted the defendant a new trial. From this order plaintiff appealed.

On August 6, 1911, plaintiff's cow entered the premises of the defendant and damaged defendant's corn. The defendant restrained her and claimed damages and compensation from the plaintiff under article 5 of chapter 6 of the Revised Statutes of 1909, concerning "animals restrained from running at large." The parties agreed that this law was in force in Polk county, the scene of the action. Section 772 of this article provides that domestic animals running at large may be restrained, and lays down a rule as to giving the owner of the animal written notice within three days of the taking up and requiring the notice to state the amount of compensation for feeding and keeping such animal or animals and damages claimed. Section 773 is as follows: "When notice not necessary.—If it shall appear and be proven on trial that the owner or owners of such domestic animals, as set forth in section 772, shall have actual notice that his or their said animals or stock were restrained, and by whom, and that the parties interested could not agree on the amount of damages claimed, then the three days' notice as required by section 772 shall not be necessary to a recovery."

The evidence in this record shows that defendant restrained plaintiff's animal on the evening of August 6, 1911 (Sunday), and personally notified plaintiff, who resided near by. We quote from defendant's testimony: "The weather was hot and dry, and I told him (plaintiff) I would like for him to come and get the cow. He wanted to know what the damage was, and I told him that I would charge him a dollar or what the law allowed to putting her up and for the damages. I thought the law allowed 50 cents for putting one up, but I found out later that it was only 25. He said, 'All right.' He made no objection whatever. He said he did not have the money but he would do whatever was right about it. I said, 'I have been turning your stock over to you, and you have been promising to pay me, but you have never paid me a cent.' In fact, I had been turning his stock over to him time and again, and I told him that. He said he did not have the money, but would borrow it. I told him that while he was doing that—it was only a short time before this when I had turned over to him his stock and he promised to pay me and he never paid me a cent or said a word about it—couldn't he borrow that other, too, and bring it, and then he flew mad and said he wouldn't do it. He said he was fixing to go to Buffalo and would be gone about four days, that he wanted me to milk the cow and take care of her, and that when he came back he would come and settle. I said, 'By that time I don't know what might happen.' After he got mad he would not give me any satisfaction, and I came on home and allowed he would come and get the cow. If he had come and done the right thing, I would have turned the cow over to him; if he had come with the money."

The plaintiff's version is as follows: "On Sunday, August 6th, Mr. Cowden, the defendant, came and told me that he had taken up my cow. * * * I said, 'I do not want my cow on my neighbors,' and asked him if she had damaged him, and he said she had. I said, 'What is the damage?' He said, 'Well, I reckon about a dollar will pay the damages.' I said: 'Well, that is not too much, but I haven't got the money. I will go out and get it and come back and get my cow.' He said, 'When you go to get that, fetch me another $1.50 for the damages for the time your cow was on my oats.' I said, 'I will pay you the other money like I agreed to pay it when I get so that I can, and when you get some men to assess the damages, and whatever the men say I will pay whether it is $1.50 or $5.' He said, 'I will hold your cow for that.' I said, 'You cannot do it.' He said, 'I will show you whether I can or not.' Then I said, 'Take good care of the cow, as she is giving lots of milk.' He said, 'I will do just as I please about it.' And then I went off and never talked to Mr. Cowden any more that time."

[1] It is apparent to any one that no agreement was reached between these parties, and hence section 773 is the governing statute in this case. This being true, no written notice was necessary as required by section 772.

Defendant fed, watered, and milked the cow on Monday. On the morning of this day defendant was in Goodson, a town near by, and a man named Tom Gladdon saw him and told defendant he had a dollar for him to settle the matter, but defendant refused to accept it at that time and said plaintiff could get the cow at any time that day by paying $2. On Tuesday morning about 7 o'clock defendant sent his son to plaintiff with the proposition that he would accept $1.50. This was before he fed and milked the cow. Defendant testified that plaintiff told the boy that he (plaintiff) would sue his father for damages. About 11 o'clock the same morning, defendant was again in town, and two men acting for plaintiff offered defendant $1.50, one of them stating that he had a dollar in his pocket, and the other stating that he had 50 cents. Defendant refused, saying that he had kept the cow two or three days, and that he would take $2 as his damages. At this stage of the controversy, defendant, after consulting a lawyer and a justice of the peace, decided that he should give plaintiff a written notice, and on this day (Tuesday) he delivered the following notice to plaintiff's wife: "Goodson, Missouri, August 8, 1911. Mr. L. P. Warren: I herewith notify you that I have got your cow up and you can come and pay damages and you can take her. Yours, W. T. Cowden."

[2] In giving this notice, defendant was evidently attempting to comply with section 772; but, if that section governed this case, he would be out of court because he did not specify in the notice "the amount of compensation for feeding and keeping such animal and damages claimed." Of course, it need hardly be said that the fact that he attempted to give a written notice as required by section 772 would not change his rights under the law. Bowles v. Abrahams, 65 Mo. App. 10. The defendant then applied to a justice of the peace for the appointment of appraisers, following section 774, and they met on August 12th, viewed the damage, and made a written report in duplicate assessing the sum of 25 cents for taking up the animal, 50 cents for damages, and 25 cents for each day the cow was in defendant's care—a total assessment of $2.25.

In the meantime, on August 8th, plaintiff instituted an action in replevin before a justice for the recovery of the cow. The verdict in the justice's court was for the defendant and was signed by four of the jurors. In the circuit court, by agreement, the case was tried by a jury of six men, and five of them signed the verdict for the plaintiff. Eleven instructions were given to the jury and five requested instructions were refused. The jury were instructed that it was admitted that plaintiff was the owner of the cow and that the issues should be found for the plaintiff unless they found and believed from the evidence "that said cow on the 6th day of August, 1911, was running at large outside the inclosure of the plaintiff and was trespassing upon the premises of the defendant, and that the defendant took up said cow, and that he (the defendant) thereupon gave notice in writing to plaintiff that he had taken up said cow, and in said notice stated the amount of damages claimed by him and the amount of compensation for feeding and keeping said cow; or else that the plaintiff had actual notice that said cow was restrained and by whom restrained, and that he (the plaintiff) and the defendant could not agree upon the amount of damages demanded." As we have stated, the jury found the issues for the plaintiff. In its order granting defendant a new trial the court specified two grounds, viz.: (1) Because the court erred in giving instructions 1, 2, 3, and 4 in favor of the plaintiff. (2) Because the verdict of the jury is against the law and the weight of the evidence.

On the state of the evidence as to what occurred between the plaintiff and the defendant on Tuesday, August 8, 1911, the court gave the following instruction: "If the defendant sent the plaintiff word by his son that he would take one dollar and a half for his damages, and the plaintiff, on the same day and before the defendant had been to any further expense or trouble in caring for and feeding said cow, offered to pay the amount asked by the defendant, then there was nothing to arbitrate, and you must find the issues for the plaintiff."

We think this instruction was too favorable, if anything, for the plaintiff, and in case of retrial, if the plaintiff shall have deposited with the trial court the sum of $1.50, the following instruction should be given in its place: "If the defendant sent the plaintiff word by his son that he would take $1.50 for his damages and compensation, and the plaintiff on the same day and within a reasonable time accepted the offer and on the same day tendered the $1.50, the amount asked by the defendant, then there was nothing to arbitrate, and you will find the issues for the plaintiff."

[3] Instructions 1, 2, and 3 were given by the court at plaintiff's request, and defendant saved no exception. The court gave instruction 4 of its own motion, and defendant saved no exception. Defendant himself could therefore make no complaint because of the giving of these instructions, and the question is raised whether the court may notice of its own motion a supposed error in the giving of these instructions and grant a new trial on that account. That it may is established by many authorities. Head v. Randolph, 83 Mo. App. loc. cit. 287; Ewart v. Peniston, 233 Mo., loc. cit. 707, 136 S. W. 422; Parker v. Britton, 133 Mo. App. 273, 113 S. W. 259; Lovell v. Davis, 52 Mo. App. 342; Baughman v. National Waterworks Co., 58 Mo. App. 576; 29 Cyc. 921.

[4, 5] The evidence in this record does not present a case that required the defendant to proceed under the stray law. Further, the reasons assigned by the court in its order granting a new trial, under the view we have taken, were wholly insufficient to authorize the granting of the same. We are of the opinion, however, that material error was committed by the trial court in authorizing a recovery by the plaintiff without his having first deposited $1.50, the amount he admitted to be due the defendant by his tender, or without instructing the jury to return a verdict for defendant for that amount in case they found for the plaintiff as to the other issues. In cases like the present, where an appeal has been taken from the granting of a new trial and reasons have been assigned by the trial court for its action, although these reasons are found by the appellate court to be unsound, yet, if there be good reasons appearing on the record for granting a new trial, the order granting it will be upheld. Green v. Terminal Railroad Ass'n, 211 Mo. 18, 109 S. W. 715; Smart v. Kansas City, 208 Mo. 162, 105 S. W. 709, 14 L. R. A. (N. S.) 565, 123 Am. St. Rep. 415, 13 Ann. Cas. 932.

We think the order granting a new trial should be affirmed, and it is so ordered. All concur.

STATE v. MARTIN.

(Springfield Court of Appeals. Missouri. Dec. 2, 1912.)

FALSE PRETENSES (§ 12*)—ELEMENTS OF OFFENSE—OBTAINING PROPERTY.

An essential of the offense of obtaining property under false pretenses, denounced by Rev. St. 1909, § 4565, is that the person defrauded has parted with something of value as the result of the false pretenses; and a debtor who obtains a credit by means of an order drawn on a third person, not indebted to him, does not obtain property or anything of value, and is not guilty of the offense.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see False Pretenses, Cent. Dig. § 16; Dec. Dig. § 12.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Howell County; W. N. Evans, Judge.

A. E. Martin was indicted for obtaining property under false pretenses. From a judgment sustaining a demurrer to the indictment, the State appeals. Affirmed.

Will H. D. Green, of West Plains, for the State. J. L. Van Wormer, of West Plains, for respondent.

COX, J. The prosecuting attorney filed an information charging defendant with the offense of obtaining property under false pretenses. The trial court sustained a demurrer to the information, and the state appealed.

The information charges that defendant was indebted to the Kilpatrick Mercantile Company in the sum of $109.35, and in order to secure a credit of $20 on this account he falsely represented that one A. J. Rhodes was indebted to him in the sum of $20 and defendant then gave to the Kilpatrick Mercantile Company an order upon Rhodes for $20, and thereby induced the mercantile company to give him a credit of $20 upon his account with them. Does this conduct on the part of defendant constitute a crime under the statute?

The statute (section 4565, Stat. 1909) is as follows: "Every person who with intent to cheat or defraud any other shall designedly * * * by * * * false pretense obtain * * * from any person any money, personal property, right in action or other valuable thing or effects whatsoever * * *"—shall be punished, etc. The question for our determination is whether obtaining credit on an account is obtaining property or thing of value. We do not think so. The entry by the mercantile company of a credit of $20 on the account of defendant with them on their books did not operate as a payment; hence defendant obtained nothing by the transaction, nor did the mercantile company part with any goods or property, or anything of value. If Rhodes was not indebted to defendant, and the order upon him by defendant was worthless for that reason, the parties were left in exactly the same condition after the transaction as before; and, while the mercantile company got nothing out of it, they lost nothing, and nothing of value was obtained from them by defendant. One of the essentials of this offense is that the party defrauded must have parted with something of value as a result of the false pretense or representation; and, since this element is wanting in the charge of this information, the demurrer thereto was properly sustained. State v. Moore, 15 Iowa, 412; Moore v. Commonwealth, 8 Pa. 260.

NIXON, P. J. The facts in this case are not controverted between the parties. This is a suit instituted in the circuit court of Dent county by the appellants against the respondent for breach of warranty and in which judgment was rendered against appellants, from which they appeal.

The land involved is the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ and the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 36, township 31, range 3 west, in Shannon county, Mo. On the 2d day of May, 1881, the N. $\frac{1}{2}$ of the above-mentioned section was sold for taxes on a judgment rendered in favor of the collector against Hamilton Brandon. The said Brandon was dead at the time of the rendition of the tax judgment. On the 20th day of August, 1892, respondent Organ sold said lands to appellants, together with other lands, for the price and sum of \$2.50 per acre. Thereafter the heirs of Hamilton Brandon, to wit, George Brandon and Bell Hodges, instituted a suit in the circuit court of Shannon county, Mo., against the appellants herein to test and quiet the title to said lands, and on the 14th day of September, 1907, judgment was rendered against these appellants and in favor of George Brandon and Bell Hodges, quieting the title in them and divesting the title out of these appellants. Then the appellants herein, on the 24th day of October, 1910, instituted suit in the circuit court of Dent county, Mo., against respondent for breach of warranty for the price paid for the lands, with 6 per cent. per annum from date of the purchase of said lands. On trial thereof, judgment was rendered in favor of respondent and against these appellants on the ground that the breach of warranty occurred at the time the deed was made, and that the cause of action was barred under the 10-year statute of limitation. The tax proceedings were regular on their face, and the testimony of Mr. Ship was that he had no knowledge or information that Hamilton Brandon, the defendant in the tax suit, was dead until the suit was filed to test and quiet the title, and that that was the first time they knew there was a paramount and outstanding title.

In the case of Falk v. Organ et al., 180 Mo. App. 218, 141 S. W. 1, this court had occasion to examine and declare the law on facts substantially identical with those in the present record, and the opinion in that case is adopted as the declaration of law governing this case. In that opinion we said: "As we have seen, the facts are undisputed that on the day the deed with covenants of seisin was delivered to the plaintiff the defendants had no title whatever to the land and no possession; that it was purchased by defendants at a tax sale, and the deed was void; that the defendants had never had any possession; and that they did not put the plaintiff in possession. This, as we have said, is an action by plaintiff (covenantee) against the defendants (covenantors) for the breach of a covenant of seisin. Seisin is of two kinds—seisin in law and seisin in deed. A covenant of seisin implies that the covenantor is possessed of both—that is, of the whole legal title—and the covenant is broken once and for all if the covenantor has not the possession, the right of possession, and the right of legal title. Coleman v. Clark, 80 Mo. App. loc. cit. 342; Fitzhugh v. Croghan, 2 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 429, 19 Am. Dec. 139; 2 Wash. on Real Prop. side page 657. "The law in this state is undoubtedly well settled that the covenant of seisin of an indefeasible estate in fee simple is a covenant in present, and is broken the moment of its creation, provided the title of the covenantor is totally defective, and he has no estate or possession in the land, and in such cases the covenants of seisin between the parties are personal and collateral to the land. If, however, any estate passes by the conveyance, or the covenantee takes actual possession of the land, such estate or possession will run with the land; and in such case the covenants would be substantially breached when the covenantee was deprived of the estate conveyed, or when he was ousted from actual possession of the land by the holder of the paramount title. In this case the facts indisputably show that the defendants were not, at the time of the execution of the deed to the plaintiff, the owners of the W. $\frac{1}{2}$ of the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 17, township 32, range 3, the land conveyed, and were not in possession thereof, never put the covenantee in possession, and had no title or interest therein. Hence the covenant of indefeasible seisin was broken as soon as made, and the plaintiff was entitled to recover the purchase money with interest from the date of its payment and the execution of the deed. Adkins v. Tomlinson, 121 Mo. loc. cit. 495, 25 S. W. 573; Evans v. Fulton, 134 Mo. 653, 36 S. W. 230; Allen v. Kennedy, 91 Mo. 324, 2 S. W. 142; Kirkpatrick v. Downing, 58 Mo. 32 [17 Am. Rep. 678]; Murphy v. Price, 48 Mo. 247; Webb v. Wheeler [80 Neb. 438, 114 N. W. 636] 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1178. It therefore follows that at the time of the execution of the deed containing the covenants of warranty on the seventh day of November, 1885, the covenantors having no estate, title, or possession of the land conveyed, the covenantee received absolutely nothing by his purchase, and the covenant of seisin was breached technically and substantially on that day, and the statute of limitations commenced to run from that time."

On re-examination of the law we see no reason to modify in any respect the principles announced in that opinion. It therefore follows that the judgment in this case should be affirmed, and it is so ordered. All concur.

WILLIAMS et al. v. SCHOOL DIST. NO. 5 et al.

(Springfield Court of Appeals. Missouri. Dec. 2, 1912.)

1. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§ 111*)—TAXPAYERS' ACTION—RESTRAINING REMOVAL OF SCHOOL BUILDING—PLEADING—INJURY TO PLAINTIFF.

Resident taxpayers of a school district, in order to enjoin the district and its directors from removing a school building, must allege and prove that from defendant's acts their property rights are about to suffer a legal injury. It is not sufficient to merely allege injury without stating the facts, and, where the injuries are alleged to be irreparable, the petition must show in what respects it is irreparable, stating the facts from which the court can determine the nature of the injury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Schools and School Districts, Cent. Dig. §§ 265-268; Dec. Dig. § 111.*]

2. INJUNCTION (§ 12*)—GROUNDS OF RELIEF—IRREPARABLE INJURY.

A court of equity may enjoin a threatened irreparable injury to property rights, even though no injury has then occurred.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Cent. Dig. § 12; Dec. Dig. § 12.*]

3. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§ 111*)—TAXPAYERS' ACTION—REMOVAL OF SCHOOL BUILDING.

Under Rev. St. 1909, § 2534, which provides that threatened irreparable injury to property may be enjoined when there is no adequate remedy by an action for damages, taxing residents of a school district may restrain the district, or its officers, from exceeding their lawful powers in any way that will injuriously affect them, such as by an unauthorized removal of a school building.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Schools and School Districts, Cent. Dig. §§ 265-268; Dec. Dig. § 111.*]

4. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§ 111*)—ACTION TO ENJOIN SCHOOL DISTRICT AND OFFICERS—TITLE OR RIGHT OF PLAINTIFF—TAXPAYERS.

An injunction will not lie to restrain improper or unlawful acts by a school district or its officers at the suit of a resident merely, but it must be averred that the plaintiff is also a taxpayer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Schools and School Districts, Cent. Dig. §§ 265-268; Dec. Dig. § 111.*]

5. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§ 111*)—ACTION TO ENJOIN SCHOOL DISTRICT AND OFFICERS—SPECIAL DAMAGE TO PLAINTIFF.

In the absence of proof that plaintiff, seeking to enjoin alleged illegal acts of the school district or its officers, in removing a school building, will sustain an irreparable or special or pecuniary damage therefrom, such act will not be enjoined.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Schools and School Districts, Cent. Dig. §§ 265-268; Dec. Dig. § 111.*]

6. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§ 111*)—TAXPAYERS' ACTION—PLEADING—GENERAL DENIAL—MATTERS IN ISSUE.

Allegation, in a petition to enjoin the removal of a school building, that the plaintiffs were resident taxpayers of the district, and that the removal of the building was unauthorized, would, if true, show that plaintiffs had a special interest in the subject-matter entitling them to an injunction, and such allegation, being an essential one, would be put in issue by a general denial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Schools and School Districts, Cent. Dig. §§ 265-268; Dec. Dig. § 111.*]

Cox, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Pulaski County; L. B. Woodside, Judge.

Action for injunction by Grant Williams and others against School District No. 5 and H. F. Cadwell and another, directors. From an order making a temporary injunction perpetual, defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded.

Bland, Crites & Murphy, of Rolla, for appellants. W. D. Johnson, of Crocker, F. H. Farris, of Rolla, and G. W. Goad, of Springfield, for respondents.

NIXON, P. J. This was an action for an injunction against School District No. 5 and its school directors for the purpose of enjoining and restraining them from moving a schoolhouse from an old to a new site. A temporary injunction was issued by the probate court and upon final hearing in the circuit court was made perpetual, from which the defendants appealed.

The petition for the injunction states, in substance, for plaintiffs' cause of action that the school district was properly organized under the laws of the state of Missouri, and that the defendants Cadwell and Joiner were the directors of the district; that on the 13th day of June, 1911, Cadwell, as one of the school directors, without authority of law, called a special election in said school district to select a site for the schoolhouse; that an election was held pursuant to said call on the 27th day of June at which it was voted to move the schoolhouse to a new site at or near the French road on the Iberia and Crocker road; that there was no notice whatever given of said election; that the defendants as directors were threatening illegally to move the schoolhouse to the proposed site, which was on one side of the school district and away from its center and a site to which the district had no title or interest, to the hindrance of the children of school age of the plaintiffs; also, that the threatened removal of the schoolhouse to said site would cause irreparable injury to plaintiffs who are resident taxpayers of said school district; and that said directors threatened to remove said schoolhouse and pay for the removal of the same out of the sinking fund in direct violation of law; and that the plaintiffs are without remedy at law. The defendants for answer filed a general denial.

Appellants present to this court only one alleged error, namely, that the plaintiffs failed to show by their evidence that they were entitled to maintain the action.

It will be seen from the face of the petition that the plaintiffs do not assume to sue in a special or representative capacity, but in their own individual right, so that if the defendants had filed a special demurrer under section 1800, R. S. 1909, on the ground that the petition did not show that the plaintiffs had any legal capacity to sue, it would not have raised an issue of law; and if the defendants had filed an answer denying specially the legal capacity of the plaintiffs to sue, under section 1804, R. S. 1909, it would not have raised an issue of fact as to plaintiffs' legal capacity to sue. Under the pleadings neither in the trial court nor in this court has the legal capacity of the plaintiffs to sue been properly challenged by the defendants. The defendants having filed an answer denying the allegations of plaintiffs' petition, the plaintiffs were put to the proof of the constituent facts of their cause of action.

[1, 2] In order to recover in actions of this kind, the plaintiff must allege and prove the existence of his right, and also must affirmatively show that defendant's acts sought to be restrained will be in violation thereof; in other words, he must show that a legal injury is about to be inflicted upon his property rights. So that evidence of the existence of a right violated or threatened to be violated is a prerequisite to the granting of an injunction. And where it is clear that the plaintiff does not have the right that he claims, he is not entitled to an injunction, either temporary or perpetual, to prevent a violation of such supposed right. 22 Cyc. 749. Nor is it necessary, in order to authorize a court of equity to exercise its jurisdiction, that the wrong should actually have been consummated; such injunction may be obtained to prevent an irreparable injury upon a proper showing, even though no such injury has yet occurred. If such injury is threatened or impending to property or property rights, an injunction will be granted. It is further necessary in such cases that the petition must allege facts which clearly show that the plaintiff will sustain injury because of the acts complained of. It is not sufficient to merely allege injury without stating the facts, and, where the injuries are alleged to be irreparable, it must be shown in the petition in what respects they are irreparable; the facts must be stated so the court can determine the nature of the injury. McKinzie v. Mathews, 59 Mo. 99; Schuster v. Myers, 148 Mo. 422, 50 S. W. 103.

[3] It has been held that a court of equity may restrain public officers, school boards, and municipalities, when they are acting illegally or without authority and in breach of trust, and thereby causing irreparable injury. Our statute has provided that the remedy by writ of injunction shall exist in cases where an irreparable injury to real or personal property is threatened and to prevent the doing of any legal wrong whatever when in the opinion of the court an adequate remedy cannot be afforded by an action for damages. Section 2534, R. S. 1909. The right of taxpaying citizens to resort to equity to restrain municipal corporations or their officers from transcending their lawful powers or violating their legal duties in any mode which will injuriously affect the taxpayer, such as making an unauthorized appropriation of the corporate funds or an illegal or wrongful disposition of the corporate property, is unquestioned. Dillon on Mun. Corp. § 914. The right of resident taxpayers to invoke the interposition of a court of equity to prevent an illegal disposition of the moneys of a county, or the illegal creation of a debt which they in common with other property holders of the county may be otherwise compelled to pay, is also well settled. Crampton v. Zabriskie, 101 U. S. 601, 25 L. Ed. 1070. Our own Supreme Court, in the case of Newmeyer v. Railroad, 52 Mo. 81, 14 Am. Rep. 394, held that taxpayers can file bills in equity annulling illegal acts of county courts when such acts would increase their burdens of taxation; that in such cases the injury is a private one to the taxpayers, and they are the sufferers rather than the public and are a class specially damaged by such unlawful acts which would increase the burden of taxation upon their property. They therefore have a special interest in the subject-matter of such suit distinct from the general public and can maintain an action for the injury.

In this case the record shows that the plaintiffs wholly failed at the trial to offer evidence in any way sustaining the facts constituting their cause of action and that they were about to sustain irreparable injury. Their evidence, it is true, tended to show that one of them was a resident of the school district and that he voted at the special school election. No evidence whatever was offered showing or tending to show that the plaintiffs or either of them was a taxpayer of the school district, or had a child or children of school age, or that the removal of the schoolhouse would be more or less convenient to them, or that any school moneys had been expended or was proposed or threatened to be expended for the purpose of moving the schoolhouse to a new site. On the contrary, it appeared that the site was given, and that one French, a resident of the district, agreed to move the schoolhouse at his own expense. There was also no evidence showing that the two directors by any official act had taken any steps whatever, or were threatening to take any steps, to move the schoolhouse at the time the injunction was procured. The plaintiffs introduced both of such directors as their witnesses. The evidence showed that no record was made by the clerk of the special election to move the schoolhouse for the reason such removal was deemed illegal. The defendant Cadwell did testify that he helped to survey the acre of ground, and that the acre had been cleared off, but that they did not intend to move the schoolhouse under the illegal election. The defendant Joiner stated that it was not their purpose to locate the schoolhouse on the new site; that when they found the election was illegal they abandoned the idea, and nothing was thereafter done towards moving the schoolhouse at any time.

The trial court—as showing the theory upon which the case was tried and the judgment rendered—gave upon its own motion the following declaration of law for the plaintiffs: "The court declares that the testimony in this case is sufficient to show an interest on the part of some of the plaintiffs in the case sufficient to maintain this action. If they are residents of the district, that fact alone would be sufficient to give them an interest in the location of the schoolhouse to maintain an injunction, and the evidence in this case shows that the plaintiff Oldham was a resident of the district, and also that he participated in the election held by the people of the district to determine the location of the schoolhouse, and this testimony is sufficient to authorize an inference by the court that he was not only a resident of the district but also a legal voter in said district."

[4, 5] This seems to be a misapprehension of the law, as this is not an action to protect public rights, but to prevent a threatened personal injury. In such case, it is not sufficient to sustain the action that the plaintiffs should show that they were residents of the school district; they must also show that they were taxpayers. An injunction will not lie to restrain improper or unlawful conduct on the part of public officers at the suit of a resident of the county merely. It must be averred and shown that he is also a citizen and taxpayer, and that he will be greatly and irreparably injured by the acts which he seeks to enjoin. Caruthers v. Harnett, 67 Tex. 127, 2 S. W. 523. The plaintiffs in this case failed to show any injury to themselves as charged in the petition. The petition by a taxpayer praying that the disbursement of taxes be enjoined because illegally levied must state the amount of taxes paid by him, and to entitle him to relief he must offer proof of substantial and serious damages, and not of a mere technical and inconsequential injury. Robins v. Latham, 134 Mo. 466, 36 S. W. 33; Fugate v. McManama, 50 Mo. App. 39. In the absence of proof that the plaintiffs as taxpayers would suffer irreparable injury by reason of the illegal appropriation of the school moneys of the district, the petition cannot be sustained. Davis v. Hartwig, 195 Mo. loc. cit. 399, 94 S. W. 507. An injunction will not lie to question improper or unlawful conduct on the part of a public officer at the suit of a resident of a county merely; it must be averred and shown that he (the complainant) is also a citizen and taxpayer, and that he will be greatly and irreparably injured by the act which he seeks to enjoin. Spelling on Extra. Rems. (2d Ed.) § 614, p. 509. The authorities of a school district will not be enjoined from moving the schoolhouse to another site where plaintiff does not show he will sustain any special or pecuniary injury different from that of the public. High on Injunctions, vol. 2 (4th Ed.) § 1263, p. 1280.

[6] The allegation in plaintiffs' petition that they were resident taxpayers of the school district and that the moneys of the district were about to be illegally appropriated by the acts of the school directors would, if true, show that they had a special interest in the subject-matter of the suit and were entitled to be protected by the court. The averment was a substantial one and was a constituent fact in the cause of action as stated in their petition, and, like the other essential allegations of the petition, was put in issue by the general denial. Plaintiffs, having wholly failed to prove the substantial facts constituting their cause of action, were not entitled to the perpetual injunction.

It is therefore ordered that the judgment be reversed, and the cause remanded.

GOODE v. CENTRAL COAL & COKE CO.
(Kansas City Court of Appeals. Missouri.
Nov. 25, 1912.)

1. TRIAL (§ 139*)—PROVINCE OF JURY—REJECTING EVIDENCE.

Evidence may be rejected by the court as unworthy of belief only when opposed to the plain, undisputed physical facts; and when they are disputable it must go to the triers of fact.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 332, 335, 338-341, 365; Dec. Dig. § 139.*]

2. PLEADING (§ 433*)—CONFORMITY TO PLEADINGS AND EVIDENCE.

In an action for a miner's death, in which it was claimed that decedent assumed the risk, because the rock fall occurred over his place of work, which he was bound to make safe, allegations of the petition that defendant negligently permitted the entry "at or near the point" where defendant directed decedent to work to be dangerous, when considered with other allegations that decedent, when the rock fell on him, had left the place of work and gone westward, near the west wall of the entry, to eat, were sufficient, in absence of demurrer or motion, to sustain a judgment for plaintiff, based on proof that the rock fall did not occur directly over the place where decedent had been working.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 1451-1477; Dec. Dig. § 433.*]

3. PLEADING (§ 34*)—CONSTRUCTION.

A pleading must be read as a whole.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 66-75; Dec. Dig. § 34.*]

4. PLEADING (§ 34*)—OBJECTIONS AFTER JUDGMENT.

When first attacked after judgment, a pleading should be construed favorably to the pleader, and all doubts resolved in his favor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 66-75; Dec. Dig. § 34.*]

5. DEATH (§ 14*)—MASTER'S LIABILITY—NEGLIGENCE.

The cause of action accruing to the wife for her husband's death while in defendant's employment must be grounded on defendant's negligence in performing or omitting some duty it owed to decedent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Death, Cent. Dig. § 16; Dec. Dig. § 14.*]

6. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 124*)—INSPECTION.

Rev. St. 1909, § 8447, requiring a daily inspection of the coal mines generating explosive gas, in which men are employed, does not require daily inspection of mines not generating explosive gases.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 235-242; Dec. Dig. § 124.*]

7. MASTER AND SERVANT (§§ 101, 102*)—SAFE PLACE TO WORK.

An employer is required to exercise reasonable care to provide his servants with a reasonably safe place of work.

8. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 286*)—INJURIES—JURY QUESTION—NEGLIGENCE.

What constitutes reasonable care by an employer generally depends on the particular circumstances; and if they afford room for reasonable difference of opinion the issue of negligence is for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 1001, 1006, 1010-1050; Dec. Dig. § 286.*]

9. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 124*)—MASTER'S DUTY—INSPECT A PLACE OF WORK.

A coal mine owner was bound to inspect the mine roof at reasonable intervals, and, on discovering an insecure rock, to remove it for the protection of workmen required to be near it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 235-242; Dec. Dig. § 124.*]

10. TRIAL (§ 253*)—INSTRUCTIONS—IGNORING ISSUES.

An instruction, in an action for a coal miner's death by a rock fall, that the sole question was whether decedent was killed while working at his place of work, and if he was killed in a part of the mine which was not his working place the jury should find for plaintiff, was inapplicable, as ignoring the question of whether the dangerous character of the work would have been discoverable by the employer in the exercise of ordinary care, and whether it did exercise ordinary care to discover it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 613-623; Dec. Dig. § 253.*]

11. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 265*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—RES IPSE LOQUITUR DOCTRINE.

The fact that a rock fell upon a coal miner was not sufficient proof of negligence by the mineowner in not inspecting the roof.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 877-908, 955; Dec. Dig. § 265.*]

12. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 265*)—NEGLIGENCE.

One suing for a coal miner's death must show that the rock which fell on him should have been discovered, by the exercise of reasonable care by the employer, in time to have prevented the injury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 877-908, 955; Dec. Dig. § 265.*]

13. TRIAL (§ 296*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CURE BY OTHER INSTRUCTIONS.

An erroneous instruction, which directed a verdict on the hypothesis stated, was not cured by contrary instructions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 705-713, 715, 716, 718; Dec. Dig. § 296.*]

14. DEATH (§ 93*)—DAMAGES—PUNITIVE DAMAGES.

Rev. St. 1909, § 5427, providing that the jury, in an action for a wrongful death, may give such damages as they deem fair, with reference to the injuries resulting to the surviving parties, and "also having regard to the mitigating or aggravating circumstances" attending such wrongful act, does not authorize the award of punitive damages, except where the injury was wanton or reckless, so that they would be otherwise allowable.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Macon County; Nat M. Shelton, Judge.

Action by Catherine Goode against the Central Coal & Coke Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

B. R. Dysart and Walter C. Goodson, both of Macon (Massey Holmes, of Kansas City, of counsel), for appellant. Dan R. Hughes, of Macon, and Burns, Burns & Burns, of Brookfield, for respondent.

JOHNSON, J. Plaintiff's husband, a coal miner employed by defendant in one of its mines in Macon county, was killed in the mine by a large rock, which fell from the roof of an entry, and, claiming that his death was caused by negligence of defendant, plaintiff brought this action within six months after the death of her husband to recover the damages sustained by her in consequence of the alleged negligence.

The pleaded cause of action is founded on section 5426, Rev. Stat. 1909, and the damages claimed are those allowed in section 5427. The answer, in addition to a general denial, contains pleas of assumed risk and contributory negligence. Plaintiff prevailed in the circuit court, where she recovered a judgment of $5,000.

The husband of plaintiff, in company with other miners, was engaged in the work of "drawing pillars." In the preceding stages of the work in that part of the mine, the coal had been removed from entries and rooms, and thick pillars or walls of coal had been left standing, for the purpose, in part, of supporting the roof. Afterward these pillars were removed to obtain the coal in them. Plaintiff and his fellow servants had been working eight days mining the coal in one of such pillars, and just before the event in controversy had been loading coal loosened by blasts from the pillar into tram cars.

The parties agree that it was the duty of miners thus employed to attend to the safety of the place in which they were working; and the great weight of the evidence is to the effect that defendant owed such miners the duty of reasonable care to keep all other places, such as entries and the like, in a reasonably safe condition. The death of plaintiff's husband occurred at the noon hour, while he and his companions were at lunch. According to the evidence of plaintiff, the men had withdrawn from the place of their work to a place, perhaps, 20 feet distant therefrom and in the entry, and were seated eating their lunches, which they had brought with them, when a rock, 12 or 15 feet long, four feet wide, and 2 or 3 feet thick, fell from the roof, killing the husband of plaintiff.

The main dispute in the evidence is over the fact of the position of this rock before its fall. If, as witnesses for plaintiff insist, the rock was not over the place where the men were at work before noon, there is substantial support in the evidence for the conclusion that it was in a part of the roof under the direct supervision and control of defendant; but if, on the other hand, the rock was over the place where the men were working plaintiff cannot recover, since the death of her husband should be ascribed to his own negligence in failing to perform one of the tasks of his employment.

[1] Without going into details, we content ourselves with the declaration that the contention of each disputant finds substantial support in the evidence. Counsel for defendant lay great stress on the testimony of certain witnesses, among them the state mine inspector who examined the place after the casualty, and who stated that the stain of blood and brains left on the floor showed that the place of the killing was less than five feet from the pillar, and therefore was under the part of the roof which the miners at work on the pillar were bound to keep in a safe condition. Opposed to this testimony is that of fellow workmen of the deceased, who assert that they and the deceased were seated from 15 to 25 feet from the pillar, and describe the fallen rock as being in a place where it could not have been, had it fallen from a position in the part of the roof that was under the control of the deceased and his fellow laborers. To hold, as counsel for defendant insist we should, that the evidence of plaintiff is opposed to the plain physical facts of the situation would require us to give conclusive effect to the testimony of defendant's witnesses descriptive of such facts, and to reject as unworthy of belief the contradictory testimony of unimpeached witnesses, who give a vitally different description of them. It is only where the testimony of witnesses is opposed to the plain, undisputed and indisputable physical facts of the occurrence in question that it will be rejected by the court as unworthy of belief. Where the physical facts are disputed and disputable, such controversy must go to the triers of fact as one of the issues for them to decide. In the present case the question of whether the rock was over the place where the men had been at work, or was in another place from 15 to 25 feet distant therefrom, was a question of fact for the jury to determine. The learned trial judge committed no error in sending this issue to the jury.

[2] It is argued by counsel for defendant that the petition is so fatally defective it will not support the judgment, and our attention is called to the allegation "that the defendant and its officers and agents carelessly and negligently left and permitted the said entry in said mine at and near the point where defendant * * * directed the said James V. Goode to work * * * to be unsafe and dangerous," etc. Counsel say that in this allegation plaintiff has pleaded herself out of court, since she expressly states that the unsafe place was the place where the deceased was required to work, and the proof shows that it was his own duty to keep that place safe. The well-known rule is invoked that a plaintiff will not be allowed to plead one cause and recover on another, especially on one contradictory of that pleaded.

[3, 4] A sufficient answer to this argument is found in other parts of the petition, which explain and give definite meaning to the expression "at and near." These allegations are to the effect that the deceased had left his working place and had gone "westward to or near the west wall of said main entry, for the purpose of eating his lunch," etc. This position coincides with the position the witnesses for plaintiff say the deceased occupied at the time of his death. There is no substantial variance between allegation and proof. The petition must be read as a whole, and, since it was not attacked until after judgment, should be scanned with a friendly eye, and all doubts resolved in favor of the pleader. If defendant thought the two allegations to which we have referred were inconsistent or uncertain, he had his remedy, which, as to all but fatal defects, must be invoked before answer. A liberal interpretation of the petition brings it into harmony with the judgment; and therefore the objection of defendant to its sufficiency to support the judgment is overruled.

[5] Further, it is argued by defendant that the demurrer to the evidence of plaintiff should have been given, for the reason that no proof was adduced tending to show that an inspection of the rock by defendant before its fall would have disclosed the fact that it was unsafe and likely to fall. The cause of action, if any, inuring to plaintiff of necessity must be grounded on negligence of defendant in the performance of, or in the omission to perform, some duty it owed its servant.

[6, 7] Since the petition does not allege, and the proof does not show, that this mine was one "generating explosive gas," the duty of defendant towards its servant was not measured by the provisions of section 8447, Rev. Stat. 1909, which require daily inspection of mines "generating explosive gas in which men are employed." Timson v. Coal Co., 220 Mo. 580, 119 S. W. 565. The duty of defendant was defined by the general rule, requiring a master to exercise reasonable care to provide his servant a reasonably safe place in which to work.

[8, 9] Just what is reasonable care in a given case is a question generally to be solved in the light of the peculiar facts and circumstances of the case; and where they afford room for a reasonable difference of opinion about the characterization of the act alleged to have been negligent the issue of negligence or no negligence becomes one of fact for the jury to determine. The duty of defendant towards its servant called for the exercise of reasonable care to discover dangerous defects in the entry roof in question and to rectify such defects. That is to say, defendant was duty bound to inspect the roof at reasonable intervals, and, on discovering the presence of an insecure rock or other material, to remove such menace to the safety of its servants whose service compelled them to use the entry. There is evidence tending to show that defendant did not inspect the rock at reasonable intervals, and to support a reasonable inference that, owing to its size, form, weight, position in the roof, and the character of its surroundings, a reasonable inspection would have disclosed the danger of allowing the rock to remain in its overhead position. We think the evidence of plaintiff sustains the charge of negligence and tends to show that such negligence was the proximate cause of her husband's death. The demurrer to the evidence was properly overruled.

[10] We find prejudicial error in the instructions given at the request of plaintiff. One of the instructions is as follows: "The jury are instructed that the sole question in this case for the jury to determine is as to whether or not the deceased, James V. Goode, came to his death while at work in his working place; and if the jury believe and find from the evidence that the deceased was killed by a rock falling from the roof of the entry in a part of the mine that was not his working place, while in the exercise of due care, then it will be your duty to find for the plaintiff."

[11, 12] It will be noticed that in this instruction, which assumes to cover the whole case and to direct a verdict, the jury were required to find for plaintiff on the sole hypothesis that her husband was killed by a rock falling from the roof of the entry at a place that was not his working place, without reference to the issues of whether or not the dangerous character of the rock would have been discoverable to an ordinarily careful and prudent master, in the exercise of due care towards his servant, and whether or not defendant did employ due care in the discharge of its duty of mastership. The fact that the rock fell, of itself, was not sufficient proof of negligence. Wojtylak v. Coal Co., 188 Mo. 260, 87 S. W. 506. The burden was on plaintiff to satisfy the jury that the rock not only was in a dangerous condition, but that such condition would have been discovered by defendant, had reasonable care been exercised in time to have prevented the injury. The instruction under consideration ignored that burden and lessened the load the law required plaintiff to carry to the end of the case.

[13] The error cannot be deemed cured by the other instructions given at the instance of plaintiff. Assuming to cover the whole case and directing a verdict, the instruction offered a hypothesis which the jury might select to the exclusion of all others; consequently such other hypotheses should not be regarded as curative, but as contradictory, of that we pronounce erroneous and harmful.

[14] In view of the possibility of a retrial of the case, we deem it necessary to say that, since the case involves no issues of malice, wantonness, or recklessness, but is merely an action for negligence, the instruction on the measure of damages should not present any issue of "mitigating or aggravating circumstances." These words, as used in the statute (section 5427, Rev. Stat. 1909), are intended to apply only to cases in which it would be proper to allow punitive damages, and have no application to other cases grounded in tort. Boyd v. Railroad, 236 Mo. 54, 139 S. W. 561; Barth v. Railway, 142 Mo. 535, 44 S. W. 778; Morgan v. Durfee, 69 Mo. 469, 33 Am. Rep. 508; Nichols v. Winfrey, 79 Mo. 544.

The court say, in Barth v. Railway, supra: "It is now the settled rule of decision in this court that where there is neither allegation of malice, wickedness, or wantonness, in the tort complained of, nor evidence of any aggravating circumstances, it is improper in the instruction to include the words 'having due regard to the mitigating or aggravating circumstances.' These words are only proper in a case in which punitive damages or smart money may be allowed. Stoher v. Railroad, 91 Mo. 509 [4 S. W. 389]; Parsons v. Railroad, 94 Mo. 286 [6 S. W. 464]."

Our decision in Ogan v. Railroad, 142 Mo. App. 248, 126 S. W. 191, relied on by plaintiff, is not in conflict with this ruling.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded. All concur.

CROWLEY v. CROWLEY.

(Kansas City Court of Appeals. Missouri. Nov. 11, 1912. Rehearing Denied Dec. 9, 1912.)

1. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 144*)—SEPARATE PROPERTY—RENTS.

Rev. St. 1909, § 8309, provides that all the income, increase, and profits from a married woman's real estate shall remain her separate property, and not be liable for her husband's debts, unless reduced to his possession with her express consent, provided that it shall not be deemed to have been reduced to the husband's possession by his use and care thereof, unless by the terms of said assent in writing full authority be given by the wife to the husband to dispose of the same for his own use, but such property shall be subject to execution for any liability of her husband created for necessities for the wife or family. Held, that where a husband and wife lived together peaceably for a number of years on a farm belonging to the wife, without any thought of the existence of the relation of debtor and creditor, and the farm rents were collected and disposed of by the husband without the wife's written consent, he supporting and providing for the family, she cannot recover against his estate for such rent collected, on the ground that she never gave her written consent to his use thereof.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Ray County; Francis H. Trimble, Judge.

Action by Zerelda A. Crowley against General B. Crowley, administrator. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Frank P. Dibelbiss and Albert M. Clark, both of Richmond, for appellant. Lavelock & Kirkpatrick, of Richmond, for respondent.

ELLISON, J. In the year 1899 David Crowley and plaintiff were married. Two years thereafter he, being joined by plaintiff, deeded a large farm, with some other property, to plaintiff's father. On the same day the father deeded the property to plaintiff. Each conveyance was the usual warranty deed, and each for the expressed consideration of "one dollar and other valuable considerations." David and plaintiff lived together harmoniously as man and wife for near 10 years, when he died. During this time the farm was rented by David, and the rents collected by him, just as it had been before he caused its conveyance to plaintiff. No objection to this was made by plaintiff, nor was any claim made that the rents should be paid over to her; but she never gave her express assent in writing that David should collect the rents for his own use and benefit, which she claims was necessary under section 8309, R. S. 1909, before her title would be divested. After David's death plaintiff presented the present claim to the probate court against his estate for each year's rent, aggregating $8,560. The probate judge was disqualified, and the cause was certified to the circuit court for trial, as provided by statute. The judgment in the latter court was for plaintiff.

[1] That portion of section 8309, R. S. 1909, relied upon by plaintiff, reads that all "income, increase and profits" from a married woman's real estate shall "be and remain her separate property and under her sole control, and shall not be liable to be taken by any process of law for the debts of her husband," unless it be reduced to the possession of the husband "with the express assent of his wife: Provided, that said personal property shall not be deemed to have been reduced to possession by the husband by his use, occupancy, care or protection thereof, but the same shall remain her separate property, unless by the terms of said assent, in writing, full authority shall have been given by the wife to the husband to sell, encumber or otherwise dispose of the same for his own use and benefit, but such property shall be subject to execution for the payments of the debts of the wife contracted before or during marriage, and for any debt or liability of her husband created for necessities for the wife or family." The literal reading of the statute is that the rents of a married woman's real estate remain her separate property, although used and disposed of by the husband, unless she shall have expressly consented in writing that he might dispose of it for his own use and benefit. In this case plaintiff's deceased husband, through a series of years, did use and dispose of the rents and profits of her land without her consent in writing. And her counsel, in effect, says: There is the letter of the statute, in which it is declared that her property has been taken from her without her consent being given in the only way the law will permit her to give it; therefore a liability has necessarily arisen to compensate her for its unlawful taking. Looking straight at the statute, without a glance to either side, counsel is right, and our duty would be done in directing that the plaintiff have her recompense.

[2] But ought not the reason of the thing to have its weight? It is true that plain terms of a statute should not be argued away by logic or reason, for it is said that the command of a statute is reason enough for those to whom it is addressed. Yet we all know that unless there is something on the face of the law which requires that reason should be excluded, it necessarily must have its weight and influence in determining the meaning of the law.

[3] There are two things which must be admitted in arriving at a correct determination of this controversy: One is that the Legislature ought not to be said to have intended a law to have application to a situation where it would not be possible to apply it; and the other is that literal effect cannot be given to this statute in all instances which arise between a husband and wife amicably and jointly presiding over a family. It reads that the income from her real estate is her property, and its use or disposal by the husband does not make it his; and plaintiff has cited us many cases where the husband has attempted to convert the wife's note or other personality by transferring same to others without her express written consent, in which it is held that it would remain hers and might be recovered from the transferee. McGuire v. Allen, 108 Mo. 403, 18 S. W. 282; Hurt v. Cook, 151 Mo. 416, 52 S. W. 396; McKee v. Downing, 224 Mo. 115, 124 S. W. 7; Egger v. Egger, 225 Mo. 116, 123 S. W. 928, 135 Am. St. Rep. 566; Moeckel v. Helm, 46 Mo. App. 340; Nunn v. Carroll, 83 Mo. App. 135.

But those cases do not present the situation of the parties to this controversy; nor do any others which plaintiff has cited. Here the husband and wife lived together in domestic peace and contentment, and the rents of the farm were collected and disposed of by him; he supporting and providing for the family, with no thought by either of a debtor and creditor relationship. The bread upon the table may be made of the wheat or corn which the husband has gotten as rent from the wife's farm. He eats it, and thereby uses and consumes the "income and profits" of her land. Must he have her express written consent in writing? Plaintiff's position is that no other kind will destroy the wife's right of property. Husband, wife, and family, at her verbal request, visit a neighboring town and enjoy its entertainments. He has used rent money of her land for expenses, including that of himself and the children. Should he have gotten her written consent expressly directing how this was to be done? Endless illustrations could be given, showing the literal terms of the statute cannot be applied to all of the conditions which do necessarily attend harmonious marital life.

Authorities in other states support this statement, though their statutes are not, in all respects, like ours. Most of them secure to the wife a separate estate, with its income free from the claim of her husband, in much the same manner ours does. The only one we have been cited to, containing a restriction practically like ours on the mode of acquisition of such property by the husband, is that of Pennsylvania. The statute of New York secured to the wife, as her separate property, her real estate "and the rents, issues and profits thereof, in the same manner and with like effect as if she were unmarried, and the same shall not be subject to the disposal of her husband, nor be liable for his debts." In that state, where the wife without objection permitted the husband to use rents of her real estate partly, at least, in support of the family, as if his own, it was held she could not afterwards compel him to account to her. Smith v. Smith, 125 N. Y. 224, 229, 26 N. E. 259. In Indiana it is held that where she is living in harmony with her husband, and allows him to use and dispose of the income of her property, as distinguished from the property itself, and thereby encouraging him to live in manner and style more expensive, she cannot, after his death, set up a claim thereto and perhaps impoverish his estate. Bristor v. Bristor, 93 Ind. 281.

[4] As stated above, our statute (section 8309) reads that the husband's use and disposal of the rents and income of his wife's separate property is required to be by her express written consent. At the same time, other parts of the statute should have influence in the construction of that particular part. The wife may now contract with the husband as if sole (Rice v. Sally, 176 Mo. 107, 75 S. W. 398), and the rents and income from her separate estate are liable for support of the family (sections 8308, 8309, R. S. 1909). If she, while living amicably with her husband, in joint care of the family and jointly interested in its well-being, foregoes her privilege of exacting a contract from him to repay her the income of her property, which she knows he is collecting, and which she is necessarily enjoying, directly or indirectly, should she be permitted, after a long series of years of peaceful married life, and after his death, to set up a claim, which no limitation could bar, it would work a great wrong. McGlinsey's Appeal, 14 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 64.

An Iowa statute secures to the wife her separate property and its income, and, like our statute, permits her to maintain an action against the husband who has taken it to himself. Another statute, like ours, makes her property liable for the support of the family. The Supreme Court of that state disallowed her claim, presented after his death, for using a part of the money arising from the collection of drafts. After referring to these sections of the statute, the court said: "These two sections are contained in the same chapter of the Code, and as they relate to the same subject-matter they must be construed together. Under the latter section the property of both husband and wife can be compulsorily made liable for the expenses of the family and the education of the children. Without doubt, we think, the same thing may be accomplished by voluntary action. If, therefore, a wife devotes her property to such purposes, or knows it is being done by her husband, and makes no objection, she does not thereby become the creditor of her husband, because she has only discharged a legal obligation resting on her, as well as her husband, and the latter did not agree or promise he would recompense her for so doing. Broad as section 2204 may seem to be, it should not be construed so as to include property which a wife knows is being applied from day to day through a period of years to the discharge of a legal obligation resting on her equally with her husband. Her consent that it should be so applied must be presumed, and if she desires to hold her husband liable for such property at some future day she should obtain his obligation or promise to pay. This much, at least, is required before she can become the creditor of her husband under the circumstances of this case." Courtright v. Courtright, 53 Iowa, 57, 4 N. W. 824.

Though our statute requires the wife's written consent, we, with defendant's counsel, have thought proper to investigate the views of courts in jurisdictions which have not such restrictive statute, with a view to a better understanding of the decisions in our own courts to which we will now refer. In Bank v. Winn, 132 Mo. 80, 90, 33 S. W. 457, where creditors were claiming that a conveyance from husband to wife to secure her for money used by him with her acquiescence, which she had inherited, was fraudulent, there was evidence tending to show that the land conveyed was of greater value than his debt to the wife. In order to increase the debt, the wife contended she was entitled to interest. But, notwithstanding there was no written consent, the court held that, in the absence of an agreement by the husband to pay interest, none was chargeable, and, as was done by the Supreme Court of Iowa, cited the common liability of the wife with the husband to aid in support of the family, as provided by our statute above cited.

Another case (Donovan v. Griffith, 215 Mo. 149, 169, 114 S. W. 621, 20 L. R. A. [N. S.] 825, 128 Am. St. Rep. 458, 15 Ann. Cas. 724), decided by our Supreme Court as late as 1908, was where the heirs of the deceased wife sought to have the surviving husband declared a trustee in certain lands the title to which was in his name, and certain other lands the title to which was in the joint names of the husband and the deceased wife. The question arose whether the husband should be charged with rents collected and disposed of by him. The court held that he should not be. We cannot see how this plaintiff can escape the controlling authority of that case. The court stated that "it must not be overlooked that he and his wife were living together, both of whom doubtless enjoyed the benefits and products of such land. There is an entire absence of any dispute while they were living together as husband and wife, up to the time of her death, as to the control of the premises, or as to whom the rents should be paid." The court then refers to the right of the wife to have contracted with the husband, if she had desired to keep her claim on the rents she knew he was using, and stated that the law would not favor the implication of a contract where they were living together in harmony and enjoying the products of the land in a manner satisfactory to themselves.

Besides these cases from our Supreme Court, defendant's counsel have cited a like decision made by us in an opinion by Smith, P. J. Holt v. Colyer, 71 Mo. App. 280. In addition to these cases from our own courts, we find that the statute in Pennsylvania secured to the wife her property as her separate estate and contained this provision, viz.: "Nor shall such property be sold, conveyed, mortgaged, transferred, or in any manner encumbered by her husband, without her written consent first had and obtained and duly acknowledged," etc. It was held in Hauer's Estate, 140 Pa. 420, 21 Atl. 445, 23 Am. St. Rep. 245, that where the wife, living in harmony with the husband, with no thought of debtor and creditor relationship, permits him to receive and use as his own the rents of her separate property, she cannot at his death recover them, without proof of an understanding that he was to account for them. The court distinguished between using the principal or corpus of the wife's property and merely the interest or income of it.

[5] Plaintiff's counsel have sought to show that Donovan v. Griffith, supra, was inapplicable, for the reason stated that the husband and wife were tenants in common of the real estate, and by an entertaining argument, oral and written, it is maintained that one tenant in common is not liable to his cotenant for rents collected. It, however, will be observed that the court does not consider that feature of the case as in any way influencing its decision. Besides, while where there is an occupancy by one tenant in common, without demand of sharing by the other, the occupying tenant cannot be called to account for rents by the other, yet if one tenant rents the land and collects the rent, as in the Donovan Case, as to a part of the land, he will be held liable to the other. Bates v. Hamilton, 144 Mo. 1, 45 S. W. 641, 66 Am. St. Rep. 407.

Again, counsel seek to distinguish the Donovan Case by the assertion that it was dealing with an equitable separate estate, instead of a statutory separate estate involved in this case. We do not see where there is any difference, so far as concerns this question. Schouler, in his work on Domestic Relations (section 102), says that, in view of the sweeping character of the married woman's statutes, whatever distinction there is "becomes of comparatively little consequence." So a like statement is made by the court in Hauer's Estate, 140 Pa. loc. cit. 427, 21 Atl. 445, 23 Am. St. Rep. 245.

The result of the foregoing views is to reverse the judgment. All concur.

HARE v. SISTERS OF MERCY.

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. Nov. 18, 1912.)

1. WILLS (§ 673*)—TRUSTS—CREATION.

A will devised one-half of the testatrix's estate to certain Sisters of Mercy "for the support and maintenance" of a daughter of the testatrix during her life, and after the daughter's death "for the purpose to educate poor Catholic children." Held, that the testatrix did not incidentally state the motive which led her to make an absolute gift, but created an express trust by imposing an obligation for the support and maintenance of her daughter during her life.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 1582-1584; Dec. Dig. § 673.*]

2. CHARITIES (§ 45*)—CARE OF INDIVIDUALS—COMPENSATION—QUANTUM MERUIT.

Where, under a will, a charitable organization was made trustee of an express trust for the support and maintenance of the testatrix's imbecile daughter, with the right to use all of said property not required for such purpose at its own discretion, and with no requirement for an accounting, and thereafter accepted the provisions of the trust and cared for the child for 19 years, it could not thereafter, without offering to return the trust moneys received, have payment upon a quantum meruit for the maintenance of the imbecile, even though the portion of the testatrix's estate devised them was not so productive as it was expected to be, on account of the invalidity of the will of the husband of the testatrix and father of the imbecile, as the parties cannot be placed in statu quo.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Charities, Cent. Dig. §§ 80, 81, 102-104; Dec. Dig. § 45.*]

3. TRUSTS (§ 312*)—SALE OF ESTATE—RECOVERY OF PURCHASE PRICE—INVALIDITY OF WILL.

Where a trustee had accepted the obligations of an express trust for the care of an imbecile child, created by will, and had been forced by the invalidity of the will of the husband of the testatrix to return the purchase price of property purchased from it, which was supposed to have passed to the testatrix, and thence to the trustee under the invalid will, it may recover such sum from the estate of the imbecile whose custody was undertaken.

McCulloch, C. J., dissenting.

Appeal from Sebastian Chancery Court; J. V. Bourland, Chancellor.

Action by the Sisters of Mercy against Ella Hare. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

This suit was brought by appellees to recover on a quantum meruit for the maintenance and support of Ella Hare, for 19 years, at the rate of $150 per month, and resulted in a judgment in their favor for $41,330.76, which the court declared a lien against her estate, and ordered the same sold in satisfaction thereof. From this judgment, the appeal comes.

The mother of Ella Hare, an imbecile, disposed of her estate in Sebastian county by will; the clauses of same which are necessary to be considered being as follows:

"I give, devise and bequeath to the Sisters of Mercy at Fort Smith, known as Saint Ann's Convent, one-half of all my estate, real and personal, after deducting the legacies and bequest mentioned in this, my last will and testament, for the support and maintenance of my daughter Ella Hare, during her life, and after the death of my said daughter, Ella Hare, I give, devise and bequeath to the said Sisters of Mercy, the said half of my estate, real and personal, for the purpose to educate poor Catholic children. I give, devise and bequeath to the pastor of the parish of the Church of the Immaculate Conception, at Fort Smith, in the county of Sebastian, state of Arkansas, half of all my estate, real and personal, to be used by the said pastor for the said purposes of helping to establish a school in said parish for the education of Catholic boys and for helping to educate young men of the parish for the priesthood."

John Hare, the husband of Mary A. Hare and the father of the imbecile, Ella Hare, died, possessed of a considerable estate, in 1883, making his wife the sole beneficiary in his will, and also his executrix.

Appellee, the Sisters of Mercy, is a corporation, a benevolent, religious body, associated in its work with the Church of the Immaculate Conception at Ft. Smith, Ark., and has been since its organization in 1860.

John and Mary A. Hare, deceased, were both members of said church. Mary A. Hare administered the estate of her said husband, and the administration was closed long before her death in 1893; and at the close thereof the probate court of Sebastian county made an order vesting the entire estate of John Hare in her. The estate consisted of real estate in and near to Ft. Smith, of the value of about $26,000 at the time of her death. Only a small part of it was improved, and Mary A. Hare had no estate at the time of his death, but received $2,000 insurance on his life, erected some buildings on the real estate formerly owned by him, and acquired other real estate of her own, part of which she improved; and her real estate, when she died, was worth $9,800 and her personal estate $1,347.87, and the demands against her estate amounted to $4,276.55. After her death her administrator was appointed executor of the estate of Ella Hare, and, upon the court's finding that she was mentally incompetent, directed the payment to the Sisters of Mercy of $25 per month for her care, which was done as long as the administrator lived. After his death Sister Aloysius, now Mother Superior of appellee, was appointed guardian, and acted as such until A. A. McDonald was appointed. During the administration of her estate, appellee received from the administrators funds arising from the sale of real estate which belonged to John Hare at his death, and other sources, in all, the sum of $6,778.66. The settlements of the administrator of Mary A. Hare's estate show that he paid appellee, on Ella Hare's account from 1893 to 1904, the sum of $3,174.93, and that it received from the sale of lot 7 block 564, Reserve addition to the city of Ft. Smith, which belonged to the estate of Mary A. Hare, $9,000. During the administration of the estate, all the real property owned by John Hare at the time of his death, except that part of same sold and conveyed to Tillman Shaw, was sold by Matt Gray, administrator of her estate, who, at the time, received from said estate, $6,955 in addition to the $3,000 for lands condemned belonging to said estate of John Hare; and, in addition to these sums, he received, as shown by annual statements, exclusive of the fourth annual statement, which was lost, as such administrator, $15,187.63, rent on the improved property belonging to the estate of John Hare and Mary A. Hare; and his accounts show the disposition of all funds collected by him from all sources. Appellee, claiming to be the owner thereof through the will of Mary A. Hare, conveyed to Tillman Shaw certain property (three lots in the city of Ft. Smith and a tract of land known as the Hare wagon yard, which had belonged to the estate of John Hare) for $21,000, one of which lots, valued at $9,000, was the property of Mary A. Hare at the time of her death. The $21,000 received was equally divided between appellee and the pastor of the Church of the Immaculate Conception of Ft. Smith, in accordance with the direction of the will of Mary A. Hare. After such conveyance A. A. McDonald was appointed guardian of Ella Hare, and brought suit to recover various pieces of land sold by the executrix of the estate of John Hare and the administrator of the estate of Mary A. Hare, and of said property which had belonged to the estate of said John Hare, which was sold to said Tillman Shaw, and recovered same; the will of said John Hare being declared invalid as to Ella Hare, his only surviving child, whose name was omitted therefrom. McDonald v. Shaw, 92 Ark. 15, 121 S. W. 935, 28 L. R. A. (N. S.) 657. The land recovered in said suits and now owned by said Ella Hare is of the reasonable value of $34,000, and consists, nearly all, of real estate in the city of Ft. Smith, a large part of which is unimproved. The Sisters of Mercy had to refund to Tillman Shaw $5,500, the half of the purchase price of said property, belonging to the estate of John Hare, sold by them to him.

They took charge of Ella Hare upon the death of her mother, and have cared for her properly and well until now. She is an imbecile, about 40 years of age at this time, can neither talk nor walk, and has about as much intelligence as a child of three or four years, and has had constant nursing and attention and been well provided for during all this time.

Upon the recovery of that portion of said estate which belonged to John Hare, they brought this suit, alleging: "That Mary A. Hare believed, at the time of making her will, that she was the owner of all of the property devised to her by John Hare, and intended by her will to so devise all of said property, and thought she had done so. That plaintiff, at the time it assumed charge of Ella Hare, in good faith, believed that, under the will of Mary A. Hare, it was to receive not only such property as in fact belonged to the estate of Mary A. Hare but also such property as belonged to the estate of John Hare, and which Mary A. Hare intended to devise to plaintiff under her said will. That, acting upon such belief, it assumed the charge of Ella Hare, and was willing to be bound by the terms of said will as it and the said Mary A. Hare understood said will to be, and give the said Ella Hare such attention as she might need as long as she lived." That because of the decree of the court, adjudging the will of John Hare invalid, and that Ella Hare was entitled to all of the real estate left by him at his death, "the consideration for the maintenance and support of said Ella Hare failed, and said plaintiff has not been paid for the support and maintenance of said Ella Hare for the time for which she has been taken care of, and that it was worth $150 per month, making a total of $31,500, for which judgment, with interest, was prayed."

The answer denied the allegations of the complaint, and that plaintiff had "received no adequate compensation for the maintenance and care bestowed upon her, and says that by its own admission in its complaint filed herein it has cared for her under and by virtue of the terms in the will of Mary A. Hare," and alleges, further, that the estates of both John Hare and Mary A. Hare have been wound up and finally settled, the administrators discharged, and that appellee has received "from the estate of Mary A. Hare all it could ever hope to receive; and its obligation to support, maintain, and care for this defendant as long as she lives was irrevocably fixed."

The court rendered judgment for $31,000, and declared same a lien against the property of Ella Hare and ordered it sold for satisfaction thereof. From this judgment, this appeal comes.

Winchester & Martin, of Ft. Smith, for appellant. Read & McDonough and Falconer, Youmans & Woods, all of Ft. Smith, for appellee.

KIRBY, J. (after stating the facts as above). It is not disputed that the estates of both John and Mary A. Hare have been wound up and finally settled and all the property belonging to both disposed of, except the said property sold to the said Tillman Shaw; nor can it be disputed that the Sisters of Mercy have realized out of said estate all they would have received, had the will of John Hare operated to convey his entire estate to Mary A. Hare, as they thought it did, except the $5,500 they had to refund to Tillman Shaw, by reason of their not being the owners of the one-half undivided interest they attempted to convey to him; and they say they would have been satisfied with this disposition of the property of these estates and willing to care for the imbecile, Ella Hare, throughout her life in consideration thereof, and took charge of her and the estate with the expectation of doing so.

It was the intention of Mary A. Hare, as plainly expressed in her will, to leave one-half of her estate, after the payment of her debts and the small bequests and legacies to appellees, the Sisters of Mercy, for the support and maintenance of her daughter, Ella Hare, during her life, and thereafter to said Sisters of Mercy, to be used in educating poor Catholic children. It was, doubtless, also, John Hare's intention to leave all of his estate to his wife, Mary A. Hare, in accordance with his will, which was invalid under the law, as against Ella Hare, his only child; her name having been omitted therefrom. It may be, and doubtless is, true that the Sisters of Mercy believed that the will of Mary A. Hare conveyed, not only her own estate, but also all the estate that had formerly belonged to her husband, and was attempted by him to be devised to her, and, so believing, they took charge of Ella Hare under the provisions of the will, and have since furnished her care, maintenance, and support. The will of John Hare was inoperative to convey his estate to Mary A. Hare, and some of it has been recovered by Ella Hare; and the Sisters of Mercy have been required to refund $5,500, that portion of the purchase money received by them from the sale of the one-half undivided interest of certain of his said property which they sold and attempted to convey, claiming to be the owner thereof, under the will of Mary A. Hare. On that account they claim that the consideration for their taking charge of Ella Hare and furnishing her maintenance and support, under the provisions of her mother's will, has failed, and that they are entitled to pay for the reasonable value of the care, maintenance, and support so furnished to Ella Hare for the past 19 years.

[1] It is manifest from the provisions of the will that Mary A. Hare was not incidentally stating the motive which led her to make an absolute gift of the property to the Sisters of Mercy, but intended, as clearly expressed, to impose an obligation for the support and maintenance of her imbecile daughter throughout her life, and an express trust was thereby created. Bloom v. Strauss, 78 Ark. 57, 84 S. W. 511.

[2] It was a gift in trust, with the right upon the part of the trustee to use all of said property, not required for the maintenance and support of said child, at their own discretion, and without accounting therefor; and they accepted said trust. It is undisputed that they have received from the two estates of the parents of this imbecile ward the sum of $16,500, which they have not returned. It would be manifestly unfair and unjust now to permit them to repudiate the obligation and the trust, and recover upon a quantum meruit for services already rendered and maintenance furnished a sum more than sufficient to consume the entire estate belonging to said imbecile, with no corresponding obligation on their part to maintain, support, and care for her in the future, as the decree rendered below does, thus defeating the obvious purpose of the testator and leaving entirely without protection for the remainder of her life the imbecile ward, Ella Hare, while permitting the consumption of all the remaining estates of both her father and mother by the trustee, who expected, on accepting the trust and taking charge of her, to care for, maintain, and support the said Ella Hare throughout her whole life for the one-half of said estates, which they understood was devised to them for that purpose. It is true, as urged, that the imbecile has been as well cared for by them as she could have been by any one, and that it was the intention of her father to leave all of his estate to her mother, and of her mother to leave all of her estate to the church and appellee, except the few small legacies provided for,

for her care and support during her lifetime and the church's benefit thereafter; but it does not follow, as insisted, that it would be only equitable that they should have what they thought they were going to receive, and what their testator intended to give, and that they would receive nothing more if the judgment of the lower court was affirmed.

[3] The parties cannot be placed in statu quo, and the majority of the court have concluded that, since they have expressed a willingness to carry out the purpose of the trust and care for and maintain said Ella Hare for life, under the provisions of the will, if they had received what they thought they were going to get, the court, in the administration of the principles of equity, will permit them to recover of the said Ella Hare the $5,500 they have had to refund of the purchase money of the lands sold to Tillman Shaw, afterwards recovered by Ella Hare, and charge the same as a lien against the property of Ella Hare. By so doing, they will be placed in the position they would have occupied had no suits been brought by Ella Hare for the recovery of the lands of her father's estate, and his will had, in law, as it attempted to do in fact, conveyed same to her mother.

They are entitled to a judgment for that amount, with interest from the time of its return, and the same to be declared a lien and enforced against her property, leaving the obligation of the trust created by the will, for her support throughout the remainder of her life, unimpaired.

The court should have rendered such judgment, and for the error of the decree as rendered the cause is reversed and remanded, with directions to enter a decree in accordance with this opinion.

MCCULLOCH, C. J. (dissenting). I concur fully in the conclusion of the majority that the limit of appellee's recovery must be the sum of $5,500, which is to be refunded to Tillman Shaw, being the price of the property sold to him. This restores appellee to the situation which it would have occupied if it had received the expected benefits under the will of Mary Hare; and it can justly claim no more.

I do not, however, agree that appellee ought to recover anything from the estate of Ella Hare. It voluntarily accepted the custody of the imbecile under the terms of Mary Hare's will, and if less property was realized than expected that was the mistake of appellee alone; and it is my opinion that no principle of equity will justify a claim against the estate of an imbecile because of disappointment in the quantity of property received under the will. Mary Hare did not attempt to devise any property, except that which she owned, so it cannot be said that there was a mutual mistake. I think there is no equity in the complaint, and that it should be dismissed.

WILKERSON v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. Nov. 25, 1912.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 447*)—PAROL EVIDENCE—CONVICTION OF CRIME.

Where a judgment entry, offered in evidence to show that a witness had been convicted of petit larceny, did not show such a conviction, it was not error to exclude the testimony of the justice of the peace rendering the judgment that he intended it as a conviction for petit larceny, since the entry, to be admissible, should have been corrected and amended, upon proper notice, at a hearing for that purpose.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1029-1031; Dec. Dig. § 447.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1036*)—RESERVATION OF GROUNDS OF REVIEW—NECESSITY OF OBJECTIONS.

Where accused neither objected to the testimony of a witness, nor moved that it be excluded from the jury, he could not complain thereof on appeal, even if the court erred in excluding the evidence offered to show the conviction of such witness for petit larceny.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2639-2641; Dec. Dig. § 1036.*]

3. HOMICIDE (§ 254*) — EVIDENCE — SUFFICIENCY.

On a trial for homicide, evidence held sufficient to support a conviction for murder in the second degree.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 533-538; Dec. Dig. § 254.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Lafayette County; Jacob M. Carter, Judge.

Nick Wilkerson was convicted of murder in the second degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

The indictment charged appellant with the crime of murder in the first degree, alleging that he "did unlawfully, willfully, feloniously, and of his malice aforethought, and of premeditation and deliberation, kill and murder one Amanda Turner by then and there striking, beating, and cutting her with a certain axe," etc. The indictment was sufficient.

There was proof tending to show that on the morning of the killing the appellant sold Amanda Turner a pocketbook and when she placed her money in the pocketbook the appellant handled some of it. He had in his hands a $5 gold piece, and said that he used to have one, and if he ever got another one he would keep it. Amanda Turner also had some silver and greenbacks. She took the money out of her stocking and put it in the pocketbook and put the pocketbook down in her bosom.

Without going into details, the testimony tended to show that the appellant had the opportunity to commit the crime. He was seen in the vicinity of Amanda Turner's house the morning she was killed, and was also seen in the vicinity shortly after the killing. Amanda Turner was murdered by some one cutting her in the head with an axe. The axe was found with blood on it, under the house, and the cuts on her head and face indicated that the killing was done with an axe. When she was found, one stocking was pulled down. It was shown that she carried her pocketbook in her stocking.

The testimony tended to show that the motive for the crime was robbery. It was shown that the appellant, on the day of the killing, and some time afterwards, in company with a companion, went to the house where Amanda Turner was killed, and he was heard to remark that the officers had a writ for him, and he was going to leave. He left the community, and was arrested, some time after the killing, in Texas.

Tom Lucas, who was in jail with appellant, testified that appellant said he was "sitting on the bed making a cigarette, and told her [Amanda Turner] to give him the pocketbook, as he wanted to put $5 in it. Said she finally laid down on the bed, and Bill brought him the axe, and he hit the woman and then threw the axe under the house, and kicked it and cut his shoe. After that he pulled my shoe one night and woke me and asked me if I was going to appear against him, and I told him I didn't know, and he fell over and cried and prayed."

It was shown that appellant's shoe had holes cut in it. He said one of the holes was cut because the lining hurt his foot. The other hole he had not noticed before his testimony was given.

A witness by the name of Mark Hanna Washington testified as follows: "The defendant did not sleep in the cell with me and Tom Lucas. I saw him and Lucas talking one night and also one day. They were whispering. One night defendant pulled my foot and then pulled Tom's and Tom went down to the cell and they talked. I could hear what they said, and he told Tom he did not want him to go and testify against him as to what he told him about the woman; and Tom said he wouldn't."

In the examination of this witness the following occurred: "Q. Have you ever been arrested and tried and convicted for stealing? A. No, sir. Q. Were you ever arrested and carried before Squire W. L. Nance, justice of the peace, charged with having stolen Mr. Austin's watch, and fined $5? A. Yes, sir. Q. What did you say you hadn't been arrested for? A. I had not just for stealing — Q. Didn't you say you was fined $5? A. Yes, sir. Q. What else did they do to you? A. They never done nothing to me. Q. Was there a jail sentence against you? A. No, sir. Q. Well, wasn't you put in jail? A. They just put me in jail, and Mamma paid my fine—$5."

At this juncture appellant's counsel offered to introduce page 453 of Justice W. L. Nance's record. The court stated, "That judgment doesn't show that he was convicted of petit larceny." Appellant's counsel then asked permission to introduce Justice Nance and let him amend his record to show that the judgment was intended by him to apply as petit larceny. The court stated as follows: "I don't think he could amend it any by showing what it means. The court judicially knows that the lowest fine for petit larceny is $10, and some time in jail. There is no judgment on that record showing that he was convicted of the crime of petit larceny." The court therefore refused to allow the testimony to be introduced.

The appellant was convicted of murder in the second degree and sentenced to 10 years in the penitentiary.

Hal. L. Norwood, Atty. Gen., and Wm. H. Rector, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

WOOD, J. (after stating the facts as above). The instructions of the court applicable to the facts in evidence were correct, and we deem it unnecessary to set them out and comment upon them, as they only involve familiar principles of law that have been often announced by this court.

[1, 2] There was no error in the ruling of the court in refusing to permit appellant to show by the justice of the peace that he intended by the page of his record which appellant offered to introduce to enter a judgment against the witness Mark Hanna Washington for petit larceny. The record shows that the lower court examined the offered page and found that it did not show that the witness Washington was convicted of petit larceny. This being true, it was not error for the court to refuse to allow the appellant to vary or contradict this record by the testimony of the justice, to the effect that he intended the judgment entry as a conviction for petit larceny. If the justice made a mistake in his judgment entry, it should have been corrected and amended, upon proper notice, at a hearing for that purpose, and after being so amended could then have been introduced in evidence. Moreover, the appellant, after excepting to the court's action in refusing to allow the docket to be introduced, permitted the witness Washington to testify without further objection, and without moving the court to exclude his evidence from the jury. Appellant therefore cannot complain of the testimony of the witness Washington.

[3] The testimony shows a most horrible murder, and appellant, if guilty at all, was guilty of murder in the first degree. The testimony was amply sufficient to sustain a verdict for that degree, and he cannot complain because the jury found him guilty of a lower offense.

Affirmed.

MITCHELL v. CHICAGO, R. I. & P. RY. CO.
(Supreme Court of Arkansas. Nov. 25, 1912.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 278*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—NEGLIGENCE—EVIDENCE.

A brakeman on a work train was sent out to flag trains, and he crawled under a gondola car on a storage track while watching for approaching trains. The work train backed in on the storage track and struck the car, fatally injuring the brakeman. There was nothing to show that the trainmen were in a position to see the brakeman while under the car, or that any of them did see him prior to the accident. Held, not to show actionable negligence.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 240*)—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—EVIDENCE.

The brakeman was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law; for, though he could assume that proper signals would be given when the work train approached, he was not absolved from the duty of looking out for approaching trains, in view of the fact that he had put himself in a position where his peril could not be easily discovered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 751-756; Dec. Dig. § 240.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Lonoke County; Eugene Lankford, Judge.

Action by Laura H. Mitchell, administratrix of Frank Mitchell, deceased, against the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railway Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. H. Harrod, of Little Rock, for appellant. Thos. S. Buzbee and John T. Hicks, both of Little Rock, for appellee.

McCULLOCH, C. J. Deceased, Frank Mitchell, was a brakeman in the service of appellee, and was run over by a train and injured, from which injuries death ensued; and the administratrix of his estate instituted this action to recover damages for the benefit of the estate on account of pain and suffering endured by deceased, and for the benefit of the next of kin for damages which resulted from the loss of contributions.

Mitchell was brakeman on a construction train engaged, at the time of his injury, in cleaning out ditches along the track in and near Forrest City, Ark. The injury occurred shortly after the noon hour on May 25, 1909, while the train was in the yards at Forrest City. The work train was on the main track while the crew of men were at work cleaning the ditches, and it was necessary to put out a flagman toward the east to protect the train and crew from trains approaching from that direction. This duty was assigned to deceased, Mitchell, and he proceeded to a distance of about 500 feet east of the work train, and remained there several hours. On a storage track, running parallel with the main track and on the north side of it, was a loaded dirt car, called a gondola car. This car had been set over on that track before that, probably the day before; and the testimony shows that Mitchell crawled under the side of that car, in order to get in the shade while he was on watch for approaching trains. When the time came to quit work at noon, the signal was given for moving the work train, and it moved up to the switch and backed in on the storage track, striking the gondola car under which Mitchell was resting, and both of his legs were run over and cut off. He was sitting under the car between the rails, facing the south, with his feet extending over the south rail. His position was between the front and rear trucks; and the evidence shows that the journal boxes extended out an unusual distance on this particular kind of car and obscured his protruding legs more than would have been done if it had been a car of the ordinary make. He was seen in this position by a brakeman just a few moments before the train backed in; but the first that was known of his injury was when the car was moved and his screams were heard by the men in charge of the train. Several loaded dirt cars were attached to the backing engine; and the testimony establishes the fact that no lookout was kept from the end of these cars as they were backed upon the storage track.

The trial judge instructed the jury to return a verdict in favor of the defendant, and the only question on this appeal is whether or not there was error in that ruling; it being contended by appellant that there was enough testimony to go to the jury on the question of the negligence of appellee's servants in failing to give signals or keep a proper lookout, and also on the question of contributory negligence on the part of deceased. We are of the opinion that the action of the trial court in giving the peremptory instruction was correct, and that the judgment below should be affirmed.

[1] There is no evidence sufficient to warrant a finding that the men in charge of the train saw deceased in his perilous position, so as to be chargeable with negligence in failing to protect him after observing him in that position. No witness testified that any of the men on the train were in a position to have seen deceased while he was under the dirt car. There is one witness who testified that the fireman, immediately after the injury, exclaimed, "I think we have pinched Mitchell back there;" but that was after Mitchell's screams were heard; and it is not sufficient to establish the fact that the fireman, or any other man on the train, saw Mitchell under the car before it was moved. Conceding that it was possible for men on the engine to have seen Mitchell's legs protruding from underneath the car, yet there is no evidence that any of the men did see them.

[2] Now, Mitchell's conduct in crawling under the car and remaining thereunder

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

without taking notice of the approaching train backing in upon the sidetrack is such that different minds cannot draw different conclusions as to it being an act of negligence; and this bars a recovery of damages, regardless of any negligent act of the trainmen in failing to give signals or in failing to keep a lookout. Deceased was put there for the purpose of guarding the train; but he knew that any position on the track was a place of danger, and that it was particularly dangerous to crawl beneath a car. While he had a right to assume that proper signals would be given when the train approached, yet this did not absolve him from the duty of taking heed for his own safety and looking out for the approach of a train on the storage track. He was not misled in any way by the circumstances. On the contrary, the course of the work there was sufficient to put him upon notice that there was a probability that when the men ceased work at noon, and the cars were loaded with dirt, they would be backed onto the storage track. Be that, however, as it may, the conclusion is irresistible that when he crawled under the car and put himself in a position where his peril could not be easily discovered, and thereafter failed to look out for approaching trains on that track, he was guilty of an act of negligence which, notwithstanding any negligence on the part of the other trainmen, bars a recovery of damages on account of the injury.

The judgment of the circuit court is therefore affirmed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. §§ 320-325; Dec. Dig. § 123.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Lawrence County; R. E. Jeffery, Judge.

Action by Earl Thomas against W. T. Jackson. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Appellee brought suit against appellant for a balance of $329.21 due upon a contract for the building of a bungalow in Hoxie, and for foreclosure of a mechanic's lien. Appellant filed answer and cross-complaint, denying any indebtedness, admitted the payment of $450 on the contract price for use in the purchase of materials and paying of laborers, denied that appellant complied with his contract, claimed damages for defective and unworkmanlike construction and bad materials, alleged that it would cost the sum of $600 more than the balance claimed under the contract to put the house in such condition as appellee agreed to construct it, and that it was not constructed in substantial compliance with the contract, and that he was damaged in the said sum of $450 already expended thereon. The facts are, substantially, that the written contract was entered into between the parties for the construction of a one-story bungalow in the town of Hoxie, appellee agreeing to furnish materials and build the house for $743.46; the house to be built according to a certain plan drawn by appellant, with the interior and exterior arrangements as shown in the plan and certain photographs, the contract not including the canvassing, papering, and painting of the house. "Said plan includes one fireplace, chimney exposed inside, and is to be built outside of red pressed brick." Appellee testified that he was to be paid certain amounts for extras, as set out; the whole amount of the contract price, with extras, being $781.46. He acknowledged receipt of $450, and also a credit of $2.25 for broken glass, and claimed a balance due of $329.21.

The appellant moved into the house with his family at about the time appellee was constructing the chimney, and, discovering that he was not going to use a certain kind of brick made in Coffeyville, refused to permit him to build the chimney, notwithstanding appellee was insisting on doing so and using a red pressed brick purchased from Jonesboro, which he claimed and stated was in accordance with the terms of the contract, and also that he was unable to get the Coffeyville brick because of the excessive freight rate. Appellant testified that the house was not placed upon a level foundation; that the floors sagged; that one wall was 12 inches lower than the opposite wall; that the window and door casings were not square; and that one side of the roof was longer than the other—the comb not being in the center of the house—and that it would cost more to build the house properly in accordance with the contract than the original contract price; and that it had cost him $75 to construct the chimney, which he refused to let appellee build, because he was not going to use the Coffeyville brick therein. After the contract was entered into, appellee showed appellant a brick made in Coffeyville, which was being used at the Baptist Church, and told him he thought he could get the brick to build the chimney from the church, and would use that kind if he could procure it. He was unable to get this brick and was using another red pressed brick, which he claimed was in accordance with the contract, when appellant refused to permit him to proceed further with the construction.

Many witnesses testified as to the kind and character of the work, and their testimony is conflicting as to whether or not it was done in a neat and workmanlike manner. They also testified as to the cost of remedying certain defects, and appellee testified that the chimney could have been finished with materials in accordance with the terms of the contract already placed upon the ground by him with two or three days more work.

The court refused to give each of the five instructions requested by appellant, and gave six, none of which were objected or excepted to. The jury returned a verdict for appellee for $300, and from the judgment thereon this appeal comes.

Earl Thomas, pro se. Smith & Blackford, of Walnut Ridge, for appellee.

KIRBY, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] It is contended that the cause should be reversed for the failure to give said requested instructions; but we have examined same carefully, and the only two which correctly state the law were sufficiently covered by the instructions given by the court, none of which were excepted to, and no prejudice resulted from the refusal to give them.

[2] Appellant objected, it is true, to the giving of each of said instructions by the court, but he failed to preserve his exceptions by carrying them into his motion for a new trial as a ground therefor, and thereby waived the right to complain of error in the court's ruling thereon. St. L., I. M. & S. Ry. Co. v. Fayetteville, 75 Ark. 534, 87 S. W. 1174; Burris v. State, 73 Ark. 455, 84 S. W. 723; McCarroll v. Stafford, 24 Ark. 224; Ray v. Light, 34 Ark. 421. He likewise waived the right to complain of error in the admission and exclusion of evidence. Fourche River Lbr. Co. v. Bryant Lbr. Co., 97 Ark. 632, 135 S. W. 796; Railway v. Goset, 70 Ark. 427, 68 S. W. 879; Railway v. Deshong, 63 Ark. 443, 39 S. W. 260; Ince v. State, 77 Ark. 418, 88 S. W. 818; Allen v. State, 70 Ark. 337, 68 S. W. 28. It is undisputed that appellant moved into the building and occupied it with his family after it was constructed, and that he still continues to do so.

[3] When work has been done substantially in compliance with the terms of the contract, or there has been an acceptance of the work by the contractee, the contractor may, notwithstanding defects therein, recover the contract price, less the cost of correcting such defects. A substantial performance is all that is required to authorize a recovery of the contract price, less the additional cost of a literal compliance with the contract. Mitchell v. Caplinger, 97 Ark. 281, 133 S. W. 1032; Fitzgerald v. La Porte, 64 Ark. 34, 40 S. W. 261; Ark.-Mo. Zinc Co. v. Patterson, 79 Ark. 506, 96 S. W. 170; Harris v. Graham, 86 Ark. 570, 111 S. W. 984.

Appellee was entitled to recover on the contract upon a substantial performance of it, or an acceptance of the work by the contractee, notwithstanding defects therein, the contract price, less the cost of correcting such defects. The jury only allowed $29.21 credit to appellant upon his claim of defective and unfinished work, but the issues were fairly submitted to them by the instructions given, and they have found them in favor of the appellee upon conflicting testimony, and their verdict will not be disturbed.

Finding no prejudicial error in the record, the judgment is affirmed.

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1175*)—CONCLUSIONS OF FACT OF COURT OF CIVIL APPEALS—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Where the facts are undisputed, the Supreme Court on writ of error to review a judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals will not send the case back on the ground that the Court of Civil Appeals failed to announce conclusions of fact, as required by Rev. Civ. St. 1911, art. 1639.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4253; Dec. Dig. § 1175.*]

2. COUNTIES (§ 152*)—CONTRACTS—"DEBT."

A claim for commissions under a contract by which a county listed its school land with a broker for sale for a commission made payable out of the county funds is not a debt within Const. art. 11, § 7, forbidding the creation of a debt unless provision is made at the time for its payment, where the claim becomes due in the current year, and the county has ability by taxation to raise the fund for its payment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Cent. Dig. §§ 215-217; Dec. Dig. § 152.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 2, pp. 1864-1886; vol. 8, p. 7628.]

3. COUNTIES (§ 122*)—SCHOOL LANDS—SALE BY BROKER—COMPENSATION—CONTRACTS.

A contract by which a county listed school land with a broker for sale at $4 per acre net, with 5 per cent. interest from date of sale, payable annually or semiannually, and the price being payable 20 years from date of sale with option of the purchaser to pay after 10 years, fixes the minimum price for which a sale may be made, but does not mean that the school fund shall receive no more than that amount, and provides that the compensation shall be paid out of county funds, and, so construed, the contract is valid.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Cent. Dig. §§ 82, 136, 181, 182; Dec. Dig. § 122.*]

4. EVIDENCE (§§ 60, 65*)—PRESUMPTIONS—KNOWLEDGE OF LAW.

The court in construing a contract by which a county listed land with a broker for sale must presume that the county and the broker knew the law, and intended to obey it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 81, 85; Dec. Dig. §§ 60, 65.*]

5. CONTRACTS (§ 153*)—CONSTRUCTION—VALIDITY.

A contract, susceptible of two constructions, one of which will make it illegal and the other lawful, must be so construed as to make it legal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. § 734; Dec. Dig. § 153.*]

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Second Supreme Judicial District.

Action by C. P. Sandifer against Foard County. There was a judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals (134 S. W. 823) reversing a judgment for defendant, and defendant brings error. Affirmed and rendered.

G. W. Walthall, of Crowell, Stephens & Miller, of Ft. Worth, and Gregory, Batts & Brooks, of Austin, for plaintiff in error. W. D. Berry and F. P. McGhee, both of Vernon, and McGregor & Gaines, of Austin, for defendant in error.

BROWN, C. J. This suit was instituted in the district court to recover of said county reasonable compensation for selling the school lands of said county under this contract: "This order entered into the 13th day of February, 1909, by and between the commissioners' court in and for Foard county, Texas, parties of the first part, and C. P. Sandifer, of Foard county, Texas, party of the second part, witnesseth: That the parties of the first part have this day listed for exclusive sale with the party of the second part for a term of six months from date herewith the following described property, to wit: 17,712 acres of land the same being Foard county school lying and being situated in Bailey county, Texas, at and for the sum of $4.00 per acre with five per cent. interest from date payable annually or semiannually, said price being net to the county of Foard, state of Texas, and payable twenty years from date of sale with option to the purchaser to pay any part or all the principal at or on any interest paying period after ten years from date of sale. It is also understood and agreed that the sale of the above described land is to be made subject to a lease now on said land which expires on the 30th day of September, 1913. The party of the first part agrees to deed said land in subdivisions, provided the party of the second part thinks necessary to do so in disposing of the said land to the better advantage to the county." The agreement was entered upon the minutes of the county court of said county, and signed by the county judge and commissioners and by Sandifer. There is no complaint as to the regularity of the making of the agreement. Within a short time Sandifer sold the land to G. T. Oliver, 17,712 acres of free school land, for the sum of $119,556.00, with interest from April 14, 1909. The sale was duly consummated, and the land conveyed to Oliver. Sandifer claimed as his commission 5 per cent. on the amount the land sold for. The county resisted the recovery on two grounds, to wit: First. The contract created a debt upon the county and made no provision for its payment, which was in violation of section 7 of article 11 of the Constitution, which reads: "But no debt for any purpose shall ever be incurred in any manner by any city or county unless provision is made at the time of creating the same, for levying and collecting a sufficient tax to pay the interest thereon and provide at least two per cent. as a sinking fund; and the condemnation of the right of way for the erection of such works shall be fully provided for." Second. That the contract provided for payment out of the proceeds of the school land, which was in violation of the law. The district court gave judgment for the county, from which Sandifer appealed to the Court of Civil Appeals of the Second Supreme Judicial District, which reversed the judgment of the district court, and remanded the cause for another trial. The county applied for a writ of error to this court upon the ground that the decision of the Court of Civil Appeals practically settles the case, and the writ was granted upon that ground.

[1] Judge Ocle Speer, who wrote the opinion, correctly announced the law, but overlooked the requirements of article 1639, Revised Statutes 1911, and announced no conclusions of fact, which is very important to this court in reviewing the judgment. We will not send this case back, because the facts are practically undisputed. If they were not, it would be necessary to return the record for a compliance with the said article.

[2] We were inclined to hold that the terms of the order entered created a debt within the meaning of the section of the Constitution above copied. But we find in the statement of facts this evidence, which is not contradicted: "In making our levies and assessments, we generally figure as to about what amount we think will be necessary to pay the expenses of the county, and we make the levy so as to meet the expenses as estimated by us. We have never made a levy at the highest limit which we are authorized to levy. If we were to make the levy at the limit, that would place enough money in the general fund of the county to pay all the general running expenses of the county, and also pay the amount of commissions claimed by Mr. Sandifer in this suit." The contract required the sale to be made in six months by July 13, 1909. It was consummated before that time. The claim could have been provided for during the current year by a levy of a tax for that purpose. The power of the county to levy taxes had not been exhausted. It was necessary that the levy should have been made, and the test is, Did the county have sufficient power to pay the claim? There is no denial of that fact, which was proved, as was shown, by the evidence of Burk, the county judge of Foard county. In City of Corpus Christi v. Woessner, 58 Tex. 467, Judge Stayton said: "We are of the opinion that the issuance of warrants on current expenses of a city, which do not exceed the current revenue derived from taxation, permitted by law to be levied to meet current expenses, and such other revenue as a city may have from other sources than taxation, cannot be said to be the creation of a debt prohibited by law unless a special tax be levied to meet the interest and create a sinking fund. The evidence shows that the revenue of the city for the year 1879, if it had been applied to proper municipal purposes, would have been more than sufficient to meet the payment of the warrants sued upon, after paying all other current and proper expenses. And it further appears that in addition to the money raised by taxation, permitted by law to meet current expenses, the city has an income of $4,000 per year for many years to come from her wharf interests, and that from these two sources at the time of the trial of this cause there was a surplus in the treasury." We cite Terrell v. Dessaint, 71 Tex. 770, 9 S. W. 593; McNeal v. City of Waco, 89 Tex. 83, 33 S. W. 322; City of Cleburne v. Cleburne Water Co., 14 Tex. Civ. App. 229, 37 S. W. 655. In McNeal v. City of Waco, 89 Tex. 88, 33 S. W. 324, by his irresistible logic, Judge Denman reaches this conclusion: "We conclude that the word 'debt,' as used in the constitutional provisions above quoted, means any pecuniary obligation imposed by contract, except such as were at the date of the contract within the lawful and reasonable contemplation of the parties, to be satisfied out of the current revenues for the year or out of some fund then within the immediate control of the corporation." The commissions in this case were by law made payable out of the county fund. It became due in the current year, and there was ability in the county by taxation to raise the fund for its payment. The claim did not constitute a debt within the meaning of the Constitution.

[3] Plaintiff in error also asserts that the contract between the county and Sandifer bound the county to pay to Sandifer all of the proceeds of the sale in excess of $4 per acre, which was forbidden by law; the county being required to pay the cost of sale. The writer was inclined to that view of the contract, but upon further consideration of the facts and the able argument of counsel for defendant in error we conclude that the effect of the language, "at and for the sum of $4.00 per acre," etc., is to set the minimum price for which sale might be made at $4 per acre, and does not mean that the school fund should receive no more than that amount per acre. The law forbids the county to pay the cost of selling out of the school fund either in land or the proceeds of it.

[4] We must presume that both parties knew the law and intended to obey it. Tomlinson v. Hopkins County, 57 Tex. 575.

[5] It is a well-established rule of construction that language in a contract which is susceptible of two constructions, one of which would render the contract illegal, and the other would make it lawful, that contract which would conform the contract to the law must be adopted. Clark on Contracts, p. 593; Evans v. Pike, 118 U. S. 241, 6 Sup. Ct. 1090, 30 L. Ed. 234; Hobbs v. McLean, 117 U. S. 576, 6 Sup. Ct. 870, 29 L. Ed. 940. The rule of construction is stated by Clark thus: "Where a particular word, or the contract as a whole, is susceptible of two meanings, one of which will render the contract valid, and the other of which will render it invalid, the former will be adopted so as to uphold the contract. Thus, where a document was expressed to be given 'in consideration of your being in advance' to a person, and it was argued that this showed a past consideration which would not support the promise, the court held that the words 'being in advance' might mean a prospective advance, and be equivalent to 'in consideration of your being in advance,' or 'on condition of your being in advance.' So, also, where a contract is susceptible of two constructions, one of which will render it unlawful as being in violation of law or contrary to public policy, that construction which will render it lawful will be adopted."

The fact that the land was to be sold on credit for a time not less than ten years, and no provision made for any cash payment, excludes the construction that compensation was to be made from the proceeds of the sale. See authorities last above cited. The construction which makes the contract legal is most consistent with the facts, and must be adopted. If the commissioners' court had in plain words agreed to pay Sandifer a part of the proceeds of the sale of school land, that body would have violated the law. We must presume that a violation was not intended. The decisions of this court which were made before this contract was made are so plain that they could not have been misunderstood, if known to the parties, and the law conclusively presumes that they were known. Tomlinson v. Hopkins, supra. We conclude that the contract between the parties limited the minimum price to $4 per acre, and that the compensation to be paid was not fixed by the terms of the written contract. The compensation for making the sale was fixed by law at a reasonable sum, considering all of the facts. Quite a number of witnesses testified that 5 per cent. on the gross sale was a customary and reasonable consideration for services rendered by Sandifer to Foard county, and there does not appear to be a conflict on that issue. Plaintiff in error has requested this court to take jurisdiction because the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals practically settles the case, which calls upon this court to enter final judgment.

It is therefore ordered that the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals reversing the judgment of the district court is approved; and it is further ordered that the defendant, C. P. Sandifer, have and recover of and from Foard county the sum of $5,977.80, together with all costs of suit.

ANSLEY REALTY CO. v. POPE et al.

(Supreme Court of Texas. Dec. 4, 1912.)

1. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 32*)—CONTRACTS ENFORCEABLE.

An executory contract to sell land as an agent is not subject to specific performance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. §§ 89-99; Dec. Dig. § 32.*]

2. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 6*)—NATURE OF REMEDY—MUTUALITY.

The right to specific performance is in its very nature mutual, and one party cannot be entitled to that right under a contract without the same right extending to the other.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. §§ 9-11; Dec. Dig. § 6.*]

3. BROKERS (§ 52*)—VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 3*)—RIGHT TO COMMISSION—NATURE OF CONTRACT PROCURED.

Where defendants, owners of land, entered into a contract reciting that they gave to the parties of the second part the exclusive sale of land for 90 days, agreeing to deed any or all of it to the parties of the second part or to any person to whom they might sell, and that, should there be any land remaining after, the expiration of the time specified, then the parties of the second part should buy the same for themselves, the agreement was one for the sale of land and not for a mere agency; the parties of the second part being bound at all events to take the entire land if they did not sell it, and both they and defendants being entitled to specific performance, and hence brokers who brought the parties together were entitled to commissions as for a sale of land.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Brokers, Cent. Dig. § 73; Dec. Dig. § 52.* Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. § 3; Dec. Dig. § 3.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1052*)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR.

In an action by brokers to recover compensation for negotiating a sale of land, where it appeared that they introduced the parties who consummated the sale, the admission of testimony by one of such brokers that his firm sold the land in controversy was harmless, where that issue was not submitted to the jury, and did not affect the right of recovery.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4171-4177; Dec. Dig. § 1052.*]

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Second Supreme Judicial District.

Action by the Ansley Realty Company against J. B. Pope and A. M. Smith. A judgment for plaintiff was reversed by the Court of Civil Appeals (135 S. W. 1103), and plaintiff brings error. Judgment of Court of Civil Appeals reversed, and that of the district court affirmed.

H. B. White, of Clarendon, W. B. Chauncey, of Dalhart, and Gregory, Batts & Brooks, of Austin, for plaintiff in error. A. T. Cole, of Clarendon, and Stephens & Miller, of Ft. Worth, for defendants in error.

BROWN, C. J. Plaintiff in error, hereafter called the Realty Company, sued J. B. Pope and A. M. Smith, hereinafter called defendants, in the district court of Donley county, seeking to recover commissions upon certain lands sold by defendants to the Monarch Land & Loan Company, who were procured as purchasers by plaintiff under a contract with defendants for the sale of the land. The facts were not stated by Judge Dunklin, as provided for by article 1639 of the Revised Civil Statutes of 1911; but we will be able to decide the case upon the record.

At a date prior to the 14th day of August, 1907, by oral contract, defendants employed the Realty Company to sell eight sections of land situated in Moore county, four sections of patented land and four sections of school land, in the aggregate 5,120 acres, at the price of $8 per acre for the patented land and $7.50 per acre for the school land, the compensation to be 5 per cent. on the gross sales. The Monarch Land & Loan Company were engaged in the town of Amarillo in buying and selling land, and had an agent in Moore county who learned of the fact that the Ansley Realty Company had the agency to sell the land in question, and through its agent, McFarland, the Monarch Company and the Realty Company were brought into contact, and the sale of the land and the terms thereof were discussed, and the agent of the Monarch Company concluded to buy the land, but did not close the trade, but went to Pope and Smith to try for better terms. The price was satisfactory. The purchasing agent of the Monarch Company told Pope and Smith of their having applied to plaintiff to purchase, and what had occurred. After their consultation this contract was entered into:

"The State of Texas, County of Donley.

"This contract made and entered into by and between A. M. Smith and J. B. Pope, of Donley county, Texas, as parties of the first part, and the Monarch Land & Loan Co., of Amarillo, Texas, as parties of the second part, witnesseth: That the parties of the first part herein give to the parties of the second part, the exclusive sale of the following described land, to wit: Sections 302, 303, 304, 327, 328, 329, 330, 345, block 44, Moore county, Texas, for ninety days from the twenty-first day of August, providing a sale now pending is not closed on or before that date. The price agreed upon and for which the parties of the first part agree to sell is $8.00 per acre, straight through, school and patented, and parties of the first part further agree to deed any or all of the above described land, not less than 160 acres in one deed to the Monarch Land & Loan Co. or any person or persons they may sell to for whatever price the said Monarch Land & Loan Co. may sell for, and all excess above the aforesaid price shall be retained by the party of the second part as their commission. The terms shall be forty per cent. cash payment, the balance one and two and three years at 8 per cent. interest. The deferred payments shall be evidenced by vendor lien notes on the above described land. The party of the first part further agrees to furnish each purchaser with a warranty deed and abstract showing good and perfect title. The parties of the second part agree to sell all of the eight sections as per contract, but should there be any remaining after the expiration of the time specified, then the parties of the second part further agree to buy the same themselves. Signed in duplicate this 14th day of August, 1907. A. M. Smith. [Seal.] J. B. Pope. [Seal.] Monarch Land & Loan Co. [Seal.] S. F. Hiatt, Pres. [Seal.]"

Upon the back of the contract was indorsed the following: "The terms of the contract on the reverse side hereof are hereby extended as to time to and including January 21, 1908, and it is expressly agreed that all supposed claims or claims of either party hereto growing out of any supposed breach or breach of said contract by either party up to this date are hereby waived. Witness our hands at Clarendon, Texas, this 18th day of November, 1907. Monarch Land & Loan Co., by S. F. Hiatt, President, A. M. Smith, J. B. Pope."

The Monarch Company sold all of the land except one tract, which was deeded to it by Smith and Pope. Plaintiff alleged that Smith and Pope had employed it to sell the same land at $8 per acre, and that it secured the Monarch Company as purchaser for all of the said land at the price named, and that the said Monarch Company did purchase from defendants all of the land at $8 per acre. The defendants claimed that the transaction between them and the Monarch Company was not a sale, but an employment of the Monarch Company as agent to sell the same land.

These propositions are essential to the right of plaintiff to recover: (1) That Smith and Pope sold the land to the Monarch Company. (2) That the Monarch Company was procured by the Realty Company as purchaser of the land.

[1-3] Counsel for defendants in error state the issues correctly thus: "Everybody conceded that there was a trade consummated between Pope and Smith and the Monarch Land & Loan Company on the 14th of August, 1907, just as Dan Ansley stated. The controverted question was as to whether this trade was one for the sale of the land, or for the exclusive agency for its sale. If the former, the plaintiffs were entitled to win; if the latter, the defendants were entitled to win." Whether the transaction was a sale or the creation of an agency must, in this case, be determined by the terms of the contract itself. The character of the instrument can best be determined by ascertaining the remedy to which each party would be entitled in case of refusal of the other to comply. If it was an executory contract of sale of the land by Pope and Smith to the Monarch Company, either party could enforce specific performance of it. If it were an employment of the Monarch Company as agent to sell the land, then specific performance could not be had. Chinnock v. Sainsbury, 30 L. J. (N. S.) 409. To apply this test, we will assume that the Monarch Company declined to sell any of the land as agent, electing to receive a deed for the whole at $8 per acre, but Pope and Smith refused to convey. The contract contains this language: "And parties of the first part further agree to deed any or all of the above-described land, not less than 160 acres in one deed to the Monarch Land & Loan Company, or any person or persons they may sell to for whatever price the said Monarch Land & Loan Co. may sell for." Upon compliance with the terms of the agreement—that is, payment of 40 per cent. cash and executing notes for the remainder as prescribed—the Monarch Company could have maintained an action for specific performance of the contract. But, to give the instrument the character of a sale, the right to specific performance must be mutual. Waterman on Specific Performance, pp. 260, 261; Pomeroy on Specific Performance, p. 6, from which we quote, as follows: "The right to a specific performance, if it exists at all, is, and necessarily must be, mutual; in other words, it is and must be held, and be capable of being enjoyed, alike by both parties in every agreement to which the jurisdiction extends." By the terms quoted the Monarch Company could have demanded the conveyance to it of all of the land. In the same contract this language occurs: "The parties of the second part agree to sell all of the eight sections as per contract, but, should there be any remaining after the expiration of the time specified, then the parties of the second part further agree to buy the same themselves." This gave to Pope and Smith the right at the end of the time limiting sale to have specific performance of the contract by conveying all of the land unsold to the Monarch Company at the price of $8 per acre. The mutual right of specific performance by conveyance and payment was secured by the terms of the instrument; that is, each had the right upon performance of his or its agreement to compel performance by the other party. The plain meaning of the instrument is that Pope and Smith sold to the Monarch Company the eight sections of land at $8 per acre, with the option to have the land conveyed to it direct at once, or to sell to others within 90 days at a price to be fixed by it, and to have the deeds made to its vendees instead of to the Monarch Company, but at the expiration of 90 days the Monarch Company was bound to accept a conveyance from Pope and Smith of all unsold land and to pay therefor as specified. There was no contingency upon which the Monarch Company could decline to accept conveyance to its vendees or to itself. This, as a matter of law, constitutes a sale of the land and not the creation of an agency to sell; for, if it were a contract of agency, it could not be specifically enforced by either party against the other. Pomeroy, Specific Performance, § 48; Chinnock v. Sainsbury, 30 L. J. Ch. (N. S.) 409. If it had been an agency, a breach might have given a right of action for damages, but not for specific performance.

[4] Under the charge given by the court, before the jury could find for plaintiff they were required to find that the transaction was a sale by defendants to the Monarch

Company, that the plaintiff as agent of defendant procured the purchaser, and that the sale to the Monarch Company resulted from the service of the plaintiff in error. The jury found for the plaintiff. Therefore we must accept the verdict as a finding of the facts necessary under the charge to sustain it. The Court of Civil Appeals reversed the judgment of the district court, and remanded the case, Mr. Justice Dunklin dissenting. The Court of Civil Appeals stated the ground of reversal thus: "There was error which will require a reversal of the judgment in permitting Ben T. Ansley, one of the plaintiffs, to testify that his firm sold the land in controversy to the Monarch Land & Loan Company about the 14th day of August, 1907, such testimony being a conclusion of the witness upon one of the vital issues in the case to be determined by the jury." We are of opinion that this ruling, if error, was harmless because that issue was not submitted to the jury, and it did not affect the right of recovery, because the plaintiff furnished the purchaser who was accepted by Pope and Smith, and conveyance made. Admitting that the Ansley Realty Company did not sell to the Monarch Company, having furnished the purchaser who was accepted, the Realty Company was entitled to recover.

It is ordered that the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals be reversed, and that the judgment of the district court be affirmed.

RANKIN et al. v. RANKIN.

(Supreme Court of Texas. Dec. 11, 1912.)

1. EVIDENCE (§§ 121, 230*)—DECLARATIONS OF GRANTOR—ADMISSIBILITY.

Declarations by a grantor made before or after the execution of a deed are not competent to prove fraud and undue influence, but if made at the time of the execution of the deed, they are competent as a part of the res gestæ.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 303, 307-338, 835-851, 1117, 1119; Dec. Dig. §§ 121, 230.*]

2. EVIDENCE (§ 268*)—DECLARATIONS OF GRANTOR—ADMISSIBILITY.

Declarations by a grantor made after making a deed are not admissible to show the grantor's mental condition at the time of the execution of the deed, unless made so near to that time as to justify the inference that such mental condition existed at that time.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1061, 1062; Dec. Dig. § 268.*]

3. DEEDS (§ 203*)—SUIT TO SET ASIDE—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

In a suit by the executor to set aside a deed executed by testatrix to her daughter-in-law on the ground of fraud and undue influence, evidence that defendant's attorney had offered to give an heir his part if he would have nothing to do with the case was inadmissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. §§ 602, 604-611; Dec. Dig. § 203.*]

4. DEEDS (§ 203*)—SUIT TO SET ASIDE—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

Evidence that the son of testatrix did not object to the placing of the land in the inventory of the estate of testatrix was inadmissible unless pertinent in a chain of circumstantial evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. §§ 602, 604-611; Dec. Dig. § 203.*]

5. DEEDS (§ 203*)—SUIT TO SET ASIDE—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

Where a son procured his mother to make a deed of her land to his wife in order that he might have the control over it as his own, all evidence which would be admissible if the deed had been made to the son would be admissible in a suit by the mother's executrix to set aside the deed.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Third Supreme Judicial District.

Action by J. T. Rankin, executor, against L. A. Rankin and others. There was a judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals (134 S. W. 392) affirming a judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Reversed and remanded to the District Court for trial.

A. J. Harvey and Lipscomb & Poole, all of Hempstead, and W. W. Searcy, of Brenham, for plaintiffs in error. J. D. Harvey and Keet McDade, both of Hempstead, J. V. Meek, of Houston, and J. P. Buchanan, of Brenham, for defendant in error.

BROWN, C. J. We copy the following findings of fact by the Court of Civil Appeals:

"From the evidence in the record, we find the following to be the facts as bearing on the issues made by the pleadings:

"(1) Mrs. Charlotte Rankin, on June 23, 1897, executed a deed to Mrs. L. A. Rankin, wife of Harry W. Rankin, to 100 acres of land out of a 300-acre tract, in Ellis county, Tex.; the consideration recited in said deed being $25 cash and love and affection. No attack is made on this deed.

"(2) On November 24, 1898, the said Mrs. Charlotte Rankin executed a deed to the said Mrs. L. A. Rankin for the remaining 200 acres of said tract of land, for the recited consideration of $50 cash and love and affection. This is the deed which is attached in this suit.

"(3) Each of said deeds conveyed title to Mrs. L. A. Rankin in her separate right. No consideration was paid for the execution of either of said deeds. Both of said deeds were in the handwriting of Harry Rankin, were executed at his house, and when the last deed was executed there was no one present besides the grantor, Harry Rankin, and his wife, except one J. T. Houx, who was a particular friend of said Harry Rankin, and who signed the same, and also a written memorandum attached thereto, as a witness. The evidence does not fully develop the circumstances under which the first deed was executed, but does show that the same was at the solicitation of said Harry Rankin.

"(4) Said deed to the 200-acre tract was executed under the following circumstances: Mrs. Charlotte Rankin, being at the house of Harry Rankin, was informed by him that the first deed incorrectly described the land intended to be conveyed, and presented her the second deed, informing her that it was a substitute for the former deed and conveyed the same land intended to be conveyed by the former deed. Believing these statements to be true, Mrs. Rankin signed the same, and also the memorandum attached to the same. This memorandum recited that Mrs. Charlotte Rankin was to retain possession of said land during her lifetime and was to pay all taxes thereon.

"(5) This deed was witnessed by said Houx only, and was not acknowledged before any officer, and was not filed for record until August 17, 1908, nearly ten years after its execution, and some nine months after the death of Mrs. Charlotte Rankin. Neither Harry Rankin nor his wife ever set up any claim to said land during the lifetime of Mrs. Charlotte Rankin, and the execution of said deed, as a deed containing 200 acres of land, was not known to any of the other heirs of Mrs. Charlotte Rankin until some months after her death. Some time after the execution of said last deed they learned that Mrs. Charlotte Rankin had executed a deed to the wife of Harry Rankin for 100 acres of said Ellis county tract. This deed had not been filed for record when the second deed was executed, but was filed for record in Ellis county February 13, 1899.

"(6) At the time of the execution of said deeds, Mrs. Charlotte Rankin was over 70 years old. She was, and for some time prior thereto had been, in feeble health and weak in mind, and on account of the condition of her eyes could not see without glasses, and then with great difficulty. This physical and mental condition so continued to the time of her death.

"(7) Mrs. Charlotte Rankin had four sons, all of whom, except T. J. Rankin with whom she lived, were married, and all of whom lived in the same town with her. So far as the record shows, none of the parties ever lived in Ellis county.

"(8) Mrs. Charlotte Rankin never knew, nor did she have any reason to suppose, that the second deed was other than it was represented to her to be at the time she signed the same.

"(9) The land conveyed in the second deed was worth about $40 per acre when said deed was executed, and from $70 to $75 per acre at the time of the trial.

"(10) Harry Rankin had great influence with his mother.

"(11) By said deeds conveyance was made to Mrs. L. A. Rankin in her separate right, because there were unsatisfied judgments against Harry Rankin and he was insolvent.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

"(12) Mrs. Charlotte Rankin executed a will on October 21, 1899, at which time she thought the said deeds executed by her had perhaps been destroyed, but did not feel sure that such was the case. In said will she bequeathed her property equally to her son T. J. Rankin and to her three daughters-in-law, in trust for their children, except that, in addition to his one-fourth, she also bequeathed to her son T. J. Rankin, with whom she had long made her home, the home in which she lived. She was at the time of the execution of said deeds a widow, and so remained to the time of her death. The fifth clause in said will was as follows: 'I have heretofore given a deed to Lou Adell Rankin to one hundred acres of land in Ellis county, and in the event said deed was not destroyed but still exists, I value the same at $2,500, and desire that the same be charged up to the interest of said Lou Adell Rankin in making division of my said estate.' In addition to the general issue, the defendants pleaded the four-year statute of limitations. No issue was raised by the pleadings as to want of proper parties. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, appellee herein, and judgment was entered canceling said deed, from which judgment the defendants appealed."

It is admitted by attorneys for all parties and held by the honorable Court of Civil Appeals that the declarations of Mrs. Rankin were not admissible to prove the fraud charged to have been practiced upon her by H. W. Rankin, nor to prove the undue influence claimed to have been exercised over her whereby she was induced to execute the deed in question.

[1] The general rule on this point is expressed thus: "Where the execution of a will is proved in the mode required by law, the declarations of the testator, made before or after the execution of the instrument, are not competent to prove fraud, duress, or forgery, or to disprove the execution; they are hearsay, merely. But such declarations, made at the time the instrument was executed, are admissible as part of the res gestæ. The rule upon these points is the same in the case of wills that it is in the case of deeds."

[2] It is conceded by counsel for defendant in error, in a candid and clear presentation of his client's case, that the declarations of Mrs. Rankin, made subsequent to the making of the deed, not in the presence of H. W. Rankin nor his wife, are not competent to prove the fraud or the undue influence upon which this action rests. But it is claimed that the evidence was pertinent to prove the "state of Mrs. Rankin's mind." It must be the condition of her mind at the time of the transaction which is permitted to be proved, because such condition at a different date could not throw any light on the transaction. The declarations made by Mrs. Rankin that a certain fact had been misrepresented to her at a previous time might be so extravagant as to show a disordered mind when she made the declaration, but could not prove her mental condition when the deed was made, unless made so near to that date as to justify the inference that existed at that time. It has generally been held that the truth or falsity of the declaration is of no importance except as it affects the question of mental weakness.

In the case of Throckmorton v. Holt, 180 U. S. 573, 21 Sup. Ct. 482, 45 L. Ed. 663, the Supreme Court of the United States, speaking through Judge Peckham, said: "After much reflection upon the subject, we are inclined to the opinion that not only is the weight of authority with the cases which exclude the evidence both before and after the execution, but the principles upon which our law of evidence is founded necessitate the exclusion. The declarations are purely hearsay, being merely unsworn declarations, and when no part of the res gestæ are not within any of the recognized exceptions admitting evidence of that kind. Although in some of the cases the remark is made that declarations are admissible which tend to show the state of the affections of the deceased as a mental condition, yet they are generally stated in cases where the mental capacity of the deceased is the subject of the inquiry, and in those cases his declarations on that subject are just as likely to aid in answering the question as to mental capacity as those upon any other subject. But if the matter in issue be not the mental capacity of the deceased, then such unsworn declarations, as indicative of the state of his affections, are no more admissible than would be his unsworn declarations as to any other fact. When they are not a part of the res gestæ, declarations of this nature are excluded because they are unsworn, being hearsay only, and, where they are claimed to be admissible on the ground that they are said to indicate the condition of mind of the deceased with regard to his affections, they are still unsworn declarations, and they cannot be admitted if other unsworn declarations are excluded. In other words, there is no ground for an exception in favor of the admissibility of declarations of a deceased person as to the state of his affections, when the mental or testamentary capacity of the deceased is not in issue. When such an issue is made, it is one which relates to a state of mind which was involuntary and over which the deceased had not the control of the sane individual, and his declarations are admitted, not as any evidence of their truth, but only because he made them, and that is an original fact from which, among others, light is sought to be reflected upon the main issue of testamentary capacity. The truth or falsity of such declarations is not important upon such an issue (unless that for the purpose of showing delusion it may be necessary to give the evidence of their falsity); but the mere fact that they were uttered may be most material evidence upon that issue. The declarations of the same man are under his control, and they may or may not reflect his true feelings, while the utterances of the man whose mind is impaired from disease or old age are not the result of reflection and judgment, but spontaneous outpourings arising from mental weakness or derangement. The difference between the two, both as to the manner and subject of the declarations, might be obvious. It is quite apparent therefore that declarations of the deceased are properly received upon the question of his state of mind, whether mentally strong and capable or weak and incapable, and that from all the testimony, including his declarations, his mental capacity can probably be determined with considerable accuracy. Whether the utterances are true or false cannot be determined from their mere statement, and they are without value as proof of their truth, whether made by the sane or insane, because they are in either case unsworn declarations."

We first note that there is nothing in the declarations of Mrs. Rankin concerning the fraud which tends to prove that her mind was weak at the time she made the deed. According to the evidence of the witness her mind was quite clear at the date of her detailed statements. If those statements were correct, she remembered well the details of the transaction, which fact tends to negative the claim of mental weakness. If they were not true, but simply the creatures of a disordered mind, then they show no reason to disturb her conveyance; but there is no proof of fraud or improper influence. It follows that the judge of the district court erred in submitting the issues of fraud and undue influence to the jury, there being no sufficient or competent evidence to prove either issue, and the judgment must be reversed.

It was the duty of the district judge, before whom the trial was had, to decide whether or not the declarations of Mrs. Rankin tended to prove that at the time she executed the deed in question her mind was in such condition as to disqualify her to execute that instrument or to render her susceptible to undue influence over her will power by her son. We are of the opinion that the declarations were not competent to prove either fact and should have been excluded from the jury and should not be admitted upon another trial.

We have hesitated to remand this case upon the record as it is before us, but we realize that fraud is oftentimes very difficult to prove and is peculiarly a fact which must be established by circumstantial evidence. It is very difficult to express in a record the full force of evidence of that character.

The trial judge has a better opportunity to determine the admissibility of evidence, that is, whether it tends to prove a given fact, than this court has from the record. On the other hand, juries are liable to give undue weight to circumstances which characterize this character of litigation, which fact renders more imperative the exercise by the judge of his judgment upon the relevancy of the evidence upon issues of fraud or unfairness in such transactions.

In submitting this case to another jury the declarations of Mrs. Rankin as to the fraud of H. W. Rankin, or as to influence exercised or deception practiced upon her by him, should not be permitted to go to the jury, because as a matter of law such declarations are not competent to prove either fact, and the declarations relied upon do not tend to prove mental condition at the time the deed was executed.

It is unnecessary to pass upon the objection made to the testimony of the witness Haney, as we hold the declaration related by him to be inadmissible.

[3] The evidence to the effect that Lipcomb, the attorney for plaintiff in error, had offered to give Gus Rankin his part if he would have nothing to do with the case, was improperly admitted; it did not tend to prove or disprove any issue in this case.

[4] As the record comes to this court we are not prepared to say that there was error in admitting the evidence to the effect that H. W. Rankin did not object to the placing of the land on the inventory of his mother's estate. Of itself that action could prove nothing, but it might be pertinent in a chain of circumstantial evidence.

[5] We believe that we have stated the principles which should govern in another trial sufficiently without discussing each assignment. If H. W. Rankin procured his mother to make the deed to the land in the name of his wife in order that he might have the control of it as his own, all evidence which would be admissible if the deed had been to H. W. Rankin will be admissible in this case on another trial.

It is ordered that the judgments of the district court and Court of Civil Appeals be reversed, and the cause remanded to the district court for trial in accordance with this opinion.

STATE v. SAVAGE et al.

(Supreme Court of Texas. Dec. 11, 1912.)

1. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 82*)—LOCAL OPTION ELECTION—LIABILITY ON BOND—NECESSITY OF VALID ELECTION.

A valid local option election resulting in the adoption of the law is essential to any liability on a liquor dealer's bond given under the local option law.

2. COURTS (§ 90*)—DECISIONS OF COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEALS—CONCLUSIVENESS.

The Supreme Court will generally follow the decisions of the Court of Criminal Appeals upon questions involving penal laws.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Cent. Dig. §§ 313-321, 351; Dec. Dig. § 90.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1108*)—DETERMINATION—LAW APPLICABLE—CONCLUSIVENESS.

The rule that if, after conviction for a criminal offense, it is finally determined that the law upon which the conviction rests is invalid, or not in force, the court will decide the case on appeal according to the status of law at that time is applicable to an action on a liquor dealer's bond, and, where pending an appeal of an action on the bond, there was a determination, in a contest of the election, that local option had never been legally adopted in the particular county, the court may determine that the bond was of no force and effect, though the law provides that a contest shall not suspend the enforcement of the law.

4. EVIDENCE (§ 43*) — JUDICIAL NOTICE — PRIOR DECISION.

While a court cannot consult the record in any other case to ascertain a fact not shown by the record in the case before it, it may go to its decision in another case for the law that is determinative of, or applicable to, a case under review, so that, on an appeal of an action on a liquor dealer's bond, the Court of Civil Appeals properly took judicial notice of its prior decision determining that the local option election in the county in which the bond was given was invalid.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Second Supreme Judicial District.

Action by the State against Z. Z. Savage and others on a liquor dealer's bond. From a judgment in the Court of Civil Appeals (138 S. W. 211), reversing a judgment for the State and dismissing the cause, the State brings error. Affirmed.

Henry S. Bishop, of Amarillo, and Theodore Mack, of Ft. Worth, for the State. Reeder & Graham, of Amarillo, and Williams & Stedman, of Austin, for defendant in error.

PHILLIPS, J. This was a suit in which the state of Texas on March 4, 1910, recovered a judgment in the district court of Potter county upon a liquor dealer's bond entered into on September 11, 1908, by Z. Z. Savage as principal and the other defendants in error as sureties, to enable Savage to conduct the business of selling intoxicating liquors on prescription as permitted by the local option law, which had been declared by the proper authorities to be in force in that county as the result of a local option election held on December 3, 1907. From the judgment in favor of the state, the defendants appealed to the honorable Court of Civil Appeals for the Second District. The local option election held in Potter county on December 3, 1907, was contested, and the case was likewise appealed to the same Court of Civil Appeals. Subsequent to the rendition of the judgment in the present case, and while its appeal was pending in the Court of Civil Appeals, the court decided the appeal in the election case, and, in holding that the election was void, in effect adjudged that the local option law, which, as supposed at the time, required the execution of the bond on which the judgment here was founded, had never been in force in Potter county. Savage v. Umphres (Civ. App.) 131 S. W. 291. In consequence of the decision of the court in the election case, these defendants thereupon filed in that court a motion that the present judgment be reversed and the cause dismissed. The motion to dismiss was sustained by a majority of the court, and judgment was rendered in favor of the defendants upon the ground, as stated in the opinion, that the court took judicial notice of its decision in the election case, and, as it had itself therein decided that there was no law requiring the bond, there could be no recovery for its alleged violation. Mr. Justice Speer entered his dissent, holding that the question as to whether the local option law had been adopted in Potter county was one of fact, and so remained notwithstanding the judicial determination of the Court of Civil Appeals; that the court could not take cognizance of its own decision in the election case without proof of such decision in the record; and as the record did not disclose it, and none of the errors complained of was reviewable in the state of the record in the other respects, the judgment of the trial court should be affirmed.

[1] The members of the Court of Civil Appeals were unanimous in the holding that the provision of the act of the Thirtieth Legislature (chapter 8, p. 447, Acts 1907), relating to the contest of a local option election, which declares that "pending such contest the enforcement of the local option law in such territory shall not be suspended," was without application to the case, for the reason that, after the court's decision of the election case, the contest of the election was no longer pending, and the question of liability upon the bond was to be determined by it according to the status of the local option law in the county named at the time of its decision of the appeal. To our minds there can be no question as to the soundness of this position. A valid election resulting in the legal adoption of the law was essential to the accrual of any liability upon the bond for, as is said by the court, if the local option law had not been adopted in the county, there was no law requiring the bond. The condition of the bond was in purpose and effect that the principal would not violate the law by making sales other than those permitted by it—that is, upon prescription—and, if there was no law to violate, there could be no actionable breach of the bond.

The decision of the Court of Civil Appeals in the election case was that the local option law had never been in force in the county as the result of the election of December 3, 1907, and there was therefore no law upon which the validity of this bond as a penal obligation might rest.

[2, 3] It is contended by counsel for the plaintiff in error that the judgment upon the bond is entitled to affirmance by virtue of the provision of the act of 1907, above quoted, inasmuch as the constitutionality of that provision was upheld by the Court of Criminal Appeals in Ex parte McGuire, 57 Tex. Cr. R. 38, 123 S. W. 425, in which connection it is urged that we should follow the decisions of that court upon questions involving the penal laws. Such, generally, is the duty and habit of this court. State v. Schwarz, 103 Tex. 119, 124 S. W. 420. In Ex parte McGuire, the Court of Criminal Appeals, under the authority of the act of 1907, refused, while the contest of the election herein referred to and involved in Savage v. Umphres was still pending, to release by habeas corpus a relator charged with the violation of the local option law declared by the proper authorities to have been adopted by the election. In the later case, however, of Henry v. State, 61 Tex. Cr. R. 187, 135 S. W. 571, that court, on the appeal, dismissed the prosecution against a defendant found guilty of violation of the local option law in Potter county, while the contest of this election was pending, upon the ground that, since the judgment of conviction, the decision in Savage v. Umphres had settled that the law had never been in force in the county, and that the prosecution was therefore without authority of law. In other words, in that case the court applied the rule that, if after conviction for a criminal offense it is finally determined that the law upon which the conviction rests is invalid or was not in force, the court will decide the case on appeal according to the status of the law at that time. Actions on penal bonds of this character are governed by the same principle. Giving it effect because of its force as a rule of decision of the Court of Criminal Appeals upon a question involving a penal law of the state, as we are urged to do by the plaintiff in error, and because, as well, of our opinion of its soundness, it follows that the holding of the Court of Civil Appeals upon this feature of the case was correct.

[4] The case is therefore to be determined, in our opinion, solely by the law of judicial notice. The Courts of Civil Appeals are essentially appellate in their character, and have not the power to ascertain facts in the first instance, unless necessary to the proper exercise of their jurisdiction within the purview of article 998, Revised Statutes of 1895. The question as to whether the local option law had been legally adopted in Potter county necessarily affected the decision by the Court of Civil Appeals of this case, whether considered as one of fact or law, but it did not involve "the proper exercise of its jurisdiction." It had no bearing upon the court's jurisdiction of the case as distinguished from its decision of it, and therefore had no relation to the exercise of its jurisdiction. But, in the use of their powers as courts of review, the Courts of Civil Appeals are at liberty to ascertain the law as embodied in their own decisions or the decisions of other appellate courts, and make application of it if in their opinion it is of influence in the determination of the case under consideration. To deny to the court in its deliberation upon this case the right to consult its own decision in the election case, in which it had judicially determined and declared the status of the local option law in Potter county, is to say, it seems to us, that that decision is to be regarded only as a fact, and cannot be regarded as a declaration of law in itself conclusive of the case before it. Because, ordinarily in cases involving the local option law, it is required that certain proof be adduced to establish that the law is in force, is it necessary for an appellate court, in its consideration of a case in which the judgment depends upon the existence of such law, to be advised by proof that it had itself decided that the law had never been in force, and, in effect, that there was no law to support the judgment? In other words, because ordinarily the existence of the law is a question of fact, is a conclusive appellate court decision, which declares the law never existed, to be regarded also merely as a fact to be proven before given effect? To so hold is but to affirm that an appellate court decision is only a piece of evidence. It is to say that whether it is authority, unless proven, depends upon the character of the legal question decided. It confuses the mode by which the local adoption of a law of this kind is established with the judicial determination by a court of last resort of the status of the law itself. It confounds a status of a law as fixed by such judicial decision with one ordinarily the result of proof, and denies to the decision so fixing its status the authority of law because the adoption of the law in other cases is a matter of evidence.

The jurisdiction of the Court of Civil Appeals over the election case was final. By the act of the Thirtieth Legislature, its decision in that case conclusively determined the status of the law in Potter county as it related to the bond in this case. It was binding not only upon itself, but upon all inferior courts in the subsequent adjudication of all cases affected by the law. As the decision of a court of last resort upon a question duly presented and passed upon, it became a part of the law of the state, and its authority, as a holding that the law in question had not been adopted in Potter county, no more depended upon its proof than would its decision upon any other question. It is an accepted rule that an appellate court cannot consult the record in another case to ascertain a fact not shown by the record in the case before it. Armendiaz v. Serna, 40 Tex. 291. But it can go to its decision in another case for the law that is determinative of, or applicable to, the case under review. Whatever such decision has declared to be the law upon the question decided is the law because of the authority of the court to declare it, and not because it may be established by evidence that the decision was rendered. If the decision involves a law of this kind that is required to be proven before given effect, its validity, or whether it has been legally adopted that the law is of such character, cannot deprive the decision of its force as authority upon the legal question decided, or determine whether it may be so recognized by the court in its consideration of other cases.

In its decision in the election case the Court of Civil Appeals determined, as a matter of law, that the local option law had not been adopted in Potter county. The direct question in the case was the validity of the election; and, in holding that the election was invalid, it was necessarily determined, as a matter of law, that there had been no adoption of the law, thereby fixing its legal status. It was not merely probative of the status of the law, as it must be held if it was required to be proven before it could be considered. It was direct legal authority upon the question as pronounced by the tribunal having the ultimate power of determining it. No higher authority existed, or could exist, upon the question. It possessed, unproven, all of the authority that it would have had if proven; and, if it had been possible for it to be introduced in evidence and incorporated in the record, it would have been serviceable to the court, not as proof, but only as a legal authority. The court in our opinion had the undoubted right to take judicial notice of the decision and to decide the present case in the light of its holding. It would prove highly embarrassing to an appellate court to be compelled to ignore its own decisions upon questions of like character, and to give effect in its judgments to laws that it had itself declared were invalid or had not been legally enacted or adopted, and we do not think that it should be so fettered by a technical rule. The same question was so decided by the honorable Court of Civil Appeals for the Fifth District through Mr. Justice Talbot in Edgar v. McDonald (Civ. App.) 106 S. W. 1135, and the same rule was applied by Mr. Justice Neal in Avocato v. Dell' Ara (Civ. App.) 84 S. W. 444. This holding is further supported by the following authorities: Butler v. Eaton, 141 U. S. 243, 11 Sup. Ct. 985, 35 L. Ed. 713; Thompson v. Maxwell Land Grant Company, 168 U. S. 456, 18 Sup. Ct. 121, 42 L. Ed. 539; Blenville Water, etc., Co. v. Mobile, 186 U. S. 217, 22 Sup. Ct. 820, 46 L. Ed. 1132; Alexander v. Gish (Ky.) 17 S. W. 287; Cash v. State, 10 Humph. (Tenn.) 111; Allen v. Swoope, 64 Ark. 579, 44 S. W. 78; Mower v. Kemp, 42 La. Ann. 1015, 8 South. 830; Poole v. Seney, 70 Iowa, 275, 24 N. W. 520, 30 N. W. 634; Town of South Ottawa v. Perkins, 94 U. S. 268, 24 L. Ed. 154.

The judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals is affirmed.

HENRY et al. v. PHILLIPS.

(Supreme Court of Texas. Dec. 11, 1912.)

1. DEEDS (§ 61*)—DELIVERY—ACTS CONSTITUTING.

A grantor who duly executed a deed to his stepdaughters, whom he regarded as his own children, and placed it in an envelope containing an indorsement of his name and the names of the grantees, separated by the word "or," and who delivered the same to the cashier of a bank with the statement, "Here is a deed * * * to Miss J. K. and Mrs. P. H. [the grantees] that I want to lay away in the vault for safe-keeping, and the deed to be delivered after my death to them," thereby delivered the deed to the bank in escrow for delivery to the grantees after his death, and title passed to the grantees, and it was immaterial whether he did or did not part with the custody of the deed, or whether, after depositing it in the bank, he retained control over it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. §§ 140, 141; Dec. Dig. § 61.*]

2. DEEDS (§ 56*)—DELIVERY—INTENTION OF GRANTOR.

The question of delivery of a deed is one of intention of the grantor, and an actual or manual delivery by him in person to the grantee is not essential to pass title, and where it appears that the deed was duly executed, and it was the grantor's purpose to deliver or have it delivered to the grantee, the law will aid the intention, and give it effect as if the deed had been actually delivered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. §§ 117-123, 125; Dec. Dig. § 56.*]

3. DEEDS (§ 66*)—DELIVERY—INTENTION OF GRANTOR—QUESTION OF COURT AND JURY.

What constitutes a delivery of a deed essential to pass title is one of law; but whether there has been in fact a delivery is for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. §§ 127, 633; Dec. Dig. § 66.*]

4. DEEDS (§ 56*)—DELIVERY—INTENTION OF GRANTOR.

Where a grantor executes a deed and his intention to deliver it is clear, title passes to the grantee, though the grantor retains control of the deed during his lifetime.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. §§ 117-123, 125; Dec. Dig. § 56.*]

5. EVIDENCE (§ 230*)—ACTS OF GRANTOR IMPEACHING TITLE—ADMISSIBILITY.

That a grantor subsequent to the execution of a deed and delivery to a third person in escrow for delivery to the grantee after the grantor's death listed the property for sale, and offered to sell the tract described in the deed and other property, could not be proved after the grantor's death against the grantee, since it was in disparagement of his deed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 835-851; Dec. Dig. § 230.*]

6. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 837*)—ADMISSION OF INCOMPETENT TESTIMONY WITHOUT OBJECTION—FINDINGS.

The court on appeal can only base its findings on competent testimony, and incompetent testimony received without objection cannot form the basis of findings of facts in an appellate court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3262-3278; Dec. Dig. § 837.*]

7. EVIDENCE (§ 448*)—PAROL EVIDENCE—VARYING CONTRACTS.

Parol evidence is inadmissible to show the construction placed on a written contract by the parties thereto, where there is no ambiguity in the contract, and the intent of the parties may be ascertained therefrom.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 2066-2082, 2084; Dec. Dig. § 448.*]

8. EVIDENCE (§ 417*)—PAROL EVIDENCE—VARYING CONTRACTS.

Where, on the issue of delivery of a deed to pass title to the grantees, it appeared that the grantor executed a deed to the grantees, and placed it in an envelope containing an indorsement of his name and the names of the grantees, separated by the word "or," and that he delivered the same to the cashier of a bank, evidence of his statement to the cashier at the time that there is a deed to be placed in the bank for safe-keeping for delivery after his death to the grantees was competent to show the grantor's intent to deliver the deed to the grantees, and was not inadmissible as varying the memorandum, though given the dignity of a contract or a written memorandum of instruction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1874-1899; Dec. Dig. § 417.*]

9. EVIDENCE (§ 466*)—PAROL EVIDENCE—ABANDONMENT OF WRITTEN CONTRACTS.

It is competent to show by parol that a written contract entered into with the solemnity required by law has been abandoned by the parties.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 2145; Dec. Dig. § 466.*]

10. ESCROWS (§ 13*)—DELIVERY IN ESCROW—EFFECT.

Where a grantor delivers the deed to a third person in escrow for delivery to the grantee, after the grantor's death, a delivery by the third person after the grantor's death relates back so as to divest the title of the grantor by relation from the first delivery.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Escrows, Cent. Dig. § 14; Dec. Dig. § 13.*]

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Sixth Supreme Judicial District.

Action by W. H. Phillips, administrator, against Pat Henry and others. There was a judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals (135 S. W. 382) reversing a judgment for defendants and rendering a judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Judgment of Court of Civil Appeals reversed, and judgment of trial court affirmed.

Thos. P. Steger, of Bonham, J. G. McGrady, of Ft. Worth, and Mark McMahon, of Bonham, for plaintiff in error. Richard B. Sample and S. F. Leslie, both of Bonham, for defendant in error.

DIBRELL, J. This suit was begun in the district court of Fannin county on January 26, 1907, by the administrator of T. J. Patillo, deceased, against Mrs. Mary Henry and Josephine Riddings and their husbands, D. P. Henry and C. C. Riddings, to cancel a certain deed of date May 9, 1905, executed by the said Patillo to Mrs. Mary Henry and Josephine Kearnes, now Riddings, and conveying about 81 acres of land situate in Fannin county, with full and particular description thereof by references to the survey and metes and bounds, and to quiet said estate in its title to and possession of said premises.

Plaintiff alleged that on May 9, 1905, T. J. Patillo signed and executed the deed in question to Mrs. Mary Henry and Josephine Kearnes, now Riddings, purporting to convey the land therein described, and retained possession of the deed until his death on the 13th day of September, 1906; that prior to his death Patillo, being undecided whether or not he would deliver the deed to the grantees therein, deposited the deed for safe-keeping with the First National Bank of Bells, Grayson county, where it remained undelivered to said grantees until after the death of said Patillo. Defendants in substance alleged that the grantor in said deed, T. J. Patillo, bore great love and affection for the grantees in said deed, who were the daughters and only children of his deceased wife, and felt under obligations to them, which he often expressed, and he intended to convey to them certain tracts of land; that pursuant to such intention Patillo on May 9, 1905, caused the deed in question to be written, signed, and executed, same conveying the land therein described to the defendants, Mrs. Mary Henry and Josephine Kearnes, now Riddings, and about June 1, 1905, delivered said deed in person to one S. D. Simpson, cashier of the First National Bank of Bells, Texas, and instructed said Simpson to hold the deed until Patillo's death, and then deliver it to Josephine Kearnes and Mary Henry; that the deed so executed and delivered to Simpson in escrow was an absolute and unconditional deed, and conveyed the property therein described to the grantees named. Defendants further allege that being the owners of the land in controversy, upon the death of their grantor, T. J. Patillo, which occurred on September 13, 1906, they are entitled to the rents arising out of the use of said land, and claim the sum of $700 as accrued rents under appropriate allegations. The case was tried with a jury, the verdict being for defendants against plaintiff upon the issue of the delivery of the deed, and upon the issue of rents the sum of $369. Upon the second appeal of the case the judgment of the lower court was reversed and rendered by the Court of Civil Appeals of the Sixth District in favor of the administrator of T. J. Patillo's estate.

The case as it comes to this court presents but one question of law for our decision. The trial, so far as is disclosed by the record, was had without any exceptions to the court's ruling, and, so far as we are able to judge, there is no conflicting evidence upon any issue of fact in the case. The question of law is whether or not T. J. Patillo after he executed the deed to Mrs. Mary Henry and Josephine Kearnes to the land therein described and deposited it in the bank for safe-keeping, and for delivery to the grantees after his death, thereby parted with his title to said land.

The Court of Civil Appeals makes the following findings of fact, which for the purpose of clearness we desire to quote: "The deed was dated May 9, 1905, and its execution was duly acknowledged by Patillo on the same day. It was as follows: 'Know all men by these presents that I, T. J. Patillo, county of Fannin, State of Texas, for and in consideration of the sum of $25.00 to me in hand paid by Mrs. Mary Henry, wife of Pat Henry, and Miss Josephine Kearnes, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, and the further consideration of the love and affection I have for the said Mary Henry and the said Josephine Kearnes, they being my stepdaughters, have granted, sold and conveyed, and by these presents do grant, sell and convey unto the said Mrs. Mary Henry and Miss Josephine Kearnes, of the county of Fannin, State of Texas, all that certain tract or parcel of land situated on the waters of Caney creek in Fannin county about ten miles Northwest of Bonham (and further describing the land in controversy); Mrs. Mary Henry is to have an undivided two-thirds in the whole of the above described land and Miss Josephine Kearnes the other one-third undivided interest.' Some time in the spring of 1905, a sealed envelope, afterwards found to contain the deed, with the words, 'After ten days return to Pat Henry, County Clerk, Fannin County, Bonham, Texas,' printed on the left hand top thereof, and indorsed in Patillo's handwriting, 'T. J. Patillo or Mary Henry and Miss Josephine Kearnes,' was delivered by Patillo to Simpson, then the cashier of a bank at Bells, Tex., Simpson was the only witness who testified as to the circumstances accompanying the delivery to him of the deed. His testimony, so far as material, was as follows: 'I never saw the deed from T. J. Patillo to Mrs. Mary Henry and Miss Joe Kearnes, but, as I remember, Mr. T. J. Patillo handed me a large envelope, saying that it contained a deed of some land to Miss Joe Kearnes and Mrs. Pat Henry. I never delivered the deed to anybody. I was acquainted with the said T. J. Patillo. I received the envelope in which Mr. T. J. Patillo told me there was a deed from him, the said Patillo, as cashier of the bank, for safe-keeping. I received the envelope from Mr. T. J. Patillo, in which he said there was a deed, some time in the spring of 1905, but I do not remember the exact date. I was at that time cashier of the First National Bank at Bells, Tex. There are so many papers put in the bank for safe-keeping it is impossible just what each and every one person says when they leave the papers. I cannot state the exact words, but I believe I am correct when I say that he says: "Simpson, here is a deed of some land to Miss Joe Kearnes and Mrs. Pat Henry that I want to lay away in the vault for safe-keeping, and the deed to be delivered after my death to them." I do not remember that he said anything about reserving any right to recall the deed.' In the latter part of August, 1905, Patillo authorized the witness Springfield, a real estate agent, to sell the land for him, and frequently thereafterwards talked with said Springfield about the prospect of effecting a sale thereof. In the spring of 1906 the witness Dover proposed to buy a part of the tract. Patillo declined to sell him a part, but offered to sell him the entire tract. Patillo died September 18, 1906. About September 15, 1906, the envelope containing the deed was delivered by the witness Blanton, who had succeeded Simpson as cashier of said bank, to Mrs. Mary Henry, who had same spread upon the records of Fannin county, Tex. It was shown that Patillo spoke of the grantees named in the deed as his daughters, and was very kindly disposed toward them. It was further shown that in the spring of 1906 in reply to a letter written to him by a daughter of Mrs. Mary Henry, in which she stated that, if she should ever want to live in the country, she would like to live in the home place on the land in controversy, he wrote to her, saying that he was an old man, and did not expect to live long as his health was failing him, and that he had arranged his business, so that, if her father wanted to live in the country, they could live there."

In addition to the facts found by the Court of Civil Appeals, it was shown by the witness Simpson that at the time the sealed envelope was delivered to him by Patillo he did not remember that there was any indorsement on the envelope from which it may be inferred his attention was not called to such indorsement by Patillo, and by the witness Pat Henry that T. J. Patillo married the mother of Madams Mary Henry and Josephine Ridings when they were of the tender ages of ten and three years, respectively, and that Patillo had no children of his own; that he had never been married before and never married after the death of his wife, which took place in 1891, and that he seemed to love the grantees as if they were his own children; that he lived at the home of Mrs. Mary Henry for about four years, having there a room furnished by himself, and which he called his home; that Mrs. Patillo, the mother of grantees, died intestate and left community property of herself and husband consisting of real estate, which was disposed of by Patillo after his wife's death.

In the opinion rendered by the Court of Civil Appeals upon the record as above disclosed, it is held that there was no sufficient evidence to make an issue to be submitted to the jury as to whether or not there was such a delivery of the deed executed by Patillo to the defendants as to pass to them the title to the land in controversy. The language of that court is: "We are of the opinion that when the testimony recited, which is all there is in the record material to the question, is considered with reference to the rules of law controlling such cases, it must be said that it did not make such an issue, and that the trial court should have instructed the jury to find against the contention made that the delivery of the deed by Patillo to Simpson had the effect to pass the title to the land to the grantees named in it."

[1] We are not able under any view of the law, as we understand it, applied to the facts of this case to agree with the conclusion of law reached by the honorable Court of Civil Appeals, but, to the contrary, we think that under the facts, as found by that court and herein set out, no issue is made against the contention of defendants below that Patillo made and executed a valid deed conveying to Madams Mary Henry and Josephine Ridings the land in controversy, and that he left said deed in escrow with the bank for safe-keeping and for delivery to said grantees after his death. Stress seems to be laid upon the idea that Patillo did not by any act or declaration of his lose control of the deed after he had duly executed it and placed it in the bank for safe-keeping and delivery to the grantees after his death. We do not think from the findings of fact that there is any evidence, or any circumstance proven by any competent testimony in the findings of the appellate court, or in the record, that proves, or tends to prove, that Patillo did not part with all control over the deed when he handed it to the cashier of the bank with the declaration that he desired the deed, which he said conveyed some land to the grantees, deposited in the vault of the bank for safe-keeping and delivery to them after his death. But why cavil over the issue whether the grantor did or not deposit the deed with the bank for safe-keeping and subject to his control, if he executed the deed conveying the land therein described to the grantees named, and declared his desire that it should be delivered to them after his death? His act in executing the deed accompanied with his positive declaration of his purpose in so executing it and his desire that it should be delivered to the grantees after his death had the effect in law to convey the title in the land to the grantees in the deed with possession and the usufruct in the grantor. It had precisely the same effect as if he had made and delivered the deed to the grantees, conveying them the fee, reserving to himself in the deed the use and enjoyment of the land for and during his natural life.

[2] The question of delivery of a deed is one of intention on the part of the grantor, and an actual or manual delivery by the grantor in person to the grantees is not essential to pass the title. Brown v. Brown, 61 Tex. 60; Devlin on Deeds, § 275. If it be shown that the deed was duly executed by the grantor and that it was his purpose and intention to deliver, or have delivered such deed to the grantees, the law will aid such intention and give it like effect as if the deed had been actually delivered.

[3] What constitutes a delivery of a deed is a question of law, but whether there was in fact a delivery of the deed under consideration is a question of fact, to be determined by the jury. Towery v. Henderson, 60 Tex. 295. Suppose Patillo, after having executed the deed, declared his purpose was to convey the land to the grantees, and that he desired the deed delivered after his death, had retained possession or control of it during the remainder of his life, without otherwise having disposed of the land. Under the rule well recognized, applicable to such cases, the title to the land would have vested in the grantees named in the deed. Especially would this seem to be true when applied to the facts of this particular case. It was unquestionably the intention of Patillo to deliver the deed to the grantees. Hubbard v. Cox, 76 Tex. 242, 18 S. W. 170; Dill. on Deeds, § 262; Devlin on Deeds, §§ 262, 281, 283; 18 Cyc. 562 (d); Belden v. Carter, 4 Day, 66, 4 Am. Dec. 185.

[4] We are aware that it is a general rule of law recognized by the text-books, and said to be in accord with legal reasoning, that a deed should not be effective where the grantor reserves the right to recall the same prior to his death, but even the rule thus stated with the qualification that it be attended with a reservation of the right to recall the deed is not of universal adoption. It is generally conceded that each case must rest upon its own peculiar facts and circumstances. Where the grantor executes the deed, and his intention to deliver the same is clear, the title passes to the grantee, irrespective of the fact that the grantor retains control of the deed during his lifetime. In the case of Belden v. Carter, supra, the court in passing upon the immediate question here under review said: "The grantor delivered the deed to Wright, with a reservation of a power to countermand it, but this makes no difference; for it was in the nature of a testamentary disposition of real estate, and was revocable by the grantor during his life, without an express reservation of that power. The case, then, stands upon the same footing as if there had been no reservation of a power to countermand the deed. It was a delivery of a writing as a deed to the use of the grantee, to take effect at the death of the grantor, deposited in the hands of a third person to hold till that event happened, and then to deliver it to the grantee. The legal operation of this delivery is that it became the deed of the grantor presently; that Wright held it as a trustee for the use of the grantee; that the title became consummate in the grantee by the death of the grantor; and that the deed took effect, by relation, from the time of the first delivery." It is stated in a note to the foregoing decision that the doctrine there announced has been approved in the following cases, all of which we have not examined, but quote for the benefit of those who may further desire to investigate the subject. The rule seems to be founded in sound reason. Stewart v. Stewart, 5 Conn. 320; Jones v. Jones, 6 Conn. 113, 16 Am. Dec. 35; Alsop v. Swathel, 7 Conn. 503; Merrills v. Swift, 18 Conn. 262, 46 Am. Dec. 315; Church v. Gilman, 15 Wend. (N. Y.) 661, 30 Am. Dec. 82; Tooley v. Dibble, 2 Hill (N. Y.) 643; Hathaway v. Payne, 34 N. Y. 106; Stanton v. Miller, 65 Barb. (N. Y.) 73; Stephens v. Rinehart, 72 Pa. 440; Wallace v. Harris, 32 Mich. 380; Bell v. Farmers' Bank, 11 Bush (Ky.) 41, 21 Am. Rep. 205; Bryan v. Wash, 7 Ill. (2 Gilman) 585; Guard v. Bradley, 7 Ind. 605; Carter v. Mills, 30 Mo. 439; Cooper v. Jackson, 4 Wis. 537.

We think it immaterial, as it relates to the purpose and effect of the execution of the deed by Patillo, whether he did or not part with its custody, or whether after depositing the deed in the bank for safe-keeping he retained control over it. In what manner this fact or circumstance might control the question as to what Patillo's purpose and intent were in executing and delivering the deed we are not able to see. We have his positive declaration that the deed was for land granted by him to the grantees named in the instrument, and that he desired and intended that the deed should be delivered to them after his death. This declaration evidenced his purpose and intent in executing the deed to convey the land to the grantees, and to have the deed delivered to them after his death. Or what was in legal effect the same, he had conveyed to the grantees the property, but desired to retain possession and enjoy the fruits of the land while he lived, knowing that a deed takes effect only from the date of its delivery. Tuttle v. Turner, 28 Tex. 773; Devlin on Deeds (2d Ed.) § 284.

If the deed had been taken by Patillo during his lifetime from the bank, and found among his effects after his death and the land not otherwise disposed of by him, in view of his declaration to Simpson, the grantees would unquestionably take the title to the land under the deed. The avowed purpose of the grantor in executing the deed that it was to convey the land to the grantees named therein, to be delivered to them after his death, and the finding of the deed in his possession, as above assumed, not destroyed but held intact, and the property not otherwise disposed of would not only be evidence and circumstance sufficient to establish the effectiveness of the deed in question and the grantees' rights thereunder, but it would do so undubitably. Here we find the deed was duly executed, deposited in a bank for safe-keeping, and delivery upon the death of the grantor. Whatever view might be taken of the grantor's right to control the deed, we have the declaration of his purpose, and the fact that the grantor lived for many months within a short distance of the bank and never called for the deed, or disposed of the land. What more may it be thought was necessary to be shown to establish grantees' title?

On the other hand, let us see what facts there are in the record to rebut those of the grantor's purpose to convey the property and place the deed in escrow to be delivered upon the contingency of his death to the defendants. The deed was in the handwriting of and acknowledged before a notary who had his office in the courthouse in Bonham, in Fannin county, and who was shown to have died before the trial of the case. The deed was placed in a large envelope, upon which was indorsed in the grantor's handwriting: "T. J. Patillo or Mary Henry and Miss Joe Kearnes." The record is silent as to when this indorsement was placed upon the envelope, or for what purpose. The deed was subsequent to its execution deposited in the bank in Bells, in Grayson county, where it remained until after the death of Patillo, when it was delivered by the officers of the bank to one of the grantees, and placed on record.

[5] There is in the record no other fact or circumstance relative to this subject established by any competent testimony. The testimony of the witness to the effect that after the date of the deed's execution by Patillo he listed the property for sale, and inquired often as to whether it could be sold, and of another that Patillo refused to sell him a portion of the land, but offered to sell the entire tract, was not competent testimony to prove any issue in the case. The only relevant purpose for which this testimony could have been offered was for the purpose of showing that Patillo did not execute the deed in question for the purpose of conveying the land therein described. For this purpose it was not admissible, being hearsay evidence and in disparagement of the grantor's deed duly executed. Hays v. Hays, 66 Tex. 609, 1 S. W. 895; Snow v. Starr, 75 Tex. 416, 12 S. W. 673; Gilbert v. Odum, 69 Tex. 670, 7 S. W. 510; Devlin on Deeds, § 281a.

[6] While the admission of this testimony ✓ was not objected to by counsel for defendants, that fact would be important only in the event its admission was afterwards complained of as violative of a right reserved to defendants. Such incompetent testimony can never form the basis of a finding of facts in an appellate court, notwithstanding its presence in the record without objection. When the appellate court comes to apply the law to testimony constituting the facts of the case, it can only base its conclusion upon such testimony as is under the law competent. That which is not competent testimony should be given no probative force. The admission of such testimony is no talisman to give effect to that which is irrelevant and incompetent to sustain or deny a material issue in a case.

[7] We recognize the rule invoked by defendant in error to the effect that parol testimony is not admissible to show the construction placed upon a written contract by the parties themselves, where there is no ambiguity in the language of the instrument, and when the intent of the parties may be ascertained from the contract as written. Soell v. Hadden, 85 Tex. 187, 19 S. W. 1087.

[8] But we do not think that rule can in any sense be made applicable to the facts of this case. The memorandum indorsed on the back of the envelope as heretofore set out is meaningless, unless its meaning may be supplied by conjecture. If the court was authorized to say its meaning was that Patillo desired the envelope with its contents delivered to him or to the grantees named in the deed, the contention of defendant in error to the effect that Patillo's declaration to Simpson was incompetent because it varied a written contract would not be maintainable, for the reason there is nothing in the record showing at what time or under what circumstances the indorsement was made on the envelope. The material question is what was the intent or purpose of Patillo at the very time he delivered the deed to Simpson. Whatever purpose he may have had before that time inconsistent with the purpose he had at the time he deposited the deed with Simpson is immaterial to the vital question. If the indorsement may be given the dignity of a written contract, or a written memorandum of instruction, it certainly can have no greater dignity than such.

[9] It is competent to show by parol that a written contract entered into with all the solemnity of the law has been abandoned by the parties. Whatever intention Patillo might have had before he handed the sealed envelope with its contents to Simpson with reference to the disposition of the deed inconsistent with the instruction then given him must be treated as abandoned. The testimony was competent, and is conclusive of the issue as to the grantor's intent to deliver the deed to the grantees therein. Steffan v. Bank, 69 Tex.

517, 6 S. W. 823; Hubbard v. Cox, 76 Tex. 244, 13 S. W. 170.

[10] The questions considered by this court have been those of law growing out of the facts as found by the honorable Court of Civil Appeals, and, as we construe the legal effect of such facts, the deed in question was executed and delivered by the grantor to the bank in escrow to be delivered to the grantees therein after the death of the grantor, and such delivery, having been made upon the happening of the contingency, related back so as to divest the title of the grantor by relation from the first delivery. Bury v. Young, 98 Cal. 446, 33 Pac. 338, 35 Am. St. Rep. 188. In view of the law applicable to the facts of this case, as we understand it, and as we have herein declared it to be, there remains to us no alternative but to reverse the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals, and affirm that of the trial court. The issues were all fairly and properly presented to the jury by the trial judge, and we see no reason why that judgment should be disturbed.

The judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals will therefore be reversed, and that of the trial court affirmed; and it is accordingly so ordered.

BURFORD v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Nov. 27, 1912.)

1. INCEST (§ 14*)—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Where accused, charged with incest with his stepdaughter, had been married prior to his marriage to the mother of prosecutrix, the state should clearly show that at the time of the second marriage his first wife was dead, or that the first marriage had been annulled.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Incest, Cent. Dig. § 12; Dec. Dig. § 14.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 600*)—CONTINUANCE—ABSENCE OF WITNESSES—ADMISSION BY STATE.

The state, to avoid a continuance on the ground of the absence of a witness for accused, must admit, not only that the absent witness would, if present, testify as stated, but must admit that the testimony is true.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1842-1847, 1604; Dec. Dig. § 600.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 507*)—ACCOMPLICE—EVIDENCE—CORROBORATION.

Where, on a trial for incest, prosecutrix testified that she submitted through fear, but the evidence disclosed that the relations had existed for more than three years, and that she had voluntarily taken trips to other counties with accused, and had occupied the same room with him at hotels, without making any outcry, she was an accomplice, as a matter of law, and, to support a conviction, her testimony must be corroborated in a way tending to connect accused with the offense on the occasion alleged.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1082-1096, 1098; Dec. Dig. § 507.*]

Appeal from District Court, Reeves County; S. J. Isaacks, Judge.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

W. H. Burford was convicted of incest, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Gibson & Wilson, of Pecos, and J. E. Starley, of Bartow, for appellant. O. E. Lane, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

HARPER, J. Appellant was indicted for incest, having carnal knowledge of his stepdaughter, Miss Willie Boyd.

[1] One of the serious questions raised in the case is that the record contains no proof that appellant's first wife was dead, or he had been divorced from her. That he married his second wife is amply proven, he testifying: "I am the husband of Mrs. Alice Burford [the mother of the prosecuting witness]. We have been married something like 17 years. I have six children, but one of them is by my first wife. He is a boy 21 years old, living in the Indian Territory." As the record clearly disclosed that appellant had been married prior to his marriage to the mother of the prosecuting witness, on another trial it should be made clear that at the time of his second marriage his first wife was dead, or the marriage had been annulled. McGrew v. State, 13 Tex. App. 342. It might be said that the circumstances, admission of appellant, etc., are sufficient to establish this fact; but, as the case will be reversed on other grounds, we call attention to it, so this evidence may be made more full.

[2] When the case was called for trial, the appellant moved to continue on account of the absence of the present Mrs. Burford, who had been regularly summoned. Some of the testimony he proposed to prove by this witness was material. The state sought to avoid the force of the application by admitting, if she was present, she would testify as stated. This is an insufficient admission. The state must admit that the testimony is true, or the continuance should be granted.

[3] The court charged the jury: "Where a female and a male are prohibited by law from carnally knowing each other, as given you in charge in paragraph 1 hereof, and the female should unite with the male in having an incestuous intercourse, involuntarily and unwillingly, and only because of fear or intimidation unite with him in the commission of the carnal act, then in such instance the female would not be an accomplice in law." The defendant requested a special instruction, which was refused, instructing the jury that the prosecuting witnesses was an accomplice, and before they would be authorized to convict they must find, from the testimony, other testimony tending to prove the act of carnal intercourse charged in the indictment. While it is true that the prosecuting witness testified that she submitted through fear at the time she says the act of intercourse took place on which this prosecution is based, yet, if her testimony is to be accepted as true, the relations had existed for more than three years. Appellant had taken her to El Paso with him, had taken her to the Dallas fair, had taken her to Ft. Worth, where they stopped at the Richelieu hotel, both occupying the same room, and at no time had she made an outcry. These facts, as she had voluntarily gone with appellant on these trips, would, where the course of conduct had lasted for such great length of time, make her an accomplice in law, and the paragraph of the court's charge complained of should not have been given, but the jury should have been instructed that she was an accomplice, and her testimony must be corroborated in a way tending to connect defendant with the offense on the occasion alleged; for, even though the evidence should show he had incestuous intercourse with her in Ft. Worth, El Paso, or Dallas, yet appellant could not be indicted, prosecuted, and convicted of these offenses in Reeves county.

There are other grounds stated in the motion for new trial; but we do not deem it necessary to discuss them at this time. On account of the above errors, this judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

CARPENTER v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Nov. 27, 1912.)

CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1172*)—HARMLESS ERROR—ERRONEOUS INSTRUCTIONS.

Where accused, on trial for carrying a pistol, did not have any authority from the sheriff to carry it, and the evidence of threats only showed threats generally, long before the date of the offense, and the court charged that if accused, on the occasion, had reasonable ground for fearing an unlawful attack, and the danger was so threatening as not to admit of the arrest of the person about to make the attack, he should be acquitted, and that the law permits one to carry a pistol when his life is threatened, and he believes honestly that the threats will be executed, any error in a charge, that if accused, when he carried the pistol, had not been called on by any officer to assist in suppressing an unlawful assembly he should be convicted, was not prejudicial, since, in view of the evidence and the other instructions, no other verdict than that of guilty could properly be rendered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3128, 3154-3157, 3159-3163, 3169; Dec. Dig. § 1172.*]

Appeal from Frio County Court; S. T. Dowe, Judge.

Frank P. Carpenter was convicted for unlawfully carrying a pistol, and he appeals. Affirmed.

John T. Bivins and Magus Smith, both of Pearsall, for appellant. O. E. Lane, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

PRENDERGAST, J. Appellant was convicted for unlawfully carrying a pistol on April 25, 1911, and fined $100, the lowest penalty.

The uncontradicted evidence shows that on April 25, 1911, appellant went to the town of Dilley, in Frio county, in his buggy. After reaching there, he went to the depot, received a shipment of intoxicating liquors, proceeded to "tank up" on it, got pretty drunk, and then went over to the store of Mr. Crawford, where he and his clerk were, and raised a row with Mr. Crawford, because he claimed that Crawford had charged some of the Mexicans living on his place 20 cents each too much on three sacks of flour, and then told Crawford that he (appellant) had a pistol, and that Crawford had better get his; that he then went from this store out to his buggy, where his pistol was, got it, stuck it in his pants, and proceeded to go back into the town to the bank building. Swink, Crawford's clerk, who was present at the time he raised a row with Crawford and told him to get his pistol, hearing later that appellant had his pistol on, went out, hunted him up, and asked him if he had a pistol. Appellant replied he did, and upon the request of this clerk, who was a special friend of appellant, he gave the pistol to him. As stated above, this was the uncontradicted evidence, and was appellant's evidence on the trial.

Appellant's claim and defense was that he had a right to carry a pistol, had done so for years, and nobody had questioned his right to do so up to this time. There is no proof in the record whatever that he was ever seen by any one at any other time and place with a pistol, although appellant claimed that he had carried it about his person for several years. He testified that several years before this, while Mr. Kinsel was sheriff, Kinsel gave him a deputyship, which had expired several years before this occurrence, when that sheriff went out of office; that when Mr. Riggan, the next sheriff, came in he applied to him for a deputyship, stating to him that Mexicans in his neighborhood were stealing hogs and yearlings, and that they needed an officer out there; that this sheriff declined to appoint him as deputy, stating that he had already the number of deputies allowed by law and could not appoint him, and did not appoint appellant, but told him that if he caught anybody stealing hogs or yearlings to arrest them, and he would protect him; that afterwards, when the present sheriff, Hess, went into office on December 17, 1910, he applied to him for a deputyship, stating substantially the same thing to Mr. Hess; that Mr. Hess declined to appoint him for the same reason that his predecessor had declined; that after he got drunk and had this row with Mr. Crawford and had the pistol on his person in the town of Dilley, as shown above, some of his friends advised him that he had better get a written deputyship from the present sheriff, Mr. Hess, and have it dated back to December 17, 1910, so as to cover this particular time; that he thereupon went with his friend to the county seat, some 17 miles distant, applied to the sheriff for such deputyship, wanting it in writing and dated back as shown, not stating to the sheriff anything about the row and trouble of the day before. The sheriff declined to appoint him, but told him that if he found any Mexicans stealing hogs or cattle to arrest them, and he would protect him in making such arrests. Later in the day Mr. Hess, having been telephoned about the row of the previous day, immediately wrote appellant, even countermanding what he had told him the day before, that he would protect him in making arrests. At no time and in no way did Sheriff Hess or his predecessor give appellant any authority whatever to carry a pistol on any occasion, as shown by the testimony of this sheriff and ex-sheriff, and appellant, too, on this trial.

Appellant also claimed and testified that various persons had, some time before this row with Mr. Crawford, told him (appellant) that Mexicans in his neighborhood had made some serious threats against appellant, not stating what they were and in no way identifying any Mexican or Mexicans. All this is shown to have occurred long prior to carrying a pistol on this occasion. The court permitted him to testify to this, and to prove by other witnesses that they had so heard and told appellant prior to this occurrence; but they all, as well as appellant, stated that they could not identify any Mexican or Mexicans who had made any such threats, nor what such threats were, nor the occasion for them. Appellant, however, claimed that the cause of such matters was his activity, long prior thereto, in prosecuting Mexicans for theft of hogs and cattle. As stated above, neither appellant nor any of his witnesses could tell what Mexican or Mexicans had made any threats, nor what the threats were; and none of them attempted to show that appellant was in any immediate or other danger, on the occasion on which he carried the pistol, from any Mexican or Mexicans, except the general statement above.

The court, in a correct charge, submitted all these questions to the jury as favorably, if not more so, to appellant as the law authorized. In his charge he required the jury to believe all the necessary facts to show appellant's violation of the law before they could find him guilty, and submitted to them, in substance and in effect, that if appellant, on the occasion on which he carried the pistol, had reasonable grounds for fearing an unlawful attack upon his person, and that the danger therefrom was so threatening and imminent as not to admit of the arrest of the person about to make such attack, to find him not guilty. Again, that if any of these threats were to take the life of appellant, and were communicated to him at and prior to his carrying a pistol on this occasion, and that there was danger of such threats being carried into execution before he could have the parties arrested, that he would not be guilty, and to find him not guilty. And, in addition, gave one of appellant's special charges, as requested by him, to the effect that the law permits a person to carry a pistol when his life is threatened by any person or persons, or great bodily harm to him was threatened by any person or persons, and that if he believed honestly that the said threats would be executed that he had a right to carry a pistol to defend himself until he had an opportunity to have such persons arrested, and his right thus existed so long as he was not out of danger from such threats; and if the jury believed that he was threatened by parties unknown to him he would have a perfect right to carry arms on or about his person to protect himself until he could have them arrested; and if the jury so believed, or had a reasonable doubt on that point, to give him the benefit of it and acquit him.

It is unnecessary to take up and discuss separately any of appellant's claimed errors. We have made above a correct statement substantially embracing the facts and charge of the court.

The court, at the instance of the state, did give one special charge which should not have been given, to the effect that if, on the occasion in which appellant carried this pistol, he had not been called upon by any officer to assist in suppressing an unlawful assembly or disturbance, to convict him. The evidence may not have called for any such charge; but, in view of the evidence and the other charges of the court correctly submitting the questions to the jury, no other verdict than that of guilty was authorized, or could have been found properly by the jury. The lowest penalty having been inflicted, no injury occurred because of the court's giving this charge.

We have considered all of appellant's claimed errors, and find that none of them would justify this court to reverse this case. The judgment is affirmed.

TATE v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Nov. 27, 1912.)

CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1131*)—APPEAL—DISMISSAL.

Where defendant, after appealing from a conviction and filing the transcript, escapes from custody, the appeal will be dismissed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2971-2979, 2985; Dec. Dig. § 1131.*]

Appeal from District Court, Smith County; R. W. Simpson, Judge.

Tom Tate was convicted of murder in the first degree, and he appeals. Dismissed.

N. A. Gentry and J. S. McIlwaine, both of Tyler, for appellant. W. W. Sanders, Dist. Atty., of Gilmer, and C. E. Lane, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

DAVIDSON, P. J. This case was appealed from a conviction for murder in the first degree, with the death penalty assessed. Since filing the transcript or record in this court, appellant has escaped from custody. Satisfactory proof is made to appear by the affidavits of the officer having him in charge.

On account of said escape, the appeal herein is dismissed.

SERSON v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Nov. 27, 1912.)

CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1097*)—APPEAL—AFFIRMANCE—NECESSITY OF BILLS OF EXCEPTION—STATEMENT OF FACTS.

Where the motion for a new trial raised questions which could only be considered in connection with bills of exception or statement of facts, the conviction must be affirmed in the absence of such instruments.

Appeal from District Court, Grayson County; J. M. Pearson, Judge.

Marie Serson was convicted of theft from the person, and she appeals. Affirmed.

C. E. Lane, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

PRENDERGAST, J. The appellant was convicted of the offense of theft from the person, and her punishment fixed at three years in the penitentiary. There is no statement of facts nor bill of exception. There is no question raised or attempted to be raised by the motion for new trial which we can consider without a statement of facts.

Therefore the judgment is affirmed.

KINCAID v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Nov. 27, 1912.)

CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1097*)—APPEAL—STATEMENT OF FACTS—QUESTIONS REVIEWABLE.

Questions presented in the motion for new trial are not reviewable, where there is no statement of facts in the record.

Appeal from Red River County Court; George Morrison, Judge.

Sam Kincaid was convicted of crime, and he appeals. Affirmed.

C. E. Lane, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

HARPER, J. Under an indictment charging him with violating the local option law appellant was tried and convicted. No statement of facts accompany the record, and under such circumstances we are unable to review any question presented in the motion for new trial.

The judgment is affirmed.

WILLIAMS v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Nov. 27, 1912.)

CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1097*)—APPEAL—REFUSAL OF INSTRUCTIONS—RECORD—REVIEW.

Where there is no statement of facts in the record, refusal of a requested charge is not reviewable; and the presumption is that the court, in submitting the offense charged, properly submitted the case.

Appeal from Harrison County Court; Geo. L. Huffman, Judge.

Roy Williams was convicted of crime, and he appeals. Affirmed.

C. E. Lane, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

HARPER, J. Appellant was prosecuted under an information and complaint charging him with unlawfully carrying a pistol, and his punishment assessed at eight months' confinement in jail.

There are neither a statement of facts nor any bill of exceptions accompanying the record. The information charges an offense, and the charge of the court submits this offense to the jury. A number of special charges were requested, but in the absence of a statement of facts we are unable to say whether or not they should have been given; the presumption being that the court properly submitted the case to the jury.

The judgment is affirmed.

BELLEW v. STATE.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 956*)—NEW TRIAL—GROUNDS.

Where the record did not show the affidavit of accused, or of a witness, that the latter would testify as claimed by accused in his motion for new trial, and accused, trying the case without the assistance of an attorney, did not account for his failure to have the witness so testify at the trial, otherwise than by the unsworn statement in the motion that he did not know how to bring out his defense, a new trial was properly denied, in the absence of any showing why he was not represented on the trial by an attorney.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2373-2391; Dec. Dig. § 956.*]

Appeal from District Court, Briscoe County; R. C. Joiner, Special Judge.

Halleck Bellew, alias Blue Boy, was convicted of burglary, and he appeals. Affirmed.

J. E. Daniel, of Silverton, for appellant.
C. E. Lane, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

PRENDERGAST, J. The appellant was indicted, convicted, and given the lowest penalty for nighttime burglary of a store belonging to one Fawcett.

It seems he had no attorney to represent him on the trial of the case in the court below until after his conviction. Why this was is not disclosed by the record. It does not show that he requested or desired an attorney to be appointed by the court to represent him on the trial. After his conviction it seems he succeeded in procuring attorneys to file a motion for new trial for him. The attorneys who filed this motion are different from his attorney who now represents him on this appeal. The motion for new trial sets up only three grounds: First, that the paragraph of the court's charge on the law of accomplice is error, in that it authorized his conviction if the testimony tended to prove the commission of an offense and his connection therewith; second, because the evidence is insufficient to show he had any knowledge that an offense was about to be committed on the night of the burglary, or that one had been committed until some time thereafter, and was not told by any of the guilty parties that an offense had been or was about to be committed, and it does not show that he participated in the commission of the offense; third, that he was not represented by counsel, and did not know how to bring out his defense, and he now tenders proof from the accomplice Tal Watkins that he knew nothing whatever about the commission of the offense, and that said Watkins would have so testified if he had been asked to do so. The record shows that said Watkins testified on the trial. The court specifically charged that he was an accomplice. The charge is in almost literal compliance with that in the case of Tucker v. State, 58 Tex. Cr. R. 271, 124 S. W. 904, which was specifically held correct in that case. We think the charge of the court on the subject is not fatally defective as claimed by appellant, and is in substantial compliance with the statute and the decisions on the subject.

[1] The evidence is not very strong. The case seems, for some reason, not to have been fully developed. We have gone over it several times carefully, and in our opinion it was sufficient to justify the verdict, and this court would not be justified in holding otherwise. It sufficiently shows that on the night charged the storehouse of said Fawcett was burglarized, and several pairs of gloves stolen out of it by the burglars at the time; that the house was by force actually entered by said Watkins and Dave Miller, they taking the gloves out of the house at the time, and immediately taking them and putting them in appellant's buggy. He (appellant) had driven with these two persons up close to the back of this store, and waited there in his buggy until they went, broke into the store, stole from and brought and put in his buggy the stolen gloves; that those two persons then got in the buggy with him, and he drove away from the store and the little town; that other boys on horseback, with whom these three persons had been more or less during that night, also rode off following the buggy; that, when they got about half a mile from the town, they all stopped, one of the party took the gloves out of the buggy, distributed to each of them, including appellant, one pair thereof, and that one of them then took all the remainder of the gloves, and hid them in the trunk of one of the boys along with them that night. The next day, when the offense was being investigated, he took the gloves out of this trunk and hid them under cotton seed hulls in a feed pen, where they were afterwards, together with those gloves that had been distributed to the various parties, including appellant, recovered. The owner of the store and his wife both testified that the property which was taken out of their store was without their knowledge and consent, and they specifically testified that they did not give the appellant or either of the persons who actually entered the house permission or authority to do so. The evidence further shows that for some time that night prior to the actual burglary several other boys besides appellant and his two companions who went around back and forth and away with him in his buggy were back and forth over the town to a church, some of them going in, others not, but, upon the whole, the evidence sufficiently shows that appellant's immediate companions during all this time were the two persons who were shown to have gone with him in his buggy to the back of the burglarized store and remained therein until they committed the burglary and the theft, and brought the goods back and placed them in his buggy, and immediately, upon their doing so, the three in the buggy drove off together, and stayed together until after the distribution of the gloves as shown above. This is also shown to have occurred on a bright moonlight night, and we take it the jury was justified in concluding that he saw and knew all that was done and being done, and was a party thereto at the time of the burglary and theft and distribution of the stolen goods. The evidence was further sufficient to justify the jury to believe and find that the gloves that were distributed, and the pair that appellant himself received and got, were identified by the Fawcetts as the goods that were stolen out of their house the night of the burglary.

[2] The record shows that said accomplice, Tal Watkins, was the first witness introduced by the state. Of course, appellant was present, and heard his testimony. He had the right to cross-examine him if he so desired. It seems he did cross-examine another witness, and that he himself introduced still another in his own behalf after the state had rested. Nowhere in the record is it shown or attempted to be shown by either the affidavit of the appellant, or of said witness Watkins, that he would have testified as claimed by appellant in his motion for new trial, and he in no way accounts for his failure to have him so testify, if he would, otherwise than the unsworn statement in the motion, that he was not represented by counsel, and did not know how to bring out his defense.

In our opinion no reversible error is shown, and the judgment will be affirmed.

STAHA v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Nov. 27, 1912.)

LARCENY (§ 32*)—PROSECUTION—OWNERSHIP—CUSTODY.

Although the keeper of an automobile garage had the care of a machine which was left there when not in use by the owner, his care or custody of the machine did not constitute ownership for the purpose of the allegation of ownership and taking without consent in a prosecution for theft of a part of a machine.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Larceny, Cent. Dig. §§ 81-92, 99; Dec. Dig. § 32.*]

Appeal from Lavaca County Court; P. H. Green, Judge.

Vall Staha was convicted of theft, and he appeals. Affirmed.

C. E. Lane, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

DAVIDSON, P. J. Appellant was convicted of theft; his punishment being assessed at a fine of $5 and 20 days' imprisonment in the county jail.

There are two theories in the case, one showing criminality, and the other showing innocent possession of the property appellant was charged with taking. We deem it unnecessary to go into the statement of facts to collate the evidence pro and con on this question.

It is contended that the evidence does not support the allegation in the information that Ragsdale was the owner of the property. The property taken was a generator from an automobile. It was in the garage belonging to a man whose name was Drozd, and appellant had an automobile in the same garage, which seems to have been in a bad condition, and was sold to him as a worn-out vehicle. It did not have a generator. Appellant went in the garage at night after his auto, which he had a right to do, and hauled it out. When in there he says he picked up the generator lying on the ground, thinking it belonged to his machine. The evidence for the state, on the contrary, is that it belonged to Ragsdale's machine and was lying over on his machine, and not where appellant claimed it was. There it testimony also that appellant sold the generator to another party. Drozd was in charge of the garage, and it belonged to him, and the Ragsdale machine was in this garage. It seems that when Ragsdale was not using the machine he kept it there. The contention is that this made Drozd the owner of it, having care, custody, and control. We do not believe this position is sound under the authorities. Mere custody as this was does not constitute that character of control, care, and management that constitutes ownership or authorizes the allegation of ownership for want of consent, etc. See Branch's Crim. Laws of Texas, § 785. Mere custody is not possession. Thomas v. State, 1 Tex. App. 289; Garling v. State, 2 Tex. App. 44; Bailey v. State, 18 Tex. App. 426; Clark v. State, 23 Tex. App. 614, 5 S. W. 178; Hawkins v. State, 20 S. W. 830; Graves v. State, 42 S. W. 300; Willis v. State, 44 S. W. 826; Odell v. State, 44 Tex. Cr. R. 310, 70 S. W. 964; Byrd v. State, 49 Tex. Cr. R. 279, 93 S. W. 114; King v. State, 100 S. W. 387; Bryan v. State, 54 Tex. Cr. R. 59, 111 S. W. 1035; Russell v. State, 55 Tex. Cr. R. 330, 116 S. W. 573.

The most that can be said, we think, of the possession of the owner of the garage, was that he was the custodian of the machine; that he in no sense had any care, control, or management of it such as to constitute him the owner of it in law in theft cases. Neither he nor Mr. Ragsdale testified to any such ownership. It seems from Ragsdale's testimony that when he was not using the machine he kept it in this garage as protection against the weather, etc. There is no fact indicating that he ever turned over this machine to be handled, used, and controlled by the owner of the garage. It was just there on account of the convenience and protection of it for Mr. Ragsdale, the owner.

We are of opinion there is no such error in this record as requires a reversal of the judgment. Therefore it is ordered to be affirmed.

FISHER v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Nov. 27, 1912.)

ASSAULT AND BATTERY (§ 56*) — "ASSAULT WITH DEADLY WEAPON"—WHAT CONSTITUTES.

In a prosecution for assault, where the weapon used was not a deadly one in itself, the question whether the assault was one with a deadly weapon depends on its use; and an assault with an ordinary saw was not an "assault with a deadly weapon," where the injuries inflicted were very slight.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assault and Battery, Cent. Dig. §§ 80, 81; Dec. Dig. § 56.*

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 1, p. 540.]

Appeal from Collin County Court; H. L. Davis, Judge.

R. C. Fisher was convicted of aggravated assault and battery, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

F. E. Wilcox and W. R. Abernathy, both of McKinney, for appellant. Q. E. Lane, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

DAVIDSON, P. J. Appellant was convicted of aggravated assault and battery; his punishment being assessed at a fine of $50.

The record is rather extensive in detailing the facts; but it discloses, in substance, that appellant had made a purchase of some hogs and carried them to the depot for the purpose of shipping them. The alleged assaulted party was J. D. Killough, the depot agent. Appellant approached him with reference to obtaining transportation for his hogs. Killough was somewhat discourteous, and appellant went away. Later the same evening appellant returned, and Killough did not give him any satisfaction about the matter, and some hot words ensued. Appellant claims that Killough went to the drawer in the agent's office to get a pistol, and did, in fact, get the pistol, and he (appellant) left. The state's evidence denies that Killough got the pistol, but states that he went to the drawer and pulled it out, but did not secure a pistol. The matter went on in this way from Monday until Wednesday, when appellant went to the stock pens at the depot and began preparations to ship his hogs. At the time Killough came upon him, or went to where he was, appellant was sawing some planks about the pens, with a view of making a chute by which he could get his hogs into a car. Killough came upon him and began to upbraid him about sawing the lumber. Appellant and Killough both testified in the case. Their statements are at variance. Killough says he did not know that appellant was at the pen at the time he went there to look after his cow and calf, which were also about the pen, but he came upon appellant sawing the planks with which the pen was made and upbraided him for it, and appellant, after some wordy altercation, struck him on the head with a handsaw which he was using. He denied taking hold of appellant. Appellant's contention is—and he sustains it with evidence of his own and that of another witness—that he was preparing a chute by which to convey his hogs into a car, when Killough left the depot and came down and raised trouble with him, and as he approached him he caught him (appellant) by the throat or collar with his left hand, running his right hand in his pocket; whereupon he struck back and hit Killough, and the blow fell upon Killough's head. He claims he only struck twice. The evidence is in conflict, however, at this point as to whether there were two or three licks struck. When the combat ended, Killough had a cut on his head something like five inches long, a scalp wound, the bones not being in any way injured or hurt; also had a wound on his left hand and a slight one on his right arm. The doctor says the wound on the right arm amounted to nothing. The other wounds were not serious. The physician, Dr. Mathers, who attended Killough, stated that he was up in a couple of days and about his business. The saw appellant was using sawing plank was what is termed by the witness an ordinary No. 8 saw. There is some evidence going to show that one lick from the saw produced the wound on the head and the one on the left hand. There is also evidence showing that the teeth or that part of the saw used in sawing was the part of the instrument that came in contact with Killough's head and hand.

There were two counts in the indictment. The court submitted that which charged the assault was committed with a deadly weapon. Under the authorities, with the proof in this record, this saw did not constitute a deadly weapon. Where a weapon is not a deadly one per se, that it would depend upon its use, etc., as to whether it was a deadly weapon or not. The wounds were not serious, and there is no evidence from any witness that the saw was a deadly weapon; and it is not a deadly weapon per se. For collation of authorities sustaining this contention, see Branch's Crim. Law, § 82. Many cases are collated by Mr. Branch, and we deem it unnecessary to recite them in the opinion.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded.

YARBROUGH v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Nov. 27, 1912.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 552*)—EVIDENCE—CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE.

To support a conviction on circumstantial evidence, each fact necessary to establish guilt must be proven, and the facts and circumstances must not only be consistent with guilt but inconsistent with any other reasonable hypothesis.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1257, 1259-1262; Dec. Dig. § 552.*]

2. LARCENY (§ 55*)—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Larceny, Cent. Dig. §§ 152, 164, 165, 167-169; Dec. Dig. § 55.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 552*)—EVIDENCE—SUSPICIOUS CIRCUMSTANCES.

Suspicious circumstances alone are not sufficient upon which to base a conviction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1257, 1259-1262; Dec. Dig. § 552.*]

Appeal from District Court, Camp County; R. W. Simpson, Judge.

Wilson Yarbrough was convicted of theft, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

King & Engledow, of Pittsburg, for appellant. C. E. Lane, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

HARPER, J. Appellant was prosecuted and convicted of theft, and his punishment assessed at two years' confinement in the penitentiary.

[1] There is but one serious question in the case—the sufficiency of the evidence. It is a case of circumstantial evidence, and the rule of law is in that character of case each fact necessary to establish guilt must be proven, and the facts and circumstances not only consistent with his guilt but inconsistent with any other reasonable hypothesis.

[2] In this case the facts show that Will Thomas had his money stolen. He went into a tailor shop, pulled out his purse, and laid it on the counter. He and his cousin and the proprietor went to the rear of the store. While in the rear department, appellant entered the store, passed by the counter on which the purse had been placed, and subsequently went out of the store. Another man also entered the store and passed the counter where the money had been laid down. All the witnesses describe this man as a stranger, no witness knowing his name; but the state's witnesses all place him in the store as well as defendant's. Thus an opportunity was offered for either appellant or the stranger to take the purse. When its loss was discovered, both appellant and the stranger were searched; but the money and purse were not found, and had not been found when this case was tried. Appellant's cousin, who also had an opportunity to take the purse, was not searched, as he was not suspected. This cousin testified on the trial and says he did not get the money; appellant also testified and swears he did not get the money. But the stranger who entered the store building is not located and does not testify. Applying the "rule of exclusion," does the evidence meet the requirement of the law? It is true appellant had ample opportunity to take the purse and money, but so did the stranger and the cousin of appellant. Many suspicious circumstances are also introduced in evidence, showing that appellant lied about his whereabouts from the time he entered the store until he was searched; but he was in no way connected with the money and the purse further than to show he had an opportunity to take it as did the others. We think, to render sufficient the evidence in the absence of finding any stolen property, in a case depending entirely on circumstances, it would have been necessary to show that appellant, and appellant alone, was in such juxtaposition tion to the property as that he, and he alone, could have stolen it, or positively to have shown the others did not do so.

[3] Suspicious circumstances alone are not sufficient upon which to base a conviction. The circumstances must unerringly point out the defendant as the guilty person, when circumstantial evidence is relied on. Brooks v. State, 56 Tex. Cr. R. 513, 120 S. W. 878; Johnson v. State, 52 Tex. Cr. R. 510, 107 S. W. 845; Green v. State, 59 Tex. Cr. R. 6, 127 S. W. 549; Hogan v. State, 13 Tex. App. 319; section 206, Branch's Criminal Law.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

Appeal from District Court, Houston County; B. H. Gardner, Judge.

John Pugh was convicted of murder in the second degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

J. W. Madden and C. M. Ellis, both of Crockett, for appellant. O. E. Lane, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

HARPER, J. Appellant was indicted, charged with murder, and convicted of murder in the second degree, and his punishment assessed at five years' confinement in the state penitentiary. In appellant's first, second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, twenty-first, twenty-second, and twenty-third assignments of error is presented the question of the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict, in some of them it being alleged that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict, and in others that the verdict is contrary to the law as given in charge to the jury. Appellant groups them in his brief, and we do so, for, if either present grounds of reversal, the whole case must fall.

[1] That appellant killed the deceased is not denied, but it is earnestly insisted that the killing was done under such circumstances that he was justifiable as a matter of law. It appears that deceased was a constable of a precinct in Houston county, and had detected appellant, with others, gambling, and reported them. On this occasion appellant refused to submit to arrest. Later, when tried, appellant had a fight with the deputy sheriff about his fine. Between the time of appellant's detection in the gambling game and this killing appellant was heard to remark that he had two shells in his gun, one for deceased and the other for the deputy sheriff. On the day of the killing appellant used very abusive language, and made threats about what he was going to do to deceased. This, of course, is all from the state's evidence, and the truth of which was passed on by the jury, and we mention it solely on the ground of whether or not the testimony was sufficient to sustain the verdict, and whether the verdict was contrary to the charge of the court.

After making these threats, it is shown by John Bobbitt that he was present at the time of the shooting, and he says: "This shooting was done in Jake Gregg's storehouse in Weeches, Houston county, Tex. I don't know what time of day it was, but it was late in the evening, after the noon hour and before dark. I do not know what caused the trouble, and the first I do know about it I was sitting on a counter in Jake Gregg's storehouse, and I heard Jim Bobbitt, my brother, tell Luther Shaw to turn him loose, and I looked up that way, and John Pugh was coming down the aisle, and I started up there to where Jim Bobbitt was, and I passed John Pugh, and John Pugh went in behind the counter, and I taken hold of Jim, and me and him started on to the front door, and just as we got a little passed the counter I heard a gun cock, and I looked back that way, and seen the gun coming up over the counter in that position, and I just spoke to Jim and said, 'Jim, look out,' or 'Look there,' or something to that effect, and Jim kind o' turned his head that way, and, as he did so the gun come on up, and, as it did, I thought he was going to shoot him, and I turned my head away and made a step, but he didn't shoot him, and I turned back, and, as I turned back, the gun shot and Jim was falling."

Harvey Smith testified: "He [John Bobbitt] wasn't standing when I saw him, and he wasn't sitting either. He was walking right behind Jim Bobbitt, going towards the front door. I reckon they had passed what you would call the middle of the house; and they were going towards the front door. Both of them were facing me, and I was on the inside of the door. They were coming, facing me, both of them. Jim Bobbitt was ahead and John Bobbitt was behind. They were on the left-hand side of the house as you went in at the front door, coming up the aisle next to the counter on the left-hand side of the house as you go in the front door. Then Jim Bobbitt was killed. John Bobbitt was right behind Jim Bobbitt. Jim Bobbitt was kind o' facing the door when he was shot, but he looked around towards the gun just as he was shot. I saw him when he looked around. I saw the gun when it fired. I don't know just how far he was from the gun, but I would guess two or three feet. I don't know how far he was from the front door, but he was something about 12 feet, I suppose." If the jury believed the theory of the state, based on the testimony of these two witnesses and other facts and circumstances in the case, appellant was not justifiable in the shooting, and the testimony would amply support the verdict of the jury.

The state introduced in its original testimony only John Bobbitt as to the facts and circumstances at the time of and immediately preceding the killing. When the state rested, the defendant filed a motion asking that the state be required to introduce all the eyewitnesses to the transaction. This motion was by the court overruled, and of this ruling of the court appellant complains in his eighth, ninth, tenth, eleventh, twelfth, thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth assignments of error. Under the common law, as the defendant could not introduce any testimony, a rule of law was sanctioned where by motion filed the defendant could require the state to introduce all eyewitnesses to the transaction. In this state there has never been any reason for such rule, and it has never prevailed. When the state has closed its testimony; a defendant can introduce such testimony as he desires, and such of the eyewitnesses as the state does not introduce he can call if he desires to do so.

In his sixteenth, seventeenth, and eighteenth assignments of error appellant complains of the action of the court in overrul-ing his motion to strike out all the testimony adduced down to the time the state closed its case.

[2] If such motion was made, no bill of exceptions was reserved to the action of the court in refusing to do so, consequently the matter is not presented in a way we can review it. However, if it was properly presented, under article 698 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, this court has held that the trial court has a wide discretion in the order of admitting testimony.

[3] The testimony of the other eyewitnesses was relied on by appellant to prove that he acted in self-defense, and it would not have been proper for the court to have required the state to introduce this testimony and vouch for it. The court in this instance stated to appellant he would not require the state to place the witnesses on the stand, but, if it was desired, the court would place the eyewitnesses on the stand, thus relieving the defendant of the burden of vouching for them, and the court did place Shaw on the stand, and tendered him to both the state and defendant, and this witness did testify, being rigidly examined both by the state and defendant. The court in so doing evinced a spirit of fairness, and his action is not subject to criticism in this respect. Appellant cites us to the cases of Hunnicutt v. State, 20 Tex. App. 634, and Thompson v. State, 30 Tex. App. 325, 17 S. W. 448. In the Thompson Case it was held that, if the state undertook to make its case wholly by circumstantial evidence, it would be proper to require the state to introduce some of the eyewitnesses. In this case the state did not rely wholly on circumstantial evidence, and did introduce one eyewitness, and the way he detailed events at the time of the killing is wholly at variance with the testimony of the other eyewitnesses, and yet the jury seems to have accepted his version. In the Hunnicutt Case Judge White is expressing his individual opinion and so states, and was not speaking for the court, and the views thus expressed never became the law of this state; the reason for the contrary rule being well expressed by Presiding Judge Davidson in the case of Reynolds v. State, 33 Tex. Cr. R. 144, 25 S. W. 786, 47 Am. St. Rep. 25. See, also, McCandless v. State, 42 Tex. Cr. R. 655, 62 S. W. 746; Mayer v. State, 33 Tex. Cr. R. 33, 24 S. W. 421; Kidwell v. State, 35 Tex. Cr. R. 264, 33 S. W. 342; Darter v. State, 39 Tex. Cr. R. 40, 44 S. W. 850; Wheells v. State, 23 Tex. App. 245, 5 S. W. 224.

If the evidence offered on behalf of appellant had been believed by the jury, it would have presented a case of self-defense. However, the court in his charge presents that question to the jury very favorably to defendant, and, in addition thereto, gave at appellant's instance the two following special charges:

"You are instructed that if you believe from the evidence in this case that the defendant and the deceased, Jim Bobbitt, had settled their troubles and differences by mutual agreement before the said Bobbitt was shot, and that the defendant had put his gun away in pursuance of said agreement, believing in, and acting upon, the good faith of the said Bobbitt in making the said agreement, and that thereafter the said Bobbitt violated his said agreement, and brought on further trouble between himself and the defendant by attacking the defendant and challenging him to further trouble by telling him to 'get his gun,' and that he pursued the defendant to where the defendant had put his gun, with his pistol in his hand, and that the defendant then shot the said Bobbitt under the belief that the said Bobbitt intended to kill him, or inflict upon him serious bodily injury, then and in that case you will find the defendant not guilty. And in determining this question you will pass on the same from the standpoint of the defendant as the appearance of danger may have reasonably appeared to him at the time of the shooting, although you may believe there was no real danger of such injury.

"You are instructed that if you believe from the evidence in this case that at the time of the killing the deceased was the aggressor, and that he brought on the trouble between himself and the defendant in the house where he was killed, and conducted himself in such way as to lead the defendant to believe that he meant to kill the defendant, or to inflict upon him serious bodily injury, and that, under such belief, the defendant shot and killed the deceased, then and in that case you will find the defendant not guilty, and you will so find whether you believe there was any real danger or not, and whether any previous agreement to settle their troubles was made or not, and whether you believe the defendant had previously threatened the life of the deceased or not."

Thus in two special charges the court directed the attention of the jury to the real issue in the case as made by the testimony offered in behalf of defendant. If, as the state's witnesses testify, deceased was walking away from appellant at the time he was shot, defendant was not justified in killing him. On the other hand, the defendant's witnesses would have deceased raising the trouble at this particular time and pursuing appellant, and these charges tell the jury, if they found these facts to be true, or had reasonable doubt thereof, to acquit him.

[4] There was no error in refusing special charge No. 3, as it was covered in special charges Nos. 1 and 2, given at appellant's instance. There was no evidence calling for or upon which to base special charge No. 4. The court had told the jury, if deceased was advancing on appellant with a pistol, to acquit him, and this was the theory of appellant on the trial, and there was no reason to instruct the jury whether or not deceased was acting in his official capacity.

[5] In cross-examining several witnesses the state's attorney asked them if they had not testified differently on a former trial in this case, apparently laying a predicate to impeach them, but did not follow it up by offering any testimony to impeach them. Appellant complains that the court in his charge failed to limit the purposes for which such questions were asked, and testimony would have been admissible. As no testimony was offered, we fail to see the necessity for the court to charge thereon. Where certain testimony was admitted for impeaching purposes, the court instructed the jury: "Certain witnesses for the state have been permitted to testify that certain witnesses for the defendant made certain statements at times and places other than on this trial. Now, you are instructed that such testimony cannot be considered by you as proof of any fact against defendant, but same has been admitted in evidence on the issue as to the credibility of said witnesses for the defense and the weight to be given their evidence, respectively, and cannot be considered for any other purpose." It is thus seen that the court fully instructed the jury when any testimony was admitted.

The appellant earnestly insists that the verdict is contrary to the law as given in charge by the court; that, if the evidence did not conclusively show he acted in self-defense, then the evidence would show no higher degree of offense than manslaughter. It appears that deceased was an officer, and as such officer had detected appellant gambling, and appellant was compelled to pay a fine. This angered him, and on several occasions thereafter he had used very abusive language in regard to deceased, and at all times carried a shotgun, saying he had as much right to carry it as the officers did a pistol. It is nowhere suggested or shown that the officer nurtured any animosity towards appellant, but the animosity was wholly on his side. On the day of the killing appellant had become unruly on the baseball ground, and, when requested to desist, used very offensive language, and threatened to take the life of deceased. From his standpoint, later when the officer went in the store and asked him if he had his gun, and he answered, "No," the officer telling him to get it, he made for his gun, and shot the officer. He exhibited a disposition and willingness to enter into a deadly combat. The testimony offered by him would suggest mutual combat. If his theory is true, it is remarkable that the officer followed him, firing no shot, and under such circumstances we can readily see how the jury accepted the state's theory of the homicide—that, when the trouble arose and appellant made for his gun, deceased and his brother, instead of following defendant, started out of the store, and deceased was killed when there was no necessity or apparent necessity viewed from any standpoint.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from District Court, Anderson County; B. H. Gardner, Judge.

George Brooks was convicted of theft from the person, and he appeals. Affirmed.

J. E. Rose, of Palestine, for appellant. O. E. Lane, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

DAVIDSON, P. J. Appellant was convicted of theft from the person; his punishment being assessed at three years' confinement in the penitentiary.

[1] The main contention is that the evidence does not sustain the conviction. Briefly stated, the statement of facts discloses that the alleged injured party, Robinson, had gone from his home in Houston county, 15 miles distant, to the town of Palestine, and there became intoxicated. During the evening, or rather at night, while in this intoxicated condition, he was in a saloon. There were negroes in there, and among them a negro who worked on Robinson's place, and who had accompanied him to Palestine. There was also another negro in there named Brooks (appellant in this case). Robinson, following the usual custom of intoxicated men, was generously treating those who drink, among them appellant and one or more other negroes. Appellant bought a bottle of whisky and had offered to treat Robinson, inasmuch as the barkeeper had refused to let appellant drink because he had reached the limit, whereupon appellant offered, perhaps at the request of Robinson, to open his bottle of whisky and give Robinson a drink of it. Appellant declined to do so in the saloon proper because it would interfere with the business of the saloon, and invited Robinson into a rear room to take a drink. Robinson accompanied him. The bottle was opened, Robinson took a drink, and let it drop on the floor, breaking it. Appellant insisted that Robinson should buy him another bottle, which Robinson agreed to do. He went to the bar, and Robinson ordered the barkeeper to let appellant have a bottle of whisky. There arose a discussion about the price of it; appellant claiming he had paid $1.25 for the broken bottle, and Robinson did not think he had paid but $1. While discussing the matter, the negro friend of Robinson, whom he brought with him from his farm, reminded Robinson of the fact that it was about train time, and asked him to give him the money so he might purchase tickets. Robinson put his hand in his pocket to get the money and did get it, and gave it to his negro friend to purchase tickets. He then missed his watch, and stated that somebody had gotten his watch, and tried to ascertain what had become of it. His testimony indicates that the watch was taken before he and appellant returned from the rear room into the bar. After missing the watch he turned to Will Fisher, his negro friend he brought with him from the farm, and asked him if he had his watch, and he said, "No, sir; I haven't got it," and he then turned to the crowd and said, "Have any of you all got my watch," and all of them said "No." Appellant was in that crowd. This was immediately after returning into the bar from the rear room where he had taken a drink. Robinson went away to hunt an officer, and finally informed the officers that his watch had been taken. Appellant followed along after Robinson, and, when he reached the officers shortly after Robinson did, one of the officers asked him if he knew anything about the watch, and he replied that he did not. The officer then asked appellant if he got the watch, and he said "No." He then asked him if he knew who did get it, and he said he did not, but he knew Robinson had the watch in the saloon, and about that time another negro came up and motioned to the officer, and he went to where he was, and he told the officer that he believed George (appellant) got the watch; that he had gone back in the rear end of the saloon with Mr. Robinson. The officer then walked back and began questioning appellant, and about that time Mr. Reagan walked up, but Robinson had then gone back to the saloon. The officers began searching the parties, and among others they searched appellant and found the watch on his person. Officer Dublin testified in this connection that: "Mr. Reagan searched him on one side and I searched him on the other, and I run my hand in his pocket and pulled the watch out, and I asked him whose was it, and he said, 'That is it; I was just fixing to take it back to him'; and so I took him and locked him up and gave the watch to Mr. Robinson." The account given by appellant at the time as to his possession of the watch and why he took it is thus reported in the statement of facts: "Yes, sir; after I taken it out of his pocket he said that he was keeping it to make the fellow pay him for a quart of whisky." Appellant's theory of the matter, after stating that he and Robinson had been back in the saloon and had taken a drink out of his bottle of whisky, and broke it, and the trouble arising afterwards as to the value of the bottle of whisky, was, speaking of Robinson: "He asked me what kind was it, and I told him that it was Cascade and that it cost $1.25, and he said, 'Aw, away with Cascade,' just that way, and I said, 'You won't pay for it?' and he said, 'Aw, that is all right,' and I said, 'What time have you got?' and he pulled his watch out and said, 'It is a little after eight,' or something like that, and I said, 'All right, let me see,' and he handed me the watch and I said, 'I will keep this until you replace my whisky; when you replace my whisky I will replace your watch,' and he said, 'Give me that watch,' and I said, 'No, I will replace your watch when you replace my whisky,' and he said, 'That watch cost $25,' and I said, 'That isn't anything if it cost $125; my whisky cost $1.25, and if you will replace it I will replace your watch, and, if not, I will know the reason why,' and that was all he said to me right there." He then narrates a conversation that occurred between himself and Will Fisher, the other negro mentioned as being Robinson's hired man. Appellant's theory was introduced by his own testimony and his statement to the officers at the time they took the watch from him, and the two accounts are substantially the same.

We are of opinion, so far as the facts are concerned, that the jury was authorized to take the view of it they did and find appellant guilty of theft from the person. Robinson says that appellant got the watch without his knowledge or consent; he was drinking, and indicates appellant got the watch in the rear room while they were taking a drink of whisky. Appellant's theory of it was he got it, as he stated, by inducing Robinson to hand it to him, and then holding it in order to make Robinson replace the broken bottle of whisky. If Robinson and the officers are correct in their statements, then appellant took the watch from Robinson privately and surreptitiously without his knowledge, and when the officers asked him about it denied having it several times, although immediately afterwards it was found upon his person. He then said he took it in order to force Robinson to pay for the broken bottle of whisky. Now these two theories were submitted to the jury by the court in his charge. The jury was authorized to find the evidence for the state correct and truthful.

[2] There is another contention to the effect that the court failed to charge appellant's theory of the case as made by his explanation. The court thus charged the jury in this respect: "If defendant took the watch from the hand of said Robinson with the knowledge of said Robinson, or if defendant took it merely for the purpose of holding it till he was paid for the quart of whisky that had been broken, or if you have a reasonable doubt on either of these issues, you will return a verdict of not guilty." We are of opinion this does submit appellant's side of the case fully and in accord with his testimony and his explanation both. We have commended heretofore this manner of charging a jury with reference to explanation of stolen property instead of giving the lengthier charge with reference to reasonable doubt and the consideration of that and all other phases, etc. The charge given by the trial judge herein is simple, straight, unequivocal, and intelligible. We do not believe any jury could possibly misunderstand this charge, and, if they believed the testimony and the theory of appellant that he got the watch from Robinson as indicated in his testimony and in his explanation, they would have acquitted under this charge. They were plainly told that if he got the watch from Robinson with his knowledge, or if he took it merely for the purpose of holding it until he was paid for the quart of whisky that had been broken, he would not be guilty under the charge of stealing from the person of Robinson, and that the jury should acquit him.

Finding no reversible error in the record, the judgment is affirmed.

SCOTT v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Nov. 27, 1912.)

1. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 146*)—OFFENSES—SALE.

Where the state's witness gave defendant 50 cents to get some whisky, and when defendant returned with alcohol refused to take it, but afterwards followed defendant and took the alcohol from him without his consent, there was no sale; but if he took it in payment of the 50 cents, with defendant's consent, it would be a sale.

2. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 238*)—PROSECUTION—INSTRUCTIONS—ISSUE OF SALE.

Where the evidence, in a prosecution for the sale of liquor, was that the state's witness gave defendant 50 cents to buy whisky, and on defendant's return with alcohol refused it, and then followed defendant and took it from him, and was conflicting as to whether defendant consented to the taking, the failure to submit the question of defendant's consent was reversible error.

Appeal from Red River County Court; George Morrison, Judge.

Jim Scott was convicted of violating the local option law, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

C. E. Lane, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

DAVIDSON, P. J. Appellant was convicted of violating the local option law; his punishment being assessed at a fine of $25 and 20 days' imprisonment in the county jail.

The evidence for the state discloses, through the witness Baker, about as follows: On the morning of February 20, 1911, appellant approached the witness, where he was working in the store for George McCulloch in Clarksville, Tex., and asked witness to let him have 50 cents. Witness replied, "What would that be to me?" and appellant answered, "Well, let me have the 50 cents," to which witness again replied, "What will that be to me?" Appellant then replied that he was going to get some whisky, and that he would let witness have some of it for the 50 cents. Witness then let appellant have the 50 cents. Appellant took it and went away, and later during the day, about 12 o'clock noon, appellant came back with a quart bottle half full of alcohol. Witness examined it and knew it was alcohol. Witness then told appellant that he wanted whisky. Appellant told the witness he had no whisky; that the alcohol was all he had; and that witness could have it if he wanted it. Witness asked appellant for his 50 cents. Appellant replied that he did not have 50 cents, but that witness could have the alcohol in place of the 50 cents if he wanted it. Witness then told appellant to go ahead, and that he would see appellant later. Appellant then went off down the street and into a negro pool hall. Witness further testified that he saw those negroes were going to get all of defendant's alcohol, and that he (witness) would get nothing for his 50 cents; that he immediately followed appellant and found him in a little store in the rear of the negro pool hall, in company with some other negroes; that he walked up to defendant and took the bottle of alcohol out of defendant's pocket; that the defendant made no resistance, but stood still and grinned; that one of the negroes, Arnett Jones, grabbed for the alcohol and tried to take it away from witness, and witness and Jones had a scuffle over the alcohol, but witness finally got away with it and carried it to Mr. McCulloch's barn, and during that evening and night witness drank all of it. On cross-examination he stated the facts above are true; that there was no understanding between witness and defendant that the defendant should bring him back any particular quantity of whisky; that defendant had never paid witness back the 50 cents; that witness did not expect him to do so.

The state next introduced Bud Totten, who testified that he did not see Henry Baker get any liquor from the defendant, and knew nothing about the transaction. The state here closed its case, except to prove that local option was in effect.

Arnett Jones was then introduced by the defendant, who stated that on the morning of February 20, 1911, he was in the negro pool hall at Clarksville, in company with some other negroes, and that this negro (the defendant) came in and gave witness Arnett a pint bottle full of alcohol, and that witness and the other negroes drank it; that there were present, besides himself, Ben Johnson, Babe Johnson, and the defendant; that while they were all in the pool hall the negro Henry Baker ran in from the front of the house and grabbed a quart bottle, which was about half full of alcohol, out of defendant's pocket; that he (witness) also grabbed at it, but Baker's hold on the bottle was the best, and he got away with it and ran out of the back door, and witness did not see any more of Baker that day; that he heard nothing said about any sale of liquor by the witness Baker and the defendant; and that he saw no money pass between them.

Ben and Babe Johnson testified as did Arnett Jones, except Ben Johnson testified, in addition, that defendant made a grab for the bottle of alcohol while Jones and Baker were scuffling over it.

Appellant took the stand in his own behalf, and testified that it was not true that on February 20, 1911, the date set out in the information and stated by Baker, that he got 50 cents from Baker and told him that later on in the day he would bring him back some whisky for it; that Baker's whole testimony in this respect is false; that on the day mentioned he was in the pool hall with Arnett Jones, Ben Johnson, and Babe Johnson, and that he had a quart bottle, about one-half full of alcohol, in his overcoat pocket, and while he was in there Henry Baker ran in from the front door, and back to where he and the other negroes were standing, and grabbed the alcohol out of his pocket, and at about the same time Arnett Jones grabbed at it, and that he (defendant) also grabbed at it, and that there was a short scuffle over it, but Henry Baker's hold on it was the best, and he got away with it and ran out of the back door. He also testified: That about 6 o'clock that afternoon, while defendant was going to the passenger train to meet his boss, who was coming in on the train, Baker stepped out and went to a trash barrel in front of Mr. McCulloch's store and got the bottle of alcohol out of the trash barrel, where it was hidden, and returned it to him, and said: "Here is your alcohol. I have kept it for you to keep them niggers from drinking it all up from you." It was still in the bottle, and looked like none of it "had been drunk up." That if any of it had been taken from the bottle from the time Baker got away from him (defendant), until he returned it, it was very little. He further testified that he did not sell any alcohol to Henry Baker, or to any one else, and that he had never at any time sold any liquor to any one, and that this is the first time he had ever been accused of so doing.

While there are some very decided contradictions in the testimony, we may take the state's evidence to the exclusion of appellant's testimony; and we are of opinion that the state has not proved a sale. Baker's testimony excludes such transaction. Take it in its strongest light, he let appellant have 50 cents with the understanding he was to get that amount of whisky in return. Appellant brought him some alcohol, which he declined to have, and appellant went away, taking the alcohol with him. That Baker subsequently went to the pool hall where the negroes were and took the alcohol out of appellant's pocket does not constitute a sale. Baker does not intimate that appellant let him have the alcohol on his visit to the pool hall; but the testimony expressly excludes that idea. Baker testifies that he had a scuffle with Jones over it, who tried to take it away from him; and it is also shown appellant tried to get it after Baker grabbed it and started away with it. This testimony excludes the idea of a sale.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded.

HARPER, J. [1, 2] I agree to the reversal of this case, but not on the ground on which it is placed. The question of whether or not the defendant consented to the taking of the alcohol should have been submitted to the jury, and on this issue charges Nos. 1 or 2 requested should have been given. Of course, if defendant did not consent to prosecuting witness taking the alcohol, it would not be a sale; but if, after tendering it in payment of the 50 cents, and prosecuting witness refusing it, prosecuting witness subsequently changed his mind, as he says he did, and decided to take the alcohol, and he did take it in payment of the 50 cents, with the knowledge and consent of defendant, it would be a sale; and I agree to the reversal of this case solely on the ground that this issue was not submitted, after the court was requested so to do.

PRENDERGAST, J., concurs.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Nov. 27, 1912.)

1. OBSTRUCTING JUSTICE (§ 9*) — BRIBING WITNESS—ELEMENTS OF OFFENSE—PRINCIPAL.

A party is not guilty of bribery as principal, because he pays a witness in a criminal case to take his daughter, who is also a witness, away from the county.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Obstructing Justice, Cent. Dig. § 18; Dec. Dig. § 9.*]

2. OBSTRUCTING JUSTICE (§ 11*)—INDICTMENT—SUFFICIENCY.

Where the indictment for bribing a witness to avoid process of the court, in a case under consideration by the grand jury, failed to state the character of the process, it was fatally defective.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Obstructing Justice, Cent. Dig. §§ 19-28; Dec. Dig. § 11.*]

3. OBSTRUCTING JUSTICE (§ 4*) — "BRIBING WITNESS TO AVOID PROCESS"—ELEMENTS OF OFFENSE—PROCESS.

To constitute the offense of bribing a witness to avoid a process, there must have been a process either issued or served.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Obstructing Justice, Cent. Dig. § 13; Dec. Dig. § 4.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 589*)—FORMER JEOPARDY—MOTION FOR POSTPONEMENT.

Where, in a trial for bribing a witness, it appeared that defendant had been convicted as an accessory and sentenced upon the same facts and that he had appealed therefrom, his motion for a postponement until the final disposition of such case, in order that he might plead either former conviction or former acquittal, should have been granted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1315, 1319; Dec. Dig. § 589.*]

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1169*)—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

In a trial for bribing a witness to leave the county and take with him his daughter who was also a witness, in order that they might not appear against third parties under investigation before the grand jury in connection with a seduction and an abortion with which it was not claimed that defendant had any connection, the admission of evidence of the details of such crimes was prejudicial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3088, 3137-3143; Dec. Dig. § 1169.*]

Appeal from District Court, Comanche County; J. H. Arnold, Judge.

J. H. Harrison was convicted of bribing a witness, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Smith & Palmer and Goodson & Goodson, all of Comanche, for appellant. C. E. Lane, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

DAVIDSON, P. J. Appellant was charged with bribing a witness. Omitting the formal part of the indictment, it charged that appellant corruptly offered to and paid T. G. Waldrip the sum of $150 in money, T. G. Waldrip being a witness in cases then and there in the district court of Comanche county, said cases being then and there under consideration and investigation by the grand jury of the said district court of Comanche county, said court being then and there in session, and said cases being certain cases, wherein the state of Texas was plaintiff and Sam Wimberly, Sol Ingram, and J. G. Daniel were defendants, and the said J. H. Harrison did then and there give to said witness T. G. Waldrip, "who was then and there a material and important witness for the state in said cases, the sum of $150 in money to leave the county of Comanche, and take with him his daughter, Mattie Waldrip, who was also an important witness for the state in said cases, and to keep out of the way and not appear at said term of the district court of Comanche county, Tex., against the said Sam Wimberly, Sol Ingram, and J. G. Daniel, and to also keep the said Mattie Waldrip from appearing and testifying in said cases at said term of the district court of Comanche county, Tex., against the said Sol Ingram, Sam Wimberly, and J. G. Daniel, the said J. H. Harrison intending thereby to bribe the said T. G. Waldrip to avoid the process of the said district court requiring him to appear as a witness in said causes."

[1] A motion was made to quash this indictment on several grounds. Among others, that it was no violation of the law to pay Waldrip $150 to take his daughter Mattie with him and leave the county; that the statute denouncing and punishing for bribing a witness means that the bribe must be offered to and for the purpose of bribing the witness, and not to take another out of a county or away from the court. The bribery denounced by the statute applies to the witness, and not to somebody else to be affected by that witness. If it was intended to charge Waldrip with bribing his daughter and appellant had furnished the money for that purpose, then, if that was an offense, this indictment would be against appellant as an accomplice and Waldrip as principal. This part of the indictment should not have been inserted.

[2] Possibly, if this was the only question arising out of this allegation, it might be treated as surplusage; but the remainder of the indictment should state the case by its averments against appellant in regard to T. G. Waldrip. Again, it will be noticed that this indictment charges that appellant intended to bribe Waldrip to avoid the process of the court. Passing upon this, we desire to state that this matter is brought up in different forms. Of course, appellant could be guilty if he bribed Waldrip to avoid the process of the court, but he could not be guilty, under the indictment as charged, of bribing Waldrip to take his daughter away from the court. The indictment is, we think, deficient in that it does not allege what character of process from the grand jury appellant sought to induce Waldrip to avoid. The statute provides several ways by which a witness may be bribed and for various things.

[3] Appellant to be guilty must be shown to have bribed Waldrip to disobey process if it had been served on Waldrip, or, if process had been issued but not served, then he must be bribed to avoid service of said process. The indictment should allege, we think, specifically, under the rulings of the Supreme Court and of this court, what that process was. If it was a subpoena, the grand jury knew it was a subpoena, because they issued it; they could not therefore allege that the character of process was unknown to them, or that they could not ascertain the character of process by diligent inquiry. If a subpoena or other process had been issued by the grand jury, that body knew what character of process it was. See State v. Hughes, 43 Tex. 518; Brown v. State, 13 Tex. App. 358. In the Hughes Case the court held that the indictment is defective if it fails to allege that the offer was made to either bribe a witness to disobey a subpoena or other legal process, or to avoid the service of the same. In Brown's Case it is said, if indictment charges that offer to bribe was made to induce a witness to disobey subpoena, it must allege the existence of a subpoena, and that the same was issued by legal authority. Tested by these decisions and the statute, we are of opinion that this indictment is not sufficient.

[4] 2. Appellant was indicted as an accessory and convicted on the identical facts which form a predicate for this prosecution. It is deemed unnecessary to go into a statement of the evidence and the recitations in the bills of exceptions; but it was agreed by counsel and ratified by the court in his approval of the bills of exceptions that the facts introduced in both cases were identical and the prosecution relied upon the identical facts to sustain both indictments. The bills of exceptions are quite lengthy. The appellant's first motion was to postpone the trial of this case until the final disposition of the other case, reciting that appellant had been convicted as an accessory and allotted a term in the penitentiary upon the identical facts relied upon in this case; that his motion for new trial had been overruled, sentence pronounced, and notice of appeal given to the Court of Criminal Appeals. Upon this motion he asked a postponement of this case until the other case was finally disposed of in order that he might plead either former conviction or former acquittal, as the facts and the condition of the record would then indicate. He then filed his plea of former conviction setting up practically the same facts as in the other, to wit, that he had been convicted in the other case, motion for new trial overruled, and notice of appeal given. This seems to have been done out of an abundance of caution so as to be certain to have the questions properly presented to the court, in order that he might not be twice convicted on the same facts and for the same act. Without discussing the second motion, to wit, the plea of former conviction, we say there is no question under our law that the first motion should have been granted and the case should have been postponed. Under the constitutional provision that no man shall be twice convicted of the same offense, and the showing made, approved by the court, two convictions occurred on the same transactions and on identically the same facts. This plea should have been sustained. See Maines v. State, 37 Tex. Cr. R. 617, 40 S. W. 490; Powell v. State, 42 Tex. Cr. R. 11, 57 S. W. 94; Murray v. State, 56 Tex. Cr. R. 438, 120 S. W. 437.

[5] 3. The theory of the state was that appellant had bribed Waldrip to take his daughter out of the country and himself leave the country in order to avoid testifying in a case against Wimberly for seducing Mattie Waldrip. There is also an indication that another case was being investigated, to wit, against Wimberly, Ingram, and Daniels for producing an abortion upon Mattie Waldrip. There was testimony, and among others the testimony of Mattie Waldrip, that Sam Wimberly had seduced her, and that Ingram, Wimberly, and Dr. Daniels produced an abortion upon her. The fact that there was such a case being examined, and that Waldrip was a witness in it, was legitimate; but the state introduced, over appellant's objections, all the details of the seduction and all the facts bearing upon it, as well as all the details of the abortion, the same as if appellant was on trial for each or both of those offenses. This was clearly inadmissible. Appellant was not present and had nothing to do with either the seduction or the abortion, and there is no contention anywhere in the record that he was. The only connection that he is alleged to have had with these matters, or sought to be proved, was the fact that, while the grand jury was investigating these matters against the parties named above, he induced Waldrip to leave the country and carry his daughter Mattie with him. It would make no difference, so far as defendant was concerned in this case, what the facts were in regard to the seduction or abortion. He was charged with bribery, and the facts in regard to the seduction were totally immaterial. The fact that he sought to induce a witness to leave to prevent the investigation of the grand jury was sufficient. All the facts on the part of Wimberly in seducing the woman or the act on the part of Wimberly, Dr. Daniel, and Ingram in bringing about an abortion, were not only irrelevant, but highly prejudicial to defendant and clearly inadmissible. These questions are presented to the court, first, in objections to testimony; second, in motion to exclude, and, third, in charges to the jury —all of which are timely and properly preserved in the record.

There are some other matters that arose during the trial and presented here for review, some of which would be reversible; but in the light of this opinion we deem it hardly necessary to review them. The trial court will understand from what has been said how the case should subsequently be tried. The judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded.

BUSH v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. May 29, 1912. On Rehearing, Nov. 27, 1912.)

1. BAIL (§ 65*)—APPEAL—RECOGNIZANCE—SUFFICIENCY.

A recognizance on appeal which fails to recite the amount of punishment assessed against accused is fatally defective, and the court on appeal does not acquire jurisdiction.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 507*)—"ACCOMPLICE"—WHO IS—CORROBORATION.

Where one receives money from an officer to bring about violations of the law, and in accordance with the agreement he brings about such violations, he is an "accomplice," and when used as a witness must be corroborated to support a conviction; but, where one who, believing that a crime is in contemplation, takes steps to detect it, or to procure evidence by which the guilty person may be punished, he is not an accomplice because his connection with the crime is after its inception.

Appeal from Dallas County Court, at Law; W. F. Whitehurst, Judge.

Jacob Bush was convicted of crime, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Lively, Nelms & Adams, of Dallas, for appellant. C. E. Lane, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

DAVIDSON, P. J. [1] The appeal must be dismissed because of the insufficiency of the recognizance. That instrument fails to recite the amount of punishment assessed against appellant. This, under the statute and decisions, renders that instrument so defective that it cannot attach the jurisdiction of this court.

The appeal is dismissed.

PRENDERGAST, J., not sitting.

On Rehearing.

DAVIDSON, P. J. The appeal was heretofore dismissed for want of sufficient recognizance. This has been supplied, wherefore the appeal is reinstated.

The affidavit and information contain quite a number of counts alleging violations of the liquor laws in different ways.

The court charged the jury that if appellant did sell directly or indirectly spirituous and vinous liquors capable of producing intoxication in quantities of one gallon and less, to wit, one bottle of whisky to J. W. Gilmore, without having first applied for and obtained a license under the laws of the state of Texas as a retail liquor dealer, and did then and there unlawfully, in a certain locality in said county and state where local option was not then and there in force, sell directly or indirectly spirituous and vinous liquors capable of producing intoxication, etc., they would assess his punishment at a fine not less than $500 and not more than $1,000, and by imprisonment in the county jail for a term not to exceed six months. The court further instructed the jury that one sale would not constitute a liquor dealer; that they must find and believe from the evidence that there was more than one sale before they could convict the defendant.

[2] Appellant requested a special charge instructing the jury that if they find two of the state's witnesses, Gilmore and Hopkins, were accomplices, they could not convict upon their testimony unless corroborated, etc. Gilmore testified that he lived in Dallas county at Lisbon, and saw appellant on the 6th of July at his place of business, which is on the corner of Dexter avenue and Cockrell street, about 4 o'clock in the afternoon, and bought from him a half pint of whisky, paying him 35 cents for it, and recognized a bottle then handed him by the county attorney as the one he bought. He says he also bought another half-pint bottle of whisky from appellant, which was also handed him by the county attorney, and that he paid for this bottle personally at the time L. H. Hopkins was with him. He also states that Peck was with him when he bought the bottle of whisky from the defendant on the 8th of July, but Peck was not with him when he bought the other bottle, but that Hopkins was with him both times; that Hopkins bought a bottle of beer from the defendant at the same time. On cross-examination he says: "I am a country boy, and live out in the country in Mr. Miller's neighborhood. Mr. Barry Miller represented me in a case once. I had no printed commission from Mr. Brandenburg, and I never took an oath as deputy sheriff. Mr. Brandenburg just asked me if I would do what he asked me to do, and he paid me $2 per day for my services, and I was to go where he told me to go. I was to go out in prohibited territory and not to work downtown in the saloon district. I bought liquor with the dollar a day expense money, and paid street car fare with it. Mr. Brandenburg did not say what he gave it to me for, only said it was for expense money. He said he would allow me a dollar per day for expense money. I did not pay hotel bills with it, but used the dollar a day expense money to buy this whisky and street car fare, and such things. In addition to the one dollar a day expense money, I got $2 per day for my work. I don't remember just how many days I worked, as I was at home part of the time; but Mr. Brandenburg paid me $26 one time and $7 another time, not expense money, but wages for work." He says: "At the time I bought the whisky I saw defendant in the store on the corner of Dexter and Cockrell streets. It was a small store, and I think maybe there were a few canned goods and tobacco in it. I did not notice any name or any sign on the store. Defendant was in there at the time, but I don't know whether he was proprietor of that store or not. I just heard he was working there."

Hopkins testified that he knew Gilmore, Peck, and defendant. Saw defendant sell Gilmore a bottle of whisky on the 6th of July, and saw Gilmore pay defendant for it. "I also saw defendant sell to Gilmore a bottle of whisky on the 8th of July, 1911, which was a half pint of whisky, and Gilmore paid defendant 35 cents for it." Witness says he bought two bottles of beer, one on each date. He says when Gilmore bought that whisky it was to be put aside and kept; that they did not intend to drink it. The beer they bought to drink. This witness also testified he was paid $2 a day for his work, and knew that the people who sold them the liquor were violating the law. "I knew he would be violating the law to sell it to me when I asked for it. Both of us knew that. Gilmore and I were each getting $2 per day for our work, and each of us were getting a dollar per day for expense money. I do not know who was the proprietor of the place where we bought the liquors from defendant. Don't know whether he was the proprietor of that place or not." It is unnecessary to state Peck's testimony. He testified he was with Gilmore and Hopkins on the 8th of July when they made the purchases, but was not with them on the 6th.

It seems from this testimony that Hopkins and Gilmore were working for Mr. Brandenburg, the sheriff, at the rate of $3 per day, two of which they were to retain, and the other he gave them for expense money. With the expense money these witnesses purchased the liquor. They knew when they went into it this would bring about violations of the law and agreed with the sheriff so to do. Under this testimony we are of opinion the charge asked by appellant should have been given the jury in regard to the law of accomplices testifying as witnesses and submitting that question for the decision of the jury. The statute in regard to purchasers in local option territory provides that such purchaser shall not be an accomplice. That statute, however, only applies to local option territory, and it is unnecessary here to discuss its provisions and effect. There is no statute that we have been able to find which relieves these parties from being accomplices. We are of opinion that where a party receives money for the purpose of inaugurating and bringing about violations of the law, and in accordance with the agreement brings about such violations, he is and would be an accomplice. Wherever a party deliberately or intentionally originates or succeeds in bringing about a violation of the law, he becomes a particeps criminis of that violation, and therefore when used as a witness must be corroborated. There is a line of cases which holds that where an officer or other parties understand or are led to believe that a violation of the law is in contemplation, and take steps to detect that crime, or get evidence by which the guilty parties may be punished, he would not be an accomplice, but in such cases he is not an original party to the bringing about the crime and is not guilty of originating or initiating it. In that character of case his connection with it is after the inception of the crime and after it has been determined upon, and he only then gets into it as a detective or for the purpose of arresting the party and bringing him to punishment. There is another line of cases which holds that, where the party originates the crime or is instrumental in its initiation and brings it about, he then becomes a particeps criminis and when testifying as a witness in the case is an accomplice. The leading cases in this state are Dever v. State, 37 Tex. Cr. R. 396, 30 S. W. 1071; Steele v. State, 19 Tex. App. 425. The opinion was by Judge Hurt and draws the distinction above mentioned between parties who were playing the rôle of detective for the arrest and punishment of parties, and those who originate the crime or assist in originating it in the first instance.

We are of opinion therefore the charge requested by appellant's counsel in regard to accomplice testimony should have been given. Because it was not, the judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded.

PINSON v. STATE.

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 958*)—NEW TRIAL—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE.

A new trial for newly discovered evidence was properly denied, where the affidavits accompanying it indicated a lack of diligence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2396-2403; Dec. Dig. § 958.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 942*)—NEW TRIAL—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE—IMPEACHING EVIDENCE.

A new trial will not be granted for newly discovered evidence which is solely impeaching in character.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2331, 2332; Dec. Dig. § 942.*]

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1090*)—APPEAL—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—NECESSITY.

That the court required accused in a homicide case to go to trial without a special venire could not be reviewed, in the absence of a bill of exceptions.

6. HOMICIDE (§ 308*)—INSTRUCTIONS—EVIDENCE.

Where, in a prosecution for homicide, the state's evidence indicated that defendant shot and killed deceased without provocation, the court properly charged that if the jury believed, beyond a reasonable doubt, that defendant intentionally shot and killed deceased, and at the time of the killing deceased was doing nothing, and had done nothing by word or act, which justified a reasonable apprehension or fear of death or serious bodily injury at his hands toward defendant, and if deceased had given defendant no provocation sufficient to rouse passion in the mind of a man of ordinary temper, sufficient to render his mind incapable of cool reflection, then the law implied malice, and the jury should find defendant guilty of murder in the second degree, no matter what amount of provocation had been given toward defendant by some other person or persons, and what degree of passion defendant may have labored under arising from such provocation, if any, given by others than deceased.

7. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 822*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CONSTRUCTION.

It is not necessary for the court, in charging in a criminal case, to give all the law of the case in a single paragraph; but objections to separate paragraphs of the charge are to be considered in the light of the charge as a whole.

Appeal from District Court, Angelina County; James I. Perkins, Judge.

J. V. Pinson was convicted of murder in the second degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

I. D. Fairchild, of Lufkin, for appellant. C. E. Lane, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

PRENDERGAST, J. Appellant was indicted for the murder of Isaac Polk on January 21, 1911. Before the trial the state conceded that murder in the first degree was not in the case, and it was tried only on the theory of murder in the second degree or manslaughter. The appellant was convicted of murder in the second degree and his penalty fixed at seven years in the penitentiary.

While the statement of facts is rather lengthy, the questions raised and submitted were few, and the testimony on those issues largely repetitions. The killing occurred at a negro dance, at night, about the date charged. At this dance there was a mixed crowd of men and women, and much drinking of intoxicating liquors by the men; a considerable number of them being under the influence of liquor, if not drunk. More than one row and fight was had during the night. It is unnecessary to state all of these, because none of them had anything to do with the facts of this case.

It seems that some time (the testimony ranging from a few minutes to, perhaps, 2 hours, but the more reasonable theory from all the evidence, we conclude, is that some 10 or 15 minutes, or a few minutes) before the killing one Spence Bradford had a fight with a negro by the name of McElwee, in which said Bradford knocked McElwee down, or knocked him to his knees, about the door, and he then crawled or got out at the door and then went off. It seems that Alex Pinson, a brother of appellant, took up the said difficulty with Spence Bradford, taking McElwee's part, and proceeded to draw his knife upon and strike said Bradford. They then separated. It appears that this Pinson, appellant's brother, then went back into the dance hall.

From this point the evidence between the state's witnesses and the defendant's is directly and pointedly contradictory. The state's witnesses, and among them said Spence Bradford, all testified that Spence Bradford immediately left the assembly, and went across the street to an old house where he had left his gun; that when he came to the dance that night he came from a hunt with his gun, and brought it and placed it in this old house; that immediately after getting the gun he went straight on from there to his home, and did not at any time after he left the dance hall go back to or near it. The state's witnesses, in substance, testify: That soon after this some one—not Spence Bradford—appeared at the door of the dance hall and pointed a gun therein, and that some one of the crowd exclaimed: "Look out, Alex! You will get shot." By "Alex" is meant the said brother of appellant. That thereupon there was a rush made for the door, and a great many came out; some leaving and others lingering. It was about time for the dance to break up, and it did immediately afterwards break up. That then, for the first time, appellant appeared on the scene with a loaded pistol. That right at the door four persons were standing practically in a row; the deceased being one of them. That these four persons had been standing there for some little while. That appellant approached these persons, and when within a few feet of them asked who it was that tried to shoot his brother, and that John Bradford, a brother of said Spence Bradford, replied, "It was not me." Appellant then asked the deceased, and deceased said, "It was not me, Mr." Appellant replied: "Yes, it was, you damn son of a bitch," and immediately shot him in the stomach, from which wounds he died the next day. That appellant was so close to deceased when he shot him that it set his clothes on fire. The evidence from all sources shows that deceased had not been in any of the fusses, and had had nothing to do in any way with the fight between Spence Bradford and McElwee, nor between Spence Bradford and appellant's brother; in fact, was an entirely innocent bystander, and had had nothing whatever to do or say to appellant, or in his presence or hearing, other than to tell him, upon his inquiry, as stated above, that it was not he who had been trying to shoot appellant's brother.

The appellant and his witnesses, by their testimony, show that after the fight between appellant's brother and Spence Bradford, above shown, Spence Bradford left and went somewhere and got a gun, and that he did come back to the door of the dance hall and poke a gun therein, and when the warning was given for Alex, appellant's brother, to look out, he would get shot, that said Spence Bradford then got back with the three other persons who were standing close to the door, and that it was Spence Bradford, and not his brother, John Bradford, who was one of the four standing in a row at the time appellant killed deceased; that when appellant appeared on the scene, facing these four persons, and demanded to know who it was that had been trying to shoot his brother, Spence Bradford replied, in effect, "What is that to you?" that appellant replied, "Alex is my brother," and that thereupon Spence Bradford attempted to draw or throw his gun down on appellant, and that appellant shot with the intention of shooting said Spence Bradford in self-protection; and that he did not intend to shoot the deceased.

The evidence further discloses, on behalf of the state, that when appellant shot deceased that two of the four persons who were standing at the time then caught appellant and attempted to hold him, and that one of the Bradford boys ran in the hall, and appellant said to those holding him, or attempting to hold him: "Wait. I want to shoot that damn son of a bitch." It is unnecessary to give any further detail of the evidence at this point to discuss appellant's complaints.

[1] He contends that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict of murder in the second degree. We have carefully gone over it and considered it all, and, in our opinion, the evidence does clearly justify the verdict.

[2] There are some general complaints in the motion for new trial to some paragraphs of the court's charge; but they are so general that they do not point out or specify any special defect therein. Appellant requested no charge at all. The court submitted murder in the second degree, self-defense, and manslaughter.

[3, 4] Among other grounds of appellant's motion, he contends that a new trial should be granted because of newly discovered evidence. The motion itself, and the affidavits accompanying it, in our opinion, do not show that appellant used any diligence to discover it, or that he could not have discovered it by the proper diligence. But, even if that point was met, the affidavits attached of the purported newly discovered evidence shows that it was solely impeaching in its character of the testimony of one or more of the state's witnesses. The court committed no error in not granting a new trial on this ground.

[5] Another complaint of appellant to the action of the court in not having a special venire in the case is not shown by bill of exception. The court refused appellant's bill on that ground, and without a bill we cannot consider the question.

[6] Appellant complains of this paragraph of the court's charge: "In this case, if the evidence satisfies you, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant unlawfully, purposely, and intentionally shot Isaac Polk with a pistol and thereby killed him, and that such killing took place when Polk was doing nothing, and had not done anything by word or act, which justified a reasonable apprehension or fear of death or serious bodily injury at his hands towards defendant, and when Polk had given him no provocation sufficient to arouse passion in the mind of a man of ordinary temper, sufficient to render his mind incapable of cool reflection, then the law implies or infers the existence of malice, and you would find that the offense is murder in the second degree, no matter what amount of provocation had been given towards defendant by some other person or persons, and no matter what degree of passion defendant may have labored under arising from such provocation, if any, given by another or others and not by Polk"—claiming that the evidence did not justify the charge, and that it failed and omitted to distinctly instruct the jury upon all the law applicable to said cause, in that it omitted to instruct the jury that if appellant was attempting to kill Bradford and unintentionally killed deceased, and that he had an adequate cause to kill Bradford, and if he had killed Bradford that appellant could be convicted of no higher degree of offense than manslaughter, and ignored the defendant's theory of an attempt to kill Bradford and of his rights arising out of a cause to kill Bradford.

[7] The evidence of the state, if believed, would specially and clearly call for just such charge as was given on this subject; and it was the duty of the court, under the facts of this case, to have given this charge. Of course, all of the law of a case and of the various issues arising therein cannot be given in one paragraph; but it is elementary that in considering objections to separate paragraphs of the court's charge all of it must be taken and considered together. In other and separate paragraphs the court did properly submit the other theory of the case contended for by appellant in his objection to this paragraph of the charge.

The court fully and correctly submitted manslaughter, and also self-defense by appellant against the assault or contemplated assault upon him, as claimed by him and his witnesses, of Spence Bradford and, in effect, told the jury that if appellant on this occasion acted in self-defense of the attack of Spence Bradford upon him, and that in shooting he intended to kill Bradford and not deceased, and killed deceased accidentally, to acquit him. There is no complaint anywhere of the court's charge on self-defense. The court also, in his charge, properly submitted the question of manslaughter, and if appellant would not have been guilty of any higher offense than manslaughter if he had killed Spence Bradford, instead of deceased, that he would be guilty of manslaughter, and in such event only find him guilty of manslaughter. The court also charged that if the jury had any doubt as to whether the killing was manslaughter or murder in the second degree to give appellant the benefit of the doubt and find him guilty only of manslaughter. Taking the charge as a whole, it clearly and properly submitted the state's theory, the defendant's theory, his claimed self-defense, and manslaughter, and no reversible error is presented.

The judgment will therefore be affirmed.

BARRETT et al. v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Nov. 13, 1912. Rehearing Denied Dec. 11, 1912.)

1. BAIL (§ 93*)—CRIMINAL PROSECUTION—ACTIONS THEREON—CORRESPONDENCE OF BOND WITH JUDGMENT.

Under Code Cr. Proc. 1911, art. 321, which provides that a bail bond must state that the defendant is charged with a felony, if he is charged with such an offense, there was no variance between a bond reciting that defendant was charged "with a felony" and a judgment reciting that he was "charged with a felony, to wit, burglary."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bail, Cent. Dig. §§ 409, 410, 413-417; Dec. Dig. § 93.*]

2. BAIL (§ 59*)—CRIMINAL PROSECUTIONS—TIME OF APPEARANCE.

Code Cr. Proc. 1911, art. 321, subd. 5, requires a bail bond to "state the time and place when and where the accused binds himself to appear, and the court before whom he is to appear." Article 962 provides that, in cases of final judgments or forfeited bail bonds, the proceedings shall be regulated by the proceedings that govern in civil actions. A bail bond bound the defendant to appear at "the next term of court on the 11th day of September, 1911," and the 11th of September fell during the same term of court in which the bond was issued. Held that, as the bond fixed a definite time for the appearance at a time when the court was legally in session, the specific time fixed will control, and render the bond certain and sufficient in spite of the inconsistent matter therein.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bail, Cent. Dig. §§ 256½-262; Dec. Dig. § 59.*]

Appeal from District Court, Fannin County; Ben. H. Denton, Judge.

Bob Barrett was indicted for burglary, and gave bond for his appearance. From a judgment in a proceeding to forfeit the bond, his sureties appeal. Affirmed.

Cunningham & McMahon, of Bonham, for appellants. C. E. Lane, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

HARPER, J. [1] Bob Barrett on the 30th day of August, 1911, court then being in session, entered into bond for his appearance before the district court of Fannin county on the 11th day of September, 1911, the condition of the bond reading: "That whereas the above-named principal, Bob Barrett, stands charged by indictment duly presented in the district court of Fannin county, Tex., with the offense of a felony, now if the said Bob Barrett shall well and truly make his personal appearance before said court at its next regular term to be begun and holden at the court house of said county in the city of Bonham, Texas, on the 11th day of September, 1911," etc. Said defendant failed to appear, and the bond was forfeited, and judgment nisi entered, it reading that the indictment charged him "with the offense of a felony, to wit, burglary." Upon the final trial, the sureties appeared and objected to the introduction of the nisi judgment in evidence on the ground that a variance existed between it and the bond, in that the bond only stated he was charged with a felony, while the judgment recited that he was "charged with a felony, to wit, burglary," and the further ground that burglary is not an offense eo nomine. Since the amendment of the Code of Criminal Procedure in 1899 the law provides it is only necessary that the bond state he is charged with a felony; it now being wholly unnecessary to state therein the elements of the offense, and adding the words, "to wit, burglary," did not render the judgment void. When it stated that he was charged "with a felony," that was in compliance with the law. Article 321, Code of Criminal Procedure; Nichols v. State, 47 Tex. Cr. R. 406, 83 S. W. 1113; Hannon v. State, 48 Tex. Cr. R. 199, 87 S.

W. 152; Davis v. State, 56 Tex. Cr. R. 131, 119 S. W. 95.

[2] The sureties also objected to the introduction of the bail bond in evidence, on the ground that it bound him to appear at an impossible date; the contention being that as the court was in session at the date of the execution of the bond, and the 11th day of September, 1911, was a day of that term, it was impossible for him to appear at the next term of the court on the 11th day of September, 1911, as the next term of the court would not begin until the first Monday in February, 1912, and could continue in session only nine weeks. Subdivision 5 of article 321 gives as one of the requisites of a bond "that it must state the time and place, when and where the accused binds himself to appear, and the court before whom he is to appear"; and provides that in stating the time it is sufficient to specify the term of court. There is no question in this case but the bond correctly states the place, and the court before whom the accused was to appear, but it is insisted that the time is not made plain in one instance stating the next term of court, which it is contended would bind him to appear at the February term, and in another place stating the time of appearance as the 11th day of September, 1911, a term in session at the time the bond was taken, and that the variance or duplicity is fatal to the validity of the bond. The statute, it will be noticed, requires only that the time and place be stated in the bond, and does not require that the term of court be named; it only stating that, if the term is specified, that will be a sufficient compliance with the requirement of stating time, in the absence of a specific date being stated. As the bond named a specific date for the appearance of defendant, and at a time when the district court of Fannin county was in session, we think the bond a valid one. No one could be deceived or misled as to the date defendant was required to appear—September 11, 1911. Article 962 of the Procedure provides that, in cases of final judgment or forfeited bail bonds, the proceedings shall be regulated by the proceedings that govern in civil actions, and in no civil action on a contract would such stipulations be held to render the obligation void. It is true that in statutory bonds they must in all essential particulars be drawn in conformity with the requirements of the statute, but, to render a bond of this character absolutely void, some of the essential requirements must have been omitted therefrom, or it must have been so worded as to mislead or deceive. None of the essentials are lacking, and no one we think could have been or were deceived as to the date the accused was required to appear and answer the charge against him. In support of their contention appellants cite us to several cases: Thomas v. State, 12 Tex.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

App. 416; Burnett v. State, 18 Tex. App. 283; Heath v. State, 14 Tex. App. 213; Wegner v. State, 28 Tex. App. 419, 13 S. W. 608. In the Thomas Case it was held that as the bond bound the accused to appear on the 9th day of May, and the term of court could not begin until the 16th day of May, and there was nothing in the bond by which this error as to time was pointed out and corrected, the bond was void. In this case if it could be said that the words "next term of court" and the words "September 11, 1911," one or the other was an error, yet the terms and conditions and stipulations of the bond and time fixed pointed out the error, and fixed a specific day when the court was in session, and the defendant could not have been misled.

In the Burnett Case it was held the bond required the accused to appear on the date named in the bond, and this governed, and not the words "next term of court," and because at the date fixed no term of court could be held the bond was void for that reason. This case supports the judgment of the trial court in this case, he holding that the date fixed was the time of appearance and governed, and it being during a term of court, the bond was valid, and this is in accordance with the decision of the court in the Burnett Case. The Heath Case is not in point, for in that case the issue was, had the time of appearance been changed in the bond after being signed from July to October; and the court held that this issue should have been submitted to the jury. In this case there is no contention that the bond has been changed or altered in any respect since its execution and delivery. In the Wegner Case it was also held that the bond was void because it was changed after being executed, and because it named a past date. In the case of Brite v. State, 24 Tex. 223, when the Supreme Court was composed of Judges Wheeler, Roberts, and Bell, and when it had criminal jurisdiction, that court held: "If a recognizance is defective, its defects cannot be supplied by parol, but only by such intendments as the court can reasonably make by the help of its judicial knowledge of facts. But where the recognizance contains words of certainty, which sufficiently inform the party where and when he is required to appear, other erroneous or contradictory words used in the recognizance may be rejected as surplusage. If, for instance, in the present case, the party had entered into recognizance, to appear at the next term of the district court for Hays county, to be holden on the fourth Monday after the first Monday in September, the same being the 10th day of December, the latter words would have been plainly erroneous. But the party in such case would not be heard to say that the recognizance was void. There would be two truthful recitals in the recognizance, and one false one. It would inform the party that he was required to make his appearance at the next term of the district court of Hays county, and that the next term would be holden on the fourth Monday after the first Monday in September; and the party could not treat the recognizance as a nullity, because it further stated that the fourth Monday after the first Monday in September was the 10th day of December." It is true this case has been criticised and modified to some extent by some of our decisions on account of a change in the verbiage of our procedure, yet the decisions so holding say that the Code now provides that the time must be stated, and are authority for holding the bail bond in this case valid. If you treat the date named as surplusage, it would then read "at the next term of court," which, under the Brite decision, would render it valid. If you treat the words "next term of court" as surplusage, the date as fixed was at a time when a term of court could be legally held, and the later decisions hold the bond valid. Neither stipulation can be construed to fix a time when the district court would not be legally in session, and those cases cited which hold a bond void because the time fixed was a date when the court could not be legally held are not applicable to this case. The bond, when read and construed as a whole, fixed a definite time for the appearance of defendant, and a time when the district court was legally in session in Fannin county, Tex., and it is not void, and the court did not err in admitting it in evidence. The date fixed in the bond governed.

No other questions are presented, and the judgment is affirmed.

BAGGETT v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Nov. 27, 1912.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 595*)—CONTINUANCE—MATERIAL EVIDENCE.

Where, in a prosecution for being an accomplice to arson, the defendant had a subpoena issued for a witness immediately after his arrest, but the sheriff had not succeeded in summoning such witness at the time of trial, a continuance should have been granted upon an application showing that the absent witness would have testified that he was in the defendant's store for 45 minutes before 6 on a certain day and accompanied the defendant when he left, and that the person who committed the arson did not come into the store at 5 minutes to 6 and arrange with the defendant for its commission, as testified to by such principal.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 829*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTION—ACCOMPLICE TESTIMONY.

Where, in a prosecution for being an accomplice to arson, the state offered evidence corroborative only of the fact that the alleged principal burned the house, and the court charged generally as to accomplice testimony and the necessity for corroboration, a refusal of a requested charge that by corroboration, as used in the general charge, was meant that the evidence must connect the defendant with the procuring and hiring of the principal to burn the building, as charged in the indictment, and that it was not sufficient if it merely showed that such principal burned the building, was improper, as such a charge made clear the real issue.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2011; Dec. Dig. § 829.*]

Appeal from District Court, Johnson County; O. L. Lockett, Judge.

Otis Baggett was convicted of being an accomplice to arson, and appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Odell & Johnson, of Cleburne, for appellant. C. E. Lane, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

HARPER, J. Appellant was prosecuted and convicted of the crime of being an accomplice to arson, and his punishment assessed at five years' confinement in the penitentiary.

[1] When this cause was called for trial on June 5th, defendant moved to continue the case on account of the absence of the witness J. L. Harris; it being made to appear that defendant was indicted on the 13th of May and arrested thereafter, and on the 17th day of May he had a subpoena issued for the absent witness, but the sheriff had not succeeded in summoning him at the time of trial. Brock, the state's witness, admitted he burned the house, and says that defendant employed him to do so, that he might collect his insurance on the stock in the house. He further says that this conversation took place in defendant's place of business about 5 minutes before the store was closed, and but a short time before the fire. Defendant, in his application for a continuance, says that Harris will testify that he (Harris) was in defendant's place of business for about 45 minutes before the store was closed, and was there when Brock came in; that he heard all the conversation that took place between Brock and appellant, and no such conversation took place as Brock details; that he (Harris) remained until the store was closed, and went with defendant to a Christmas tree, where they were when the fire occurred. Thus it is seen that this testimony, if the witness Harris would so swear, is very material; for the allegation is that he will swear that he was present when Brock came to the store, and remained there until the store closed. Brock, of course, testifies Harris was not in the store when the trade was made with him to burn the building, but he says the trade was made only about 5 minutes before the store closed; while it is stated Harris will testify that he was at the store for 45 minutes before it closed, and was there when Brock came and left. It is upon this employment of Brock upon which it is sought to convict appellant as an accomplice of Brock. Their testimony would be in direct conflict; and if Harris so testified, and the jury believed him, it would necessarily follow that defendant would be acquitted. The alleged testimony is so material we think the court erred in overruling the application and in not granting a new trial.

[2] The court charged the jury as to accomplice testimony and the necessity for corroboration in a form frequently approved by this court; but, as it is not contended that appellant aided in burning the house, or was present when it was burned, appellant insists that a more direct application of the law than a general charge should have been given, directing the attention of the jury to the fact that the corroboration should be as to whether defendant employed Brock to burn the house. The state offered evidence corroborative of the testimony that he (Brock) burned the house, and appellant insists that under this general charge the jury was misled, and complains because the court failed to give his special charge, which reads: "You are instructed that by corroboration, as used in the general charge, is meant that the evidence must connect the defendant with the procuring and hiring of Dick Brock to burn the building, alleged in the indictment. It is not sufficient if it merely shows that Dick Brock burned the building." Where a special charge is requested, directing the attention of the jury to the real issue in the case, it should be given, if the charge of the court does not aptly do so.

We do not deem it necessary to discuss the alleged newly discovered testimony, as it will not be newly discovered on another trial; nor is it necessary to discuss the other questions raised.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded.

BROWN v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Nov. 20, 1912.)

1. BANKS AND BANKING (§ 85*)—DEPOSITS—OFFENSES.

The indictment alleged that accused received and assented to the reception of a deposit of money in the bank of E., "unincorporated," accused then and there being president of said bank and the bank being insolvent, and that accused then knew that such bank and the owner and owners of said bank was and were insolvent, etc. Pen. Code 1911, art. 532 (Acts 25th Leg. c. 100), provides that if any president or other officer of any banking institution, or "the owner, agent, or manager of any private bank," or the president, etc., of any trust company, shall receive or assent to the reception of any deposit of money in such bank or trust company after he shall have had knowledge of the fact that such bank or trust company, "or the owner or owners of any such private bank," is insolvent, he shall be guilty of a felony. Held, that the indictment charged that the E. bank was a private bank, and was bad for not alleging that accused was its owner, agent, or manager, and the names of the owners, and that they were insolvent when the money was received.

2. BANKS AND BANKING (§ 84*)—RECEIVING DEPOSITS WHILE INSOLVENT—ACCOMPLICES.

One who was the manager of the bank of which accused was president, and had personal charge of its business, receiving all moneys and paying all checks, and knew that the bank was insolvent, was an accomplice to the crime of receiving money on deposit during the bank's insolvency, charged against accused.

Appeal from District Court, Fayette County; Frank S. Roberts, Judge.

E. F. Brown was convicted of unlawfully receiving money on deposit in a bank known to be insolvent, while acting as president, and he appeals. Reversed, and prosecution dismissed.

W. G. Love, of Houston, and John T. Duncan, of La Grange, for appellant. C. E. Lane, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

DAVIDSON, P. J. The charging part of the indictment is as follows: "That E. F. Brown," etc., "did then and there unlawfully receive and assent to the reception of a deposit of money into the bank of the Ellinger Banking Company, unincorporated, of Ellinger, Fayette county, Texas, the said E. F. Brown then and there being the president of said Ellinger Banking Company, and the said Ellinger Banking Company then and there being and was then and there insolvent and in failing circumstances, and the said E. F. Brown then and there knew and had knowledge of the fact that such bank and the owner and owners of said bank was and were insolvent and in failing circumstances. And the said E. F. Brown did then and there receive and assent to the receiving of a deposit of money in the sum of fifty ($50.00) dollars from and by Joe Hubenak, which said money was deposited to the open deposit account subject to check of the said Joe Hubenak in and upon the books of the Ellinger Banking Company as aforesaid, against the peace and dignity of the state."

The first attack on the indictment is that it charges no offense against the laws of the state; second, that it fails to allege that the Ellinger Banking Company was a private bank or partnership, and fails to allege the name or names of the owner or owners or persons composing said private bank or partnership; third, there is no allegation in said indictment that said defendant E. F. Brown was the owner of the said Ellinger Banking Company; fourth, it does not allege that the defendant was the agent of said Ellinger Banking Company; fifth, it fails to set out and allege that defendant was then and there the manager of said Banking Company; sixth, it does not allege that defendant, in receiving and assenting to the reception of a deposit of money in the sum of $50, was acting as agent or manager for the owner or owners of said Ellinger Banking Company; seventh, there is not only no allegation in said indictment as to who was the owner or owners of said Banking Company, but there is no direct allegation that said Banking Company had any owner or owners; eighth, there is no allegation in said indictment that said Banking Company had owners, naming them, and that said owners were then and there insolvent, whereas a private bank can only be insolvent by and through its owner or owners; ninth, there is no allegation to the effect that, at the time said defendant received or assented to the reception of $50 in money, he (defendant) knew or had knowledge that said bank was then and there insolvent.

[1] Appellant was indicted under article 532 of the Revised Penal Code. This statute was passed by the Twenty-Fifth Legislature, found on page 130 of the Acts of that body, and is as follows: "If any president, director, manager, cashier, or other officer, of any banking institution, or the owner, agent, or manager, of any private bank or banking institution, or the president, vice president, secretary, treasurer, director, or agent, of any trust company or institution doing business in this state, shall receive or assent to the reception of any deposit of money or other valuable thing into such bank or banking institution, or trust company or institution, or if any such officer, owner, or agent, of such bank or banking institution, or if any president, vice president, secretary, treasurer, director, or agent, of such trust company, or institution, shall create or assent to the creation of any debt, debts, or indebtedness, in consideration of or by reason of which indebtedness any money or valuable property shall be received into such bank or banking institution, or trust company or institution, after he shall have had knowledge of the fact that such bank, banking institution, or trust company or institution, or the owner or owners of any such private bank, is insolvent or in failing circumstances, he shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be punished by confinement in the penitentiary for a term of not less than two nor more than ten years; provided, that the failure of any such bank or banking institution, or trust company or institution, shall be prima facie evidence of knowledge on the part of any such officer or person that the same was insolvent or in failing circumstances when the money or property was received on deposit."

Under this statute there are three characters of banking institutions: First, incorporated or chartered banks; second, private banks or banking institutions; and, third, trust companies or institutions. Appellant was indicted under the second clause; that is, that clause of the statute which relates to private banking institutions, which denounces punishment against the owner, agent, or manager of such private bank or private banking institution. However, the other two clauses of the statute would not refer to or include this indictment. It rests solely and alone upon the second clause, which relates to private banks. Under the statutory provisions of that clause the punishment is denounced only against the owner, agent, or manager of a private bank or banking institution. This indictment charges that appellant was the president of an "unincorporated" bank. It does not undertake to charge that it was an incorporated institution, but expressly excludes that idea. It also excludes the idea that it was a trust company. In fact, the whole record shows that it was, if any bank at all, a private bank; and the indictment so charges it to be. In order to charge appellant with an offense under that clause of the statute, it was necessary to charge him as being the owner, agent, or manager of a private bank. This is the statutory requirement. It was by this means that the Legislature sought to hold responsible for criminal violation parties who committed fraud upon its depositors. This statute does not recognize the president of the institution as being responsible for receiving deposits. It was not charged that appellant was the agent or the manager of the institution, nor was he charged as being owner. It was said in Roby v. State, 41 Tex. Cr. R. at page 154, 51 S. W. at page 1115: "This is an attempt at combining two classes, the first and second, because that which relates to the private bank does not set forth a 'president' among those against whom the punishment is denounced. In order to constitute a good indictment under the first class, it should have alleged that the Tyler Banking Company was a corporation; under the second, that it was a private bank or banking institution, and, if a private bank or partnership, the names of the owners or persons composing the partnership must be alleged. Wherever a partnership is sued, it is necessary to set out the names of the persons composing that partnership. Such has been the uniform ruling in Texas, since Bank v. Simonton, 2 Tex. 531. This rule is expressly recognized in the late decision of Frank v. Tatum, 87 Tex. 204, 25 S. W. 409. In this latter decision this language is used: "The familiar rule that all partners who are jointly bound upon a copartnership contract must be joined as defendants in a suit upon it is not affected by the foregoing articles of our statutes [referring to articles 1224, 1347, Revised Civil Statutes]. Partnerships are not thereby invested with any of the characteristics of corporations, nor are they expressly or impliedly authorized to sue or be sued in their firm names, independently of their members." Such has been the ruling, as well, in criminal cases in this state, so far as we are aware. Nasets v. State, 32 S. W. 698; White v. State, 24 Tex. App. 231, 5 S. W. 857, 5 Am. St. Rep. 879; Thurmond v. State, 30 Tex. App. 539, 17 S. W. 1098; Carder v. State, 35 Tex. Cr. R. 105, 31 S. W. 678; Colter v. State, 40 Tex. Cr. R. 165, 49 S. W. 379; Crawford v. State, 40 Tex. Cr. R. 344, 50 S. W. 378. The fact that the statute in question uses the expression 'private bank or banking institution' does not change this rule; nor does the fact that the 'Tyler Banking Company' did its business under the name of the 'Tyler Banking Company' make that mere name a legal entity; nor does it endow it with a personal existence distinct from or independent of the individuals who compose that banking company. In fact, it was simply a firm name, under which the individuals composing it did their banking business. If the individuals were solvent, the Tyler Banking Company was solvent; if they were insolvent, the Tyler Banking Company was insolvent; and, in order to have a good indictment under the peculiar wording of this statute, it was necessary to allege the names of the persons composing the Tyler Banking Company."

It will be noticed from an inspection of the indictment that it does not allege that appellant was either the owner, agent, or manager; nor does it allege the names of any owner of the bank. The indictment evidently undertook to charge that the Ellinger Banking Company was a private bank. If this is not correct, then the indictment charges nothing and is useless. It does not allege any of the facts which would constitute it an incorporated bank, but expressly alleges it to be "unincorporated," nor does it allege that it was a trust institution. Therefore the conclusion is irresistible that it was intended to charge that the Ellinger Banking Company was a private bank. It will readily be perceived that a president of a private bank may not be one of the owners of the bank; he may not have a dollar's interest in the bank. The statute does not hold him responsible as president for receiving money on deposit, where the bank is insolvent or in failing circumstances. No such officer is mentioned in connection with private banks. In order to so hold him, it must allege and prove that he was either the owner, the agent, or the manager. The indictment should have alleged that appellant was either the owner, agent, or manager, and, in addition, it should have alleged the owners of the bank, and, further, that these owners were insolvent or in failing circumstances at the time the money was received on deposit, and that the accused knew those facts. In a private bank all parties are partners, and the bank could not be insolvent, under the terms of this law, unless the owners were insolvent. A different rule obtains in chartered institutions. Rules with reference to the responsibility of partners on one hand, and corporators of chartered institutions on the other, are widely variant. In a partnership all parties are responsible for the debts of the concern, unless it be a limited partnership under the statute. The Ellinger Bank was not a limited partnership. The evidence is to the effect that there were several partners in this particular institution, whose names are set out in the statement of facts. These should have been stated in the indictment, and the allegation made that these owners were insolvent or in failing circumstances at the time of the deposit, etc. As was said in the Roby Case, supra: "If the individuals were solvent, the Tyler Banking Company was solvent; if they were insolvent, the Tyler Banking Company was insolvent; and, in order to have a good indictment under the peculiar wording of this statute, it was necessary to allege the names of the persons composing the Tyler Banking Company." These names, as shown by the statement of facts, were readily ascertainable. The manager of the concern, Mr. Broesche, mentions the names of these partners in his testimony. There is nothing to indicate in the indictment that the grand jury did not know the names of the owners, nor does it charge that they used any diligence to ascertain the names of these parties, or that they were unknown to that body.

We have disposed of this indictment in a general way, without going more specifically into a review of the many grounds urged against its validity. It is clearly not in accordance with the statute, and does not charge the offense therein denounced. The indictment should have been quashed and the judgment arrested, as urged by appellant.

[2] There are several other grounds urged for reversal of the judgment, which we think are well taken. One of these will be noticed. Mr. Broesche was used as a witness. His testimony, as does the testimony of all the witnesses, shows beyond question that he was the manager of the Ellinger Banking Company, that he attended to its business matters, and had personal direction and charge. He received all the money and paid all checks, and in fact had personal supervision of the concern. Appellant was not at Ellinger, and had not been for three years. He lived in Houston, Harris county. Another one of the partners in the concern, Mr. N. K. Freeman, lived at another and different point. The residences of the other partners in the concern are not stated, but there were several of those. The evidence of Mr. Broesche further demonstrates that he knew the business and was intimate with it, and if it was insolvent or in failing circumstances at the time of receiving the deposit no one knew that better than Mr. Broesche. Its indebtedness, under his statement, was something in the neighborhood of $25,000 at the time of the reception of this money, and it had something like $1,300 in cash on hand. In fact, his testimony indicates that the concern was anything but a solvent one. Under these circumstances, we are of opinion that appellant was correct in his contention that the court should have charged that Mr. Broesche was an accomplice, and appropriately given the law in regard to this question to the jury.

[3] There is another question it may be well enough to notice. The court failed to give the jury any rule in regard to the question of solvency by which they might determine that question. The jury were not informed when a banking institution was insolvent or in failing circumstances. This question is urged in various ways in the trial court. This court, in Fleming v. State, 62 Tex. Cr. R. 653, 139 S. W. 598, laid down the rule that should govern the trial courts in charging this phase of the law.

[4] There are other questions in regard to the admission and rejection of testimony, which we think are well taken, but not necessary to be discussed. But one phase of these matters will be noticed. Several witnesses were permitted to testify that on Saturday, before the bank closed its doors on the following Tuesday, over appellant's objection, they had made deposits in this bank. Appellant is charged with having received the deposits set out in the indictment on Monday following the Saturday in question. Upon another trial we are of opinion the evidence of the deposits received on Saturday should not be received or permitted to go to the jury. It could shed no light upon the question, had no tendency to show that the bank was insolvent, or in failing circumstances, and did not undertake to connect the defendant with this in any manner; for the evidence shows positively he was not there, and had not been for three years, and Mr. Broesche was not on trial, and so far as the record is concerned seems not to have been indicted. He, and not appellant, received the deposits and entered them to the general account.

Without going further into a discussion of the questions set out for reversal, we dispose of the case as above indicated, and for the reasons stated the judgment will be reversed, and because the indictment is insufficient the prosecution will be dismissed.

2. RAPE (§ 16*)—"ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO COMMIT RAPE"—FORCE—"ASSAULT."

Under Pen. Code 1911, art. 1063, defining "rape" as the carnal knowledge of a female person under the age of 15 years other than the wife of the person, with or without her consent, and article 1008, defining "assault" as any unlawful violence on the person of another with intent to injure him and that any attempt to commit a battery or any threatening gesture showing an immediate intention coupled with an ability to commit a battery, an assault to rape a child under 15 may be committed without force, and proof that accused lay in wait for prosecutrix, a child under 15, as she was going to school, and after making an indecent proposal to her chased her until she outran him, was sufficient to sustain a conviction of assault with intent to rape.

Davidson, P. J., dissenting.

Appeal from District Court, Hood County; W. J. Oxford, Judge.

Sam Gage was convicted of assault with intent to rape, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Estes & Estes, Payne & Davenport, and Levi Herring, all of Granbury, for appellant. John J. Hiner, of Granbury, and C. E. Lane, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

PRENDERGAST, J. Appellant was indicted, convicted, and given the lowest penalty, two years, for an assault upon a little girl, Pearl Martin, 12 years of age with the intent to have carnal knowledge of her, she not being his wife, alleged to have occurred on or about March 20, 1912.

Appellant did not testify. The testimony is uncontradicted. It shows this state of fact: That appellant, whose age was not given, but the circumstances show was a young man, living with his father in the community where the assault occurred, knew this little girl and had known her for some time, and went to the same school which she did the year before. That the little girl lived with her uncle, her mother being dead and her father away, and had since she was two years old, and lived about one mile from the school-house where she was then attending school. That in going back and forth to and from school she went alone generally and most of the way along a public road, but that when she got to the place of a Mr. West she went into his pasture, thence along a trail about a quarter of a mile therein, to the school-house, it being situated in Mr. West's pasture. That in thus passing along through this pasture she was about 200 yards from the West residence, which fronted the opposite direction from where she was when this assault occurred, and that between the residence and where she was the barn, lots, stables, and other outhouses of Mr. West were located, and that also between where she was and the West premises were scattering trees and perhaps some undergrowth; that at the point where she would enter and did enter this pasture of Mr. West on her way back and forth to school was a skirt of timber and undergrowth. On one side of the trail she traveled, this timber was thick or heavy, and on the other side between there and the West house the timber was more open and scattered. That some few weeks before this assault, one Pendergrast, a state's witness in this case, who showed that he was a rural mail carrier and that he was in the habit of going along this trail through this skirt of timber to reach the boxes to take up and deliver mail matter, stated that he knew both the appellant and said little girl, and knew that the little girl was in the habit of going back and forth along this trail to and from school; that he had seen her repeatedly do so. This witness then testified, as shown by the statement of facts, this: "Something like a month before the date of the matter in controversy I was returning from my rural mail box to my home, and, having crossed the trail along this bunch of timber, I saw the defendant lying on the ground in a thicket and near the trail or pathway used by Pearl Martin. At the time I saw defendant he was about middle ways of the timber, and some 15 or 20 steps from the trail. He got up from the ground as I came up to him, and we stood there talking for a few minutes, when the girl, Pearl Martin, came along the trail on her way from school. Just as the girl passed by us, defendant said to me, 'I would like to have a piece of that.' I made no reply or comment on his remark, and he then said again, 'Do you reckon I could get it in her?'

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes.

I told defendant I did not know, and he then said, 'I am going to ask her for a piece some day, and if she don't give it to me I am going to take it away from her.' I then said to defendant that he had better not do anything like that, and that he was liable 'to get his foot in it.' Defendant and I then talked there for a few minutes, and I started on my way home, and defendant started back and went in the direction of his home."

We think it best, under the circumstances, to here give in full a copy of the testimony of this little girl, Pearl Martin, as it is contained in the statement of facts before us: "I live with my uncle, A. J. Robertson, close to the town of Tolar. My mother is dead. I do not know where my father is. I am now 12 years old and have lived with my uncle since I was 2 years old. I attend school near Tolar, and have to go something like a mile from my home to the schoolhouse, located on the Owen West farm, first going the road through the Gage farm, and then through the fence into Mr. West's pasture, and along a trailway by a bunch of timber adjoining the West farm, and by a fence inclosing the West field and pasture. It was my custom to go this way, as the distance by the public road was longer. Along this trailway the timber was on my right and the fence on my left as I went south to the schoolhouse, through Mr. West's pasture. On the day of the trouble with the defendant, I had gone in the usual way towards the schoolhouse, and had got into the pasture, and through the fence and into the trail by the timber, when I saw the defendant coming through the timber. I do not know the direction he came from, as I just happened to look up and see him coming towards me through the timber walking as though he was coming to the trail where I was, and I then walked on pretty fast. When he got up to where I was, he asked me if I had seen the calves. He was then near the trail where I was. I told defendant I had not seen them." The witness was then interrogated and answered as follows: "Q. Then what did he say to you? A. He said, 'Give me a piece.' Q. Then what did you say to him? A. I didn't say anything; I just went on. Q. How did you go? A. I run. Q. What did you run for? A. I was afraid of him. Q. When you ran, what did he do? A. He ran too. He ran after me a distance of about 60 yards. We were running in the direction of Mr. Owen West's house, and defendant stopped just before we got to the edge of the timber. As we got there, I told him I was going to tell Mr. West on him, and he stopped and went back towards his home or off into the woods. Q. Did he try to catch you? A. Yes, sir; it looked like he was. Q. What kept him from catching you? A. I was running down the path, and he had to go around the bushes, and he was trying to head me off, and I outran him. After I had run through the timber, or after I had got to the edge of it, I ran to Mr. West's house, where my teacher, Miss Beulah Woodward, lived, and told her what had happened. I also saw Mrs. West, and my teacher told her what I had said, and I then went on back home and did not go to school that day until some time later in the day. I told my folks at home about what the defendant had done. All this occurred in Hood county, Tex. I was not the wife of the defendant."

Cross-examined, the witness said: "I am in the fourth grade in school, and study arithmetic, geography, grammar, physiology, etc. Defendant has also attended the same school where I was, and was there a portion of the time last winter and also last summer. He did not attend the last term of the school. I have been at the defendant's home a number of times, but do not recall that he has ever been at my home. He had never offered me any insult before the occasion referred to, but always treated me nicely, and I was never afraid of him before this occasion as I was then. I usually went from home through this trail by the timber in going to my school, but in returning home I generally went another route, unless defendant's sister was at school, when I would go back the same trailway with her. I have no recollection of seeing defendant and Mr. Pendergrast in the timber before the occasion in question. When the defendant was running after me, and we had got to the edge of the timber, I could not see anybody at Mr. West's home. I could see the house, or where the house was; but there was nobody that I could see. The barn was between his house and where we were at the time. I don't know which way defendant had come from when I first saw him in the woods; he was just coming to where I was walking towards the trail and first asked me if I had seen his calves. I don't know what he had been doing. I just happened to look up and saw him coming towards me. After we had run some distance towards the edge of the timber, I could see some other children going to school along the road the other side of Mr. West's barn. I was then running in their direction. After I began to run defendant told me to stop, and I told him I wouldn't stop, and that I would go and tell Mr. West on him. He did not then intimate to me not to tell what had happened or what had been said, but turned back into the woods and went off. He did not put his hands on me because he didn't have the chance to do so." The witness, interrogated, answered as follows: "Q. How close did he get to you? A. About a yard. Q. Let's have the distance now, as near as you can, call out some object in this room—some distance across this room? A. About as far as from me to you (estimated to be eight to ten feet). Q. When you went to running, he never did get any closer to you? A. No, sir. Q. Were there any obstructions between you and him? A. Yes, sir; the bushes were between us. Q. When he went to running after you, did he get in the trail where you were, or did he run out away from the trail? A. No, sir; he never got in the trail; he just run around the trees; he jumped over some bushes, and said, 'I want to tell you something.' Q. You told him you wouldn't wait, and for him to go away, and he then turned and left you? A. Yes, sir. I have only guessed at the distance I ran as 60 yards. Defendant didn't run as far as I did, as I ran until I got away from the woods. I just estimate the distance the defendant and I ran together as 60 yards. I suppose the defendant can outrun me, but he couldn't catch me on account of the bushes he was running in. I would gain on him when he was going around the bushes. I don't know whether he could have caught me or not, but I was running my best." Re-examined by the district attorney: "Defendant did not stop running after me until I told him I was going to tell Mr. West, and when I did so tell him he stopped and turned back into the woods. I was running as best I could, and defendant seemed to be trying to head me off. I only guess at the distance from that place to the home of Mr. West and do not really know the distance, but after I got out of this bunch of timber Mr. West's house was in plain view of me."

Her teacher, Miss Woodward, testified that she first saw this little girl on that morning about 8 o'clock when she (the witness) was preparing to go to school; that the girl on this occasion first came to the West house in Mrs. West's room and then to her room, and, upon being asked how she was, she stated that she was scared most to death. "As she told me that she broke down and commenced to cry, and fell over on my arm. I was standing in front of the dresser at the time, and pulled her up to me and told her to sit down and calm herself and tell me what was the matter." The state then introduced Mr. West, and Mr. Bowman, the deputy sheriff, who, having heard of this matter, investigated it for tracks along this trail. The effect of their testimony is that they describe the location substantially as stated above; that they hunted for tracks where the little girl claimed to have been chased by the appellant, and found, on the ground where she had indicated appellant had run her, her tracks showing that she had run as claimed by her, and the tracks of a man showing where he had jumped over and run around undergrowth and brush substantially as detailed by her; and that those tracks showed that the person was running and jumping in the direction and for the distance testified to by the little girl—in fact, in every way confirming and corroborating her testimony.

[1] There is no bill of exception in the record. In the motion for new trial there are some very general complaints of the charge of the court. They point out no specific error whatever and are too general to be considered by this court under the uniform holding and ruling thereof. Byrd v. State, 151 S. W. 1068, recently decided; Berg v. State, 142 S. W. 884; Ryan v. State, 142 S. W. 878. However, the appellant's contention on these complaints seems to be that the court did not in its charge require that force and an actual battery should be committed upon this child before a conviction was authorized. The court's charge, as a whole, is an admirable one and properly submits the questions to the jury.

[2] It cannot longer be doubted that the law of this state is that in an assault to rape a child under 15 years of age, or in committing the act of rape upon such child, the statute means what it says, that the offense is complete and is constituted whether it is "with or without force." In other words, that neither the indictment has to charge, nor the proof to show, that force was used to commit such an act upon such child, even though it is when such force is charged upon a woman over the age of 15 years. Hightower v. State, 143 S. W. 1168, and cases there cited. Even if it was necessary to show force in such an assault upon a girl under 15 years of age, the evidence in this case abundantly and without contradiction shows that all the force that would be necessary in such a case was used by the appellant, conceding that he did not actually touch her person. He was doing everything possible within his power to do so and was prevented only by the fact that she outran him and he could not and did not catch her before she came in sight and hearing of other persons.

The evidence in this case did not call for a charge on either aggravated or simple assault, and none such whatever was requested by appellant on the trial. The evidence, without question, shows an assault with intent to rape, or nothing. The indictment strictly follows the statute and is in accordance therewith and the approved forms, held many times to be sufficient by this court. None of the matters above mentioned require any discussion or further statement. The fact is, the appellant's sole contention in his brief and argument is that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict, and for that reason insists that this court should reverse and remand.

Our law defines "rape" on a child under 15 years of age, not the wife of the person committing the rape, as: "Rape is the carnal knowledge of a female under the age of fifteen years, other than the wife of the person, with or without her consent, and with or without the use of force, threats or fraud." Article 1063, P. C. In other words, the mere act of carnal knowledge by a man with any child under 15 years of age is ipso facto rape. Also, by our law an "assault" with intent to rape is: "If any person shall assault a woman with intent to commit the offense of rape, he shall be punished," etc. Article 1029, P. C. ▲ "woman," in this statute, means any female, and includes a child under 15 years of age. Under all the authorities, in cases charging an assault with intent to rape it is necessary for the court to define an "assault" as that is defined by our law. Our law in defining an "assault" also, at the same time, defines an "assault and battery." Both of these offenses, "assault" and "assault and battery," being defined by the same statute: "The use of any unlawful violence upon the person of another with intent to injure him, whatever be the means or the degree of violence used, is an assault and battery. Any attempt to commit a battery, or any threatening gesture showing, in itself or by words accompanying it, an immediate intention, coupled with an ability to commit a battery, is an assault." Article 1008, P. C. Then article 1012, P. C. says: "Any means used by the person assaulting, as by spitting in the face, or otherwise, which is capable of inflicting an injury, comes within the definition of an assault." Then follows the next, article 1013, defining what is meant by "coupled with ability to commit," saying: "(1) That the person making the assault must be in such a position that, if not prevented, he may inflict a battery upon the person assailed. (2) That he must be within such distance of the person so assailed as to make it within his power to commit the battery by the use of the means with which he attempts it. (3) It follows that one who is, at the time of making an attempt to commit a battery, under such restraint as to deprive him of the power to act, or who is at so great a distance from the person assailed as that he cannot reach his person by the use of the means with which he makes the attempt, is not guilty of an assault. But the use of any dangerous weapon, or the semblance thereof, in an angry or threatening manner, with intent to alarm another, and under circumstances calculated to effect that object, comes within the meaning of an assault."

From these statutory enactments it is clearly shown that an assault with intent to rape is committed when an assault is shown, and the intent in committing it is to have carnal knowledge. That it was appellant's intention on this occasion to have carnal knowledge of this child we think cannot be questioned. As stated by him to the witness previously, he intended to ask her for it, and, if she refused, he was by force going to take it away from her. Just what he had recently said he was going to do he attempted with all the power within him to execute on this occasion. The law does not require that he shall commit a battery upon the child, but simply and solely an assault. He attempted an assault and battery upon her with all the means within his power at the time and was prevented from doing so by the party herself outrunning him and thereby succeeding in escaping from him. That he could and would have at this time committed a battery on this child, if he had not been prevented, is without doubt, and it cannot be doubted, from the testimony. That he also alarmed her in this assault cannot be doubted from the testimony. What was said by this court, through Judge Henderson, in Gann v. State, 40 S. W. 726, is peculiarly applicable and pertinent here. It is: "Prosecutor, in fact, may not have been alarmed at the drawn knife, but this would not detract from the intent with which appellant may have drawn the knife and advanced towards him. Nor is the contention of appellant to the effect that he did not make an assault at all, because he was restrained before he made a battery, any more tenable. The fact that A. and B. have a quarrel, and that A. draws his knife, and starts towards B., but before he gets to him C. catches and restrains him, so it is impossible for him to get to B., would not constitute an assault under the statute, would be a monstrous doctrine. That is not what subdivision 3 under article 592, Pen. Code 1895, means. In this case the assault was made when it was entirely possible for defendant to get to the prosecutor and commit a battery upon him. There was no insuperable difficulty in this matter; but, after the assault was made, and while he was attempting to consummate his purpose and commit a battery, he was arrested by a bystander and restrained. His assault, however, was complete when he had the ability to commit the battery. The fact that he was prevented from making a battery did not do away with the offense of an assault already committed by him." So it may be well said in this case that appellant was in position at the time he made the assault upon this child to have committed a battery upon her and would have done so unquestionably if he had not been prevented. That he was prevented there can be no question. It does not require the intervention of some third party to prevent the battery. The statute clearly contemplates that anything which, or any person who, prevents him is embraced, meant and included. What prevented him on this occasion from committing the battery when he began the assault? Nothing but the fact that the child became alarmed and that she outran him. That he would have committed the battery, if not thus prevented, cannot be doubted. His assault was complete. The fact that he was prevented from making the battery, as said by Judge Henderson above, did not do away with the offense of an assault already committed by him. It would also, as said by Judge Henderson, be a monstrous doctrine to hold that under the circumstances in this case appellant did not commit an assault upon this child, simply and solely because he was prevented from consummating that assault into a battery, and it cannot relieve him of the penalty for the offense he committed. In our opinion, the evidence clearly justifies, if it does not imperatively require, a finding that he was guilty and proven so, beyond a reasonable doubt, by the testimony in this case.

The judgment is affirmed.

DAVIDSON, P. J. The Gann Case has absolutely no relevancy to the facts of this case. The statute provides that the party must be within reach of the party alleged to be assaulted so as to be able to carry out his intent. The state's evidence positively places appellant where he could not either make an assault or take hold of the person of the little girl. No one prevented him from doing so. He did not get within reaching distance. This case will stand alone, sui generis and in violation of the statute.

I cannot concur. I dissent. A party ought at least be brought within some shadow of the law.

PASCHAL v. INMAN.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Dallas.
Nov. 2, 1912. Rehearing Denied Nov.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES (§ 8*)—PRIVATE WEIGHMASTERS.

The statutes creating the office of official weigher do not prohibit private persons from weighing produce, but only forbid factors, commission merchants, etc., from weighing the cotton of others consigned to them for sale; nor is such private weighing forbidden by the amendment of 1905 (Acts 1905, c. 84, Rev. Civ. St. 1911, art. 7834), requiring private weighers, doing business where there are no public weighers, to give bond for faithful performance of their duties in lesser amount than required of public weighers.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Weights and Measures, Cent. Dig. § 10; Dec. Dig. § 8.*]

Appeal from Wood County Court; R. W. Simpson, Judge.

Suit by Sam Paschal against Hugh Inman. From a judgment dissolving a temporary injunction, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. H. Beavers, of Winnsboro, for appellant. Wilkerson & Wilkerson, of Mt. Vernon, for appellee.

RASBURY, J. Appellant, Sam Paschal, the duly elected and qualified public weigher of justice precinct No. 4, of Wood county, filed this suit against appellee, Hugh Inman, to enjoin him from conducting the business of private weigher in that precinct, and to recover damages in the sum of $1,000. The agreed facts show the election and qualification of Paschal; that Inman is engaged in same precinct as a private weigher; that he is not a factor or commission merchant, or engaged in a like occupation, nor engaged in buying or selling cotton or other produce; that appellant, Paschal, has been damaged, as claimed, if appellee was unlawfully conducting the business of private weigher. The trial judge issued a temporary restraining order; but upon motion by appellee, and upon a hearing of the evidence, the same was dissolved.

As indicated, the proceeding assails the right of appellee to conduct the business of private weigher in a precinct where there is a duly elected and qualified official weigher. The several legislative acts by which the office of official weigher was established have been often construed, and the decisions of our appellate courts have been uniform, with one exception. The cases all hold that owners of produce may engage others than official weighers to weigh same, which is held to include the right of private persons to perform such services for the owners. As construed, the statutes forbid only factors, commission merchants, and persons pursuing similar occupations from weighing the cotton of others consigned to them for sale, the inhibition against that class of persons being made to protect owners against false and fraudulent accounts, and decline to go further on the ground that to do so would interfere with the owner's complete domain over his property. Watts v. State, 61 Tex. 184; Johnson v. Martin, 75 Tex. 33, 12 S. W. 321; Martin v. Johnson, 11 Tex. Civ. App. 628, 33 S. W. 306; Ex parte Hunter, 34 Tex. Cr. R. 114, 29 S. W. 482; Smith v. Wilson, 18 Tex. Civ. App. 24, 44 S. W. 556; Whitfield v. Terrell Compress Co., 28 Tex. Civ. App. 235, 62 S. W. 117; Galt v. Holder, 32 Tex. Civ. App. 564, 75 S. W. 569; Davis v. McInnis, 35 Tex. Civ. App. 594, 81 S. W. 75; Gray v. Eleazer, 43 Tex. Civ. App. 417, 94 S. W. 911; Hedgpeth v. Hamilton, 128 S. W. 709; Hedgpeth v. Hamilton (Sup.) 140 S. W. 1084.

The amendment of 1905 (Acts 1905, p. 117; article 7834, R. S. 1911) contains nothing indicating any intention on the part of the Legislature to depart from the rule announced by the courts. The amendment provides, in substance, that in future all private weighers, doing business in places where there are no public weighers, shall in effect give the bond in lesser amount now required by public weighers, conditioned that he will faithfully perform his duties and turn over all produce weighed, etc. This amendment, as we construe it, means nothing more than to afford owners of produce a bonded weigher in those places where there is no appointed or elected official weigher, and in no sense intended to deprive the owner of employing the private weigher to weigh his produce, if he chose to do so.

The pleading and evidence discloses no material difference between this case and those above cited, and hence we feel it our duty to follow the settled rule.

The judgment is affirmed.

Although an appeal was taken from a judgment pending in term, and at a time when the court still had control thereover, and might have granted a new trial, or amended or changed the same, it was none the less a "final judgment," and the appeal was perfected by the ending of the term without a change therein or the granting of a new trial.

Appeal from Bexar County Court; Geo. W. Huntress, Judge.

Action between W. Robbie and James V. Upson. From a judgment for Upson, Robbie appeals. On motion to dismiss appeal. Overruled.

FLY, J. This case was tried at the May term of the county court of Bexar county for civil cases, which term began on May 6, 1912, and could have held until the first Monday in July, which in this instance was July 1st, a period of exactly 8 weeks. The cause was tried on May 11, 1912, by the court, without a jury, and judgment rendered in favor of appellee. Appellant gave notice of appeal, and on May 23d filed his appeal bond, which was approved by the clerk. County court did not close until May 28th.

It is the contention of appellee that the bond was prematurely filed, because the court had full control over its judgment until the end of the term, and the judgment was not final, and could not be appealed from. It is true that the county court had control over the judgment, and might have granted a new trial therein, or amended or changed the same, and the jurisdiction of the appellate court might not attach until final adjournment of the trial court. Still, when that adjournment took place, and the court had not in any way exercised its power and authority over the judgment, the jurisdiction of this court at once attached under the bond. That is what is decided in the cases of Blum v. Wettermark, 58 Tex. 125, and Garza v. Baker, 58 Tex. 483, cited by appellee to sustain a totally antagonistic proposition to the one asserted by the Supreme Court. In the case first cited appellant filed his appeal bond during the term of court at which the judgment was rendered, and afterwards, before the court adjourned, the court set aside its judgment. The parties in whose favor the judgment was rendered objected to the action of the court in granting the new trial because the appeal had been perfected. The Supreme Court overruled that contention, holding that the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court would have attached after adjournment if the new trial had not been granted. The same ruling was made in the last case cited.

In the case of Churchill v. Martin, 65 Tex. 367, it was held that: "After the approval of such a bond the district court, during the term, still has jurisdiction to modify or set aside the judgment appealed from, but not to enforce such judgment. When the bond has been filed and approved, the complaining party has done, substantially, all required of him to give this court jurisdiction of the case, and this court may then, under the Constitution, to protect or enforce its jurisdiction, issue writs of injunction," etc. This was said in regard to an appeal perfected during the term of the court at which the judgment was rendered, and the appeal was declared perfected.

The law requires the filing of an appeal bond within 20 days after notice of appeal is given, which would often cause it to be filed during the term of the court in cases tried in a court whose term may continue more than 8 weeks, and such procedure would not be required if the judgment were not such a one as could be appealed from. The term of the court at which this cause was tried could not continue more than 8 weeks and the filing of the appeal bond during the term is not sustained on that ground, but on the ground that an appeal bond can properly be filed in any case during the term at which the judgment was rendered, no matter what the length of the term may be and if the judgment is not set aside before the end of the term by the trial judge the appeal will be perfected. Ellis v. Harrison, 24 Tex. Civ. App. 13, 56 S. W. 592, 57 S. W. 984.

The motion to dismiss the appeal is overruled.

On Motion for Rehearing.

In the petition filed by appellee he set up his defenses very fully, pleading the merits, and the same were denied, "each and every one of them," and this placed the case on its merits before the court. In the judgment it is recited that "the matters in controversy as well of fact as of law were submitted to the court" and under the pleadings the whole case must have been considered. The petition for an injunction taken with the motion to dissolve placed the case on its merits before the court. The second order granting the motion to dismiss is set aside and the first order overruling it is adhered to.

LANZA v. ROE et al.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Dallas.

2. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 55*)—SEPARATE PROPERTY.

A wife's administrator was entitled to the management and control of separate property left by her to administer it under the supervision of the probate court.

3. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 276*)—COMMUNITY PROPERTY—ADMINISTRATION—ACTIONS—INTERVENTION.

The general creditors of the husband of one of two deceased married women, claimed to have been partners in a business in their own right, could not intervene in a suit by the administrator of one of them against the administrator of the husband of the other, claiming that defendant had wrongfully taken possession of the property as belonging to the community, when it was separate property; there being no showing that the debts cannot be paid out of the husband's estate or that his administrator is not properly defending the suit against him.

Appeal from District Court, Dallas County; E. B. Muse, Judge.

Action by Luke Lanza, administrator, against J. M. Roe, administrator, and another, in which McDougal, Cameron & Webster intervened. From a judgment dismissing petition, plaintiff appealed. Reversed and remanded.

Lawther & Worsham, of Dallas, for appellant. A. B. Flanary and Short & Field, all of Dallas, for appellees.

RAINEY, C. J. This suit was instituted by Luke Lanza, administrator of the estate of Mary Lanza, deceased, against J. M. Roe, administrator of the estate of W. M. McMasters, deceased, and Manuel Depuma, administrator of the estate of Lena McMasters, deceased. McDougal, Cameron & Webster, claiming to be creditors of the estate of W. M. McMasters, deceased, intervened.

Appellant alleged in his petition that Mary Lanza and Lena McMasters, with the knowledge and consent of her husband, at the time of their death, were engaged in the conduct of a grocery store and saloon in the city of Dallas as a copartnership; that they contributed equally of their means to the purchase of the original stock in trade, and of their labor in the management and conduct of said business; that the moneys advanced by the said Lena McMasters was her separate property, and that the deceased, W. M. Mc-

Masters, had in no wise contributed thereto; that under the agreement existing between them Lena McMasters and Mary Lanza were to share equally the profits and losses accruing from said business, and that on their death they and their administrators were, and became, the joint owners of the goods and fixtures in said store and saloon. Appellant further alleged that on, to wit, the 15th day of August, 1910, W. M. McMasters willfully and maliciously killed Lena McMasters and Mary Lanza, and then died from violence willfully inflicted by his own hand; that on his death the defendant J. M. Roe qualified as his administrator, and as such took charge and control of said store, together with the fixtures and stock in trade, and proceeded to administer upon it as property belonging to his estate; that he sold the goods and fixtures belonging to said store, and appropriated the proceeds of said sale to his own use and benefit, and to the benefit of the estate of W. M. McMasters, deceased; that appellant qualified as the administrator of the estate of Mary Lanza, deceased, and the defendant Manuel Depuma qualified as the administrator of the estate of Lena McMasters, deceased, and as such administrators demanded of the defendant the delivery of said property and the proceeds of said sale, which he declined to do, whereupon this suit was filed. The defendant Manuel Depuma answered, setting up substantially the matters and things alleged in appellant's petition, and prayed for a distribution of the proceeds of the sale of said property as between him and the administrator of the estate of Mary Lanza as appeared to be just and equitable in the premises. Defendant Roe answered by general demurrer and specially, in effect, that the property held by him was the community property of W. M. McMasters, deceased, and his wife, Lena McMasters, deceased, and was held and controlled by him as administrator, duly appointed by the probate court of Dallas county. He further pleaded that he took possession of same as a stakeholder for the benefit of the true parties at interest, and same is subject to the orders of the court.

Interveners' plea, after a general demurrer and general denial, charged as follows: "For further special answer herein intervenor denies that the said Mary Lanza and Lena McMasters were engaged in the conduct and operation of a grocery store and saloon, situated on Elm street, in the city of Dallas, equally interested as copartners, and that the said W. M. McMasters was in no wise interested in said business, and that he contributed nothing to its establishment or maintenance, but say that the said W. M. McMasters was interested in said business, and that he had the sole charge and management of the same, and that he contracted debts for goods purchased and placed on sale therein, and that he paid said debts, and that all parties held him out to be the manager and owner of said business, and intervenor further says that the business conducted by W. M. McMasters was the community property of himself and wife, Lena McMasters, and that the said W. M. McMasters purchased of intervenor groceries and goods from time to time for the purpose of replenishing his stock in trade, and that at the time of his death he was indebted to intervenor in the sum of $190.71, and that said account has been duly sworn to, presented to the administrator for allowance, has been allowed by him, and filed in the probate court as a claim against W. M. McMasters' estate; and that the moneys which are now shown to be in the hands of J. M. Roe, administrator of the estate of W. M. McMasters, are in part the proceeds of the sale of the groceries and goods which the said W. M. McMasters purchased of intervenor for the purpose of sale to customers of his grocery store. Wherefore, intervenor prays that plaintiff take nothing by his said suit, and that the defendant J. M. Roe go hence without day with his costs, etc., and that intervenor have judgment for its costs, and for all such other and further relief, general and special, in law and in equity, as to the court may seem just and proper in the premises; and as in duty bound intervenor will ever pray." Appellant excepted to the plea of intervention of McDougal, Cameron & Webster on the ground of misjoinder of parties, in that they had no such interest in the subject-matter of the suit as gave them the right to intervene, and on the further ground that the estate of W. M. McMasters was in process of administration in the county court, and that that court had exclusive jurisdiction of any claim that intervenors had against said estate; and, likewise, of any claim that they had, or might have, against the estate of Lena McMasters and Mary Lanza, whose estates were also undergoing administration in the county court. These exceptions were by the court overruled. The court then sustained the general demurrers of defendant Roe and the intervenors to the petition of plaintiff, and upon plaintiff's refusal to amend entered a judgment of dismissal, from which this appeal is taken.

We are of opinion that the court erred in sustaining the general demurrers of defendant Roe and the intervenors, McDougal, Cameron & Webster, and dismissing plaintiff's petition.

[1, 2] The petition of Luke Lanza and the answer of Manuel Depuma stated a good cause of action, in that, if the property was the separate property of Lena McMasters, and in which Mary Lanza had an interest, as stated by the petition of Luke Lanza, and answer of Manuel Depuma, and the demurrers admitted such to be the case, they were entitled to have the matter tested by the court in a trial of the matter, and, if found true, they, as administrators, were entitled to the management and control of the property under the supervision of the probate court.

[3] We are also of the opinion that the court erred in overruling the exceptions to the plea of intervention. While the plea, if true, shows a right of recovery against the estate of W. M. McMasters, and also against the estates of Lena McMasters and Mary Lanza, still it does not show any right in intervenors to intervene in this suit. There is no allegation that there is no other property of W. M. McMasters' estate out of which this debt can be paid, nor that Roe, McMasters' administrator, is colluding with the other administrators and failing to do his duty as such administrator in not making the proper defense to establish his right to said property as such administrator. Intervenors' claim has never been established against the estates of Lena McMasters and Mary Lanza, which are being administered by the probate court, which would be necessary to subject the property to its payment, if it was decreed to be the property of Lena McMasters and Mary Lanza. Under the pleading in this case the district court has no jurisdiction to establish appellant's claim against either estate.

The judgment is reversed, and cause remanded.

BOUND v. SIMKINS.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. San Antonio. Nov. 6, 1912. On Motion for Rehearing, Dec. 4, 1912.)

1. BROKERS (§ 39*)—COMMISSION—LIABILITY OF PRINCIPAL—PURCHASER PROCURED BY SUBAGENT.

Where an owner employed a real estate broker to sell his land at a certain price for an agreed commission, and the broker listed the same with another broker, who procured a purchaser whom he caused to inspect the land and enter into negotiations with the owner, the owner was liable to his agent for the agreed commission upon a sale being made to the purchaser, where he knew at the time of the sale that such subagent had written the purchaser about the land.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Brokers, Cent. Dig. §§ 37, 42, 64; Dec. Dig. § 39;* Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 1234.]

2. BROKERS (§ 56*)—COMMISSION—LIABILITY OF PRINCIPAL.

An owner is liable for the commission on a sale of land to a purchaser procured by his broker, though he does not know that the purchaser was so procured, and makes the sale himself.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Brokers, Cent. Dig. §§ 85-89; Dec. Dig. § 56.*]

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

3. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 17*) — AGENT'S AUTHORITY—EMPLOYMENT OF SUBAGENTS.

The rule that an agent cannot employ a subagent since the trust committed to him is personal, and cannot be delegated, does not prohibit an agent from employing others to perform a service involving no discretion or exercise of judgment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Agent, Cent. Dig. § 35; Dec. Dig. § 17.*]

4. BROKERS (§ 57*)—RIGHT TO COMMISSION—DEED.

The fact that the deed was made jointly to the purchaser procured and to a third party did not deprive the broker of his right to a commission where the original written contract of sale was between the principal and the purchaser procured by the broker.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Brokers, Cent. Dig. §§ 66, 67, 72; Dec. Dig. § 57.*]

Appeal from District Court, Dallas County; J. C. Roberts, Judge.

Action by B. B. Simkins against Ed G. Bound. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed, and rehearing denied.

Read & Lowrance, of Dallas, for appellant. Simkins & Simkins, of Corsicana, and Geo. Sargeant, of Dallas, for appellee.

FLY, J. Appellee sued appellant for $700, alleged to be due him as commissions on the sale of a certain tract of land to Dr. J. A. Green. The defense pleaded was that appellant asked Green, when he was about to enter into a contract of sale with him, if any agent or B. B. Simkins had shown him the land, and Green replied in the negative, and that appellee had never offered to sell the land to him, and that on that representation he had sold the land to Green. It was also alleged that appellee had not secured a purchaser for the land. The cause was tried by jury, and resulted in a verdict and judgment for appellee in the sum of $545.62, with 6 per cent. interest from January 2, 1911.

[1] It appeared from the evidence that appellee had been employed by appellant to sell the land at $27.50 an acre, and agreed to pay appellee 5 per cent. commissions. Appellee advertised the land, and by his efforts interested other people in an endeavor to procure a purchaser, and listed the land with Mr. Taylor of Corsicana, and empowered him to get a purchaser for it. The land was afterwards sold to Dr. J. A. Green by appellant. Taylor testified that he wrote Dr. J. A. Green at Blooming Grove about the land, and stated it could be bought at $30 an acre, and that appellee was the agent for it. The letter caused Green to inspect the land and to enter into negotiations with appellant to buy the land. He knew nothing of the land until he received the letter, and, when he went to see it, he knew that appellee was the agent for the sale of the land. At the time that appellant sold the land, he knew that Taylor had written about the land. The contract for the sale of the land was made between appellant and Green, although the deed was afterward made to Green and Hitt.

[2] Where a broker procures a person to buy the land of his principal, and the latter sells to the purchaser procured by the broker, not knowing that he had been procured by the broker, he is liable for commissions on the sale. McDonald v. Cabiness, 98 S. W. 943; same case affirmed, 100 Tex. 615, 102 S. W. 721. This court, through Chief Justice James, held in that case: "While the owner has such an agent at work, and himself sells to some person that comes along, he does so at the risk of that person having been procured by the agent." So in Graves v. Bains, 78 Tex. 92, 14 S. W. 256, it was held: "If the agent be authorized to make the sale and a purchaser is procured by him, it is of no consequence that the owner did not know the fact and made the sale himself." To the same effect: West v. Thompson, 48 Tex. Civ. App. 362, 106 S. W. 1134; Pierce v. Nichols, 50 Tex. Civ. App. 443, 110 S. W. 206; Ross v. Moskowitz, 95 S. W. 86, affirmed in 100 Tex. 434, 100 S. W. 768.

[3] It is a general rule that, in the absence of any authority expressed or implied, an agent has no right to employ a subagent, the trust committed to him being personal, and he cannot delegate it to another so as to affect the rights of the principal. Eastland v. Maney, 36 Tex. Civ. App. 147, 81 S. W. 574. But there is nothing in that rule that would prohibit an agent from employing others to perform a service involving no discretion or exercise of judgment. If appellee had sent Taylor to Green to tell him about the land, without any authority to sell the land, it would not be contended that the rule as to subagents would apply, and neither would it apply when Taylor merely wrote a letter to Green calling his attention to the land and informing him of appellee's agency. No skill, judgment, or discretion was to be exercised, or was exercised, by Taylor, and in such cases the rule as to subagents does not apply. "The subagent may be employed where the duties are of a lower order and of a mechanical or ministerial type, in which there is no scope for independent judgment or discretion." Tynan v. Dullnig, 25 S. W. 465, 818. There can be no doubt that a land agent can employ persons to find some one to purchase the land and to show it to him. Williams v. Moore, 24 Tex. Civ. App. 402, 58 S. W. 953; Renwick v. Bancroft, 56 Iowa, 527, 9 N. W. 367; McKinnon v. Vollmar, 75 Wis. 82, 43 N. W. 800, 6 L. R. A. 121, 17 Am. St. Rep. 178; Mechem on Agency, § 193; Clark & Skyles, Law of Agency, § 345 (d), p. 377.

The charge complained of in the first assignment is not open to the criticisms made by appellant. It does not assume any fact that was controverted. All of the testimony showed that Green was the purchaser, and that he was found by appellee.

The second, third, and fourth assignments of error are overruled. The evidence complained of was admissible. Appellee was fully authorized to employ Taylor to obtain a purchaser under his contract with appellant. The authorities cited do not sustain the assignments. Taylor did not attempt to sell the real estate, but merely to secure a purchaser to whom appellant or appellee could sell it.

[4] The fifth and sixth assignments of error are without merit. The uncontradicted testimony showed that the land was sold to J. A. Green, and that he may have afterwards associated some one with him in the purchase of the property did not alter the fact that he was induced to approach appellant through the efforts of appellee and that he bought the land. The name of Hitt did not appear in the written contract of sale. The payment of the just commission in this case cannot be evaded on such an attempted defense.

The verdict is sustained by the evidence, and the judgment is affirmed.

On Motion for Rehearing.

Dr. Green, a witness for appellant, testified, in regard to the sale: "I bought this land from Mr. Bound about the 1st of December, 1910." He stated that Hitt was present when he was negotiating for the purchase over the telephone, but that Bound did not know that fact. He made all the arrangements for the purchase. When the contract was drawn up by the attorneys of appellant, the name of Hitt was not mentioned therein, and appellant never heard of Hitt being a party to the contract until it was returned with his name appended. While he states that Green mentioned something about a partner, he did not consider him in the transaction. He swore he knew nothing about the partner, and did not name him in the contract. He sold the land to Green. The name of Hitt was not mentioned in the contract, although he may have signed it, without the knowledge or consent of appellant.

There is no merit in the motion for rehearing, and it is overruled.

EXPRESS PUB. CO. v. ORSBORN.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. San Antonio. Nov. 6, 1912. Rehearing Denied Dec. 4, 1912.)

1. LIBEL AND SLANDER (§ 123*)—QUESTIONS FOR JURY—IDENTITY OF PERSON DEFAMED.

Defendant published in its newspaper that a negro returned to his home at 117 Eda avenue to find his sister chloroformed, gagged, and the house robbed. In a subsequent issue it published that plaintiff was gagged and beaten into unconsciousness at the home of her brother-in-law at 117 N. Eda street. Plaintiff was a white woman. Eda street was sometimes called Eda avenue; and it did not appear that there was any such avenue as Eda avenue, or that any similar attack had been made on a negress in a negro home on such avenue. Held that, considering the two articles together, it was a question for the jury whether the first article referred to plaintiff, although it mentioned no names.

2. LIBEL AND SLANDER (§ 21*)—PERSONS ENTITLED TO SUE.

To justify a recovery for libel, it is not necessary that plaintiff should be named, if pointed out by circumstances, or ascertainable from the words used.

3. LIBEL AND SLANDER (§ 21*)—PERSONS ENTITLED TO SUE.

To justify a recovery for libel, it is not necessary that all the world should understand who the person defamed was, if those knowing plaintiff can discern that she was meant.

Appeal from District Court, Dallas County; Kenneth Foree, Judge.

Action by Ida Mae Orsborn against the Express Publishing Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. S. Coke, of Dallas, and Templeton, Brooks, Napier & Ogden, of San Antonio, for appellant. E. G. Seuter and Carden, Starling, Carden & Hemphill, all of Dallas, for appellee.

FLY, J. This is a suit for damages, alleged to have resulted from the publication of certain articles by appellant, instituted by N. G. Orsborn, as next friend of Ida Mae Orsborn, who, after the suit was begun, married R. T. Donaldson, who by amendment joined his wife in the suit. A trial by jury resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of appellee for $500.

In the issue of the Daily Express, a newspaper published in the city of San Antonio, of date July 7, 1910, appeared the following article:

"Girl is Gagged and Robbed.

"Negress Claims Two Mexicans Entered Her Home and Stole a Ring.

"A hurry call came to police headquarters last night at 11 o'clock from 117 Eda avenue, the home of a negro, who returned home, as he said, to find his sister chloroformed, gagged and the house robbed.

"Patrolmen Henderson and Harrison were sent to the place. They found the girl had been gagged with a towel, but there was no evidence of the use of chloroform, and the only thing missing was a finger ring, which she asserts two Mexicans, her assailants, took from her finger.

"Detectives will be put upon the case this morning."

Following that publication, the succeeding article was published in the Daily Express of July 9, 1910, and also in the semiweekly of the same paper:

"Robbers Very Bold.

Enter House, Gag Woman and Beat Her to Insensibility.

"They Strike a Child to Silence Its Ories But It Cries Louder and Awakens Other Members of the Household. Men Escape.

"Gagged with a pillow and beaten into unconsciousness with the butt end of a revolver by two men, said to be Mexicans, who later ransacked her room, was the experience of Miss Ida Mae Orsborn at the home of her brother-in-law, J. L. Clapp, 117 North Eda street, early Thursday morning. The police are at work on the case but have made no arrests. Mr. Clapp gives the following account of the assault:

"My sister-in-law was awakened about midnight just as two men entered her room by the front window. Before she could give the alarm the men caught and gagged her. Then one of the men dragged her by her hair from the bed and attempted to throw her out of the window, but she resisted so vigorously that the man struck her over the head with a pistol, rendering her unconscious, and left her lying right in the open window.

"My little child about one year old, who was sleeping with my sister, was awakened by the confusion and began to cry. One of the men hit the little child to quiet it and made it cry louder, which awakened my wife and me. We were sleeping in a hallway not far away. The men evidently heard us moving and jumped out of the window. I saw them leap over the front fence as I entered the room. Miss Orsborn was lying unconscious with her body across the window sill. I at once summoned Dr. Edward Calvin and notified the police."

"Examination showed that the robbers had taken nothing but a finger ring, which was taken off Miss Orsborn's finger. The police have a good description of the men, given them by Miss Orsborn, who is positive she can identify her assailants.

"Miss Orsborn was so overcome by the shock and the blow on her head that she was unable to give a coherent account of the assault until the next day. The physicians say that she is now out of danger. The baby has several bruises where it was struck."

The evidence showed that appellee was attacked in the manner mentioned in the publications, on the night of July 6, 1910, while sleeping in the home of her sister and brother-in-law at 117 North Eda street, in San Antonio, Tex. Appellee and her family are whites, and she was greatly mortified and humiliated by the publication that she was a negress. There was evidence tending to show that Eda street was also called Eda avenue.

[1] The only contention by appellant is that the court should have instructed a verdict for appellant, because it was not shown that the libelous article applied to appellee, and could not so have been construed by the readers of the paper. The two articles were properly considered together; and it then became a question of fact, to be determined by the jury, as to whether the person spoken of in the first publication was the one more minutely and accurately described in the second. That issue was clearly presented to the jury, and was answered in favor of appellee. There was evidence to sustain that finding. It was testified that Eda street was known as Eda avenue; that appellee was attacked and gagged at 117 North Eda street under similar circumstances mentioned in the first publication. There was no evidence of a similar attack having been made on a negress in a negro home on Eda avenue, nor that there was such an avenue in San Antonio. The two articles, when read together, lead inevitably and surely to the conclusion that both refer to the same person. Houston Printing Co. v. Moulden, 15 Tex. Civ. App. 574, 41 S. W. 381.

[2, 3] As is well said in the case cited: "It was not necessary to make the article published libelous that plaintiff should have been named, if he was pointed out by circumstances. * * * It is only necessary that the words refer to some person ascertainable from the words used." It was not necessary that all the world should understand who the person defamed was. It is sufficient if those who know the plaintiff can discern that she was the person meant. Newell on Slander and Libel, p. 767.

[4, 5] The case of Boone v. Herald News Co., 27 Tex. Civ. App. 548, 66 S. W. 313, decided by this court and cited by appellant, holds that the burden was on the plaintiff in a libel suit to prove that the libel was directed at him, and that it was a question of fact to be determined by a jury. So we hold in this case; and, as in that, we hold that there is evidence to sustain the verdict of the jury, and it will not be disturbed.

The judgment is affirmed.

ARMSTRONG PACKING CO. v. CLEM.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Dallas.
Nov. 9, 1912. Rehearing Denied
Nov. 30, 1912.)

1. NEGLIGENCE (§ 27*)—DANGEROUS SUBSTANCES—LIABILITY OF MANUFACTURER.

The liability of a manufacturer of soap for injuries to a consumer from poisonous substances therein does not rest upon contract or privity, but arises from its duty to avoid acts dangerous to the lives and persons of others, and hence a person injured may recover, although there is no contract or privity between him and the manufacturer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. § 25; Dec. Dig. § 27.*]

2. NEGLIGENCE (§ 27*)—ACTIONS—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Where a manufacturer of soap knowing that poisonous and injurious substances were necessary in its preparation, and that, if not neutralized in manufacturing, injury was liable to result from its use, placed it upon the market and injury resulted from its use, these facts sufficiently showed failure to use care in its manufacture to render it liable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. § 25; Dec. Dig. § 27.*]

3. NEGLIGENCE (§ 66*)—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—ANTICIPATED DANGERS.

A purchaser of soap is not required to test it for poisonous substances, but, where he is ignorant of defects therein, may assume that it is fit for use.

4. TRIAL (§ 41*)—SEPARATION AND EXCLUSION OF WITNESSES.

It is within the trial court's discretion to permit particular witnesses to remain in the courtroom where the rule is invoked.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 101-105; Dec. Dig. § 41.*]

5. TRIAL (§ 41*)—SEPARATION AND EXCLUSION OF WITNESSES.

In a husband's action for injuries to his wife in which the rule was invoked, the court did not abuse its discretion in permitting both the husband and wife to remain in the courtroom; the husband being a party, and his wife having a substantial interest in the action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 101-105; Dec. Dig. § 41.*]

6. TRIAL (§ 263*)—INSTRUCTIONS—FORM.

It was not error for the court, after stating the case, and giving some principles of law applicable thereto, to give such special charges prepared by the parties as were applicable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 662, 663; Dec. Dig. § 263.*]

7. EVIDENCE (§ 199*)—DEMONSTRATIVE EVIDENCE—EXPERIMENTS AND TESTS.

In an action against a manufacturer of soap for injuries, where there was testimony that a poisonous substance was discovered therein causing it to effervesce when vinegar was poured thereon, it was not error to permit plaintiff to test the soap by pouring vinegar over it in the presence of the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 683; Dec. Dig. § 199.*]

8. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1033*)—HARMLESS ERROR—ERROR FAVORABLE TO APPELLANT.

If it was error to permit such experiment it was not prejudicial to defendant where no effervescence was produced by such test.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4052-4062; Dec. Dig. § 1033.*]

9. NEW TRIAL (§ 52*)—CONDUCT AND DELIBERATIONS OF JURY—MANNER OF ARRIVING AT VERDICT.

A new trial because the jurors set down the amount of damages each thought proper and divided the aggregate by twelve, was properly denied where it appeared that there was no prior agreement that the quotient should constitute their verdict and it did not appear that such quotient was the amount finally returned.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 101-105; Dec. Dig. § 52.*]

10. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 757*)—BRIEFS—CONTENTS.

Assignments of error complaining of the refusal of special charges will not be considered, where the charges are not copied in appellant's brief, nor reference made to the page of the record where they can be found.

Appeal from District Court, Dallas County; E. B. Muse, Judge.

Action by A. Clem against the Armstrong Packing Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Flippen, McCormick, Gresham & Freeman, of Dallas, for appellant. Gibson & Calloway, of Dallas, for appellee.

RAINEY, C. J. This is an action to recover damages for personal injuries to appellee's wife, Emma Clem, brought by appellee against appellant, Armstrong Packing Company, alleging, in effect, that appellant was a manufacturing company, manufacturing, among other things, a certain brand of soap labeled "B. & B.," or "Biggest and Best," which was placed on the market and sold, through retailers to ultimate consumers, the public generally; that some of this soap was purchased by appellee from a retailer for use, carried home, and used in the laundry of their family clothes, from the use of which said soap appellee's wife became poisoned and injured; that her hands, arms, and other parts of her body that came in contact with the soap, or came in contact with her hands and arms after the use of the soap, became poisoned and inflamed, causing her great pain and suffering, rendering her unable to perform her household duties, and she has become an invalid and will so remain the rest of her life; that appellant was negligent in the manufacture of said soap and placing it upon the market. Appellant answered by general and special exceptions and general denial, and specially that the soap was manufactured by it exclusively for sale to jobbers, never sold to retail dealers, nor did it warrant same to them. "The soap was not represented to be for bathing purposes, but only for laundry and ordinary cleaning purposes; that the ingredients of same are purely vegetable products, and that the soap does not contain any oils or animal greases, and that the same is free from all excessive poisonous, injurious, or deleterious ingredients and substances; that the defendant has used and uses the greatest care and caution in seeing that the soap was made only from harmless substances, and that there was excluded from it any injurious, poisonous, or deleterious substances whatever in the finished product; that it would have been impossible for such injuries as are claimed by plaintiff to have been sustained by his wife from using the brand of soap known as Armstrong's B. & B. soap, but that such injuries, if they occurred at all, were not caused by said soap, but were caused by some other agency to the defendant unknown. The defendant on the trial filed a supplemental answer alleging contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff and his wife; that Mrs. Clem was performing her labor while in a delicate condition, which caused or aggravated her injuries; that she was guilty of negligence in not immediately ceasing when she began to discover that something was injuring her hands; that the plaintiff and his wife were guilty of negligence in not at once seeking the advice of a physician; that the plaintiff and his wife were both guilty of contributory negligence in using unsterilized scissors to open the blisters on the different parts of her body, and that the plaintiff and Mrs. Clem were guilty of contributory negligence in permitting the watery substances from the blisters to come in contact with other portions of her body." A trial resulted in a verdict and judgment for appellee for $1,500, from which the packing company appeals.

The assignments that the court erred in overruling the general exception to plaintiff's petition, and the assignment that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict and judgment, raise practically the same issues, and therefore they will be considered in the same connection. The evidence, in substance, substantially supports the allegations of plaintiff's petition, in that it shows that the appellant was manufacturing washing soap for the market, selling same to jobbers, the jobbers selling to retailers, and they, in turn, selling to consumers. A retailer sold some of this soap to the appellee, whose wife used it in washing the clothes of the family, and she was injured by the use of the same in the manner alleged by plaintiff. The formula used by appellant for making the soap necessarily contained poisonous ingredients, which become harmless in the proper preparation of the soap. In the batch of soap sold to plaintiff the poison used was not neutralized, but it contained a sufficient quantity to injure plaintiff's wife in the use thereof, for which it was intended. The evidence is sufficient to show that appellant was negligent in preparing the particular batch of soap sold to plaintiff. This case, as shown by the record, was tried on the theory and supported by the facts that appellant negligently manufactured and placed upon the market the soap in question, which contained injurious and poisonous substances, from the use of which the injuries sustained by plaintiff's wife proximately resulted.

Appellant contends "that, under well-settled authorities, there was no question of warranty as between Armstrong Packing Company and the plaintiff in this case, but only that Armstrong Packing Company rested under the duty imposed upon a manufacturer not to put upon the market a commodity that was unsuitable for use by the public, and which the public could not use without injury. Even in regard to this duty, the manufacturer is not an insurer, and is held to ordinary care."

[1] The liability of appellant in this action does not rest upon any contract or privity between appellant and appellee, but from the duty which the law imposes upon the manufacturer to avoid acts in their nature dangerous to the lives and persons of others. Though no contract or privity existed between appellant and appellee, yet, as appellant was manufacturing and placing the soap upon the market, it is liable primarily to any one buying and using it for the want of care in the preparation of the soap.

[2] That appellant failed to use care in its preparation is sufficiently shown by the evidence. It knew that poisonous and injurious substances were necessary in its preparation. It knew if too much of the poisonous ingredients were used, and not neutralized in manufacturing it, that injury was liable to result from the use thereof. It knew by the proper saponification the poison would become harmless. The soap was placed upon the market and injury resulted from the use thereof, which shows to our minds that appellant failed to use care in the manufacture of this particular soap, or the injury would not have happened, which fixes the liability of appellant. Thomas v. Winchester, 6 N. Y. 397, 57 Am. Dec. 456; Tomlinson v. Armour Co., 75 N. J. Law, 748, 70 Atl. 314, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 923. In the case of Thomas v. Winchester, supra, it is held that a dealer in drugs and medicines who carelessly labels a deadly drug as a harmless medicine, and places it upon the market, is liable to all persons who, without fault on their part, are injured by using it by reason of such label. Such liability does not arise by reason of contract or privity between the dealer and the person injured, but out of the duty imposed by law upon the former to avoid acts which by their nature are dangerous to the lives of others. In Tomlinson v. Armour, supra, a suit for injury to a consumer caused by eating canned meat, the following language is used, viz.: "The fact that the defendant was the manufacturer, presumably having knowledge, or opportunity for knowledge, of the contents of the cans and of the process of manufacture; that it put the goods upon the market for sale by dealers to consumers, under circumstances such that neither dealer nor consumer had opportunity for knowledge of the contents; the fact that the goods were thus manufactured and marketed under circumstances that imported a representation to intending purchasers that they were fit for food and beneficial to the human body; that in the ordinary course of business there was a probability (it being, indeed, the very purpose of the defendant) that the goods should be purchased, and used by parties purchasing, in reliance upon the representation; and that the defendant negligently prepared the food so that it was unwholesome and unfit to be eaten, and poisonous to the human body, whereby the plaintiff was injured—make a case that renders the defendant liable for the damages sustained by the plaintiff thereby." The cases cited we think are sustained by the weight of authority and are especially applicable to the case under consideration.

[3] There was no occasion for plaintiff to test the soap for poisonous substances, nor did he do so, and he had a right to rely upon it being fit for use. He nor his wife did not know of its defect, but were ignorant thereof, and its use was without fault on their part.

[4, 5] The court did not err in permitting the plaintiff and his wife to remain in the courtroom during the trial; the rule to sequester the witnesses having been invoked. It is settled law in this state that such a matter is in the discretion of the court, and there was no abuse of such discretion in this instance. Plaintiff was a party, and his wife had a substantial interest therein. Colbert v. Garrett, 57 S. W. 853; Gro. Co. v. Martin, 57 S. W. 706.

[6] The court in its charge stated the case and gave some principles of law applicable to the case, and then proceeded to give to the jury such special charges prepared by the respective parties which he considered applicable. Appellant complains that the court erred in refusing its request to charge the jury generally and fully as required by law. This manner of charging the jury is not contrary to law, and the assignment is without merit.

[7, 8] The court did not err in allowing the plaintiff to make a test before the jury by pouring vinegar over the soap, especially as no harm resulted to appellant therefrom. There was testimony that a poisonous substance was discovered in the soap used by appellee's wife by pouring vinegar thereon, which caused it to effervesce. In the test made before the jury no effervescence was produced by the vinegar being poured on the soap. There was no error in the court's overruling the eleventh ground of appellant's motion for new trial.

[9] The complaint is that the jury reached their verdict by lot; that they agreed beforehand to set down the amount each thought proper, to divide the aggregate by 12, and the quotient would constitute their verdict. We do not think this contention is sustained by the record. The court heard all the jurors on this matter, and he was justified from the evidence to find that each juror stated an amount; that the aggregate was divided, but that there was no agreement beforehand that the quotient so ascertained should constitute their verdict, or that the quotient so found was the amount finally returned.

[10] The eleventh and twelfth assignments of error complain of the giving of plaintiff's special charges Nos. 3 and 4. Said special charges are not copied in the brief of appellant, nor is there any reference to the page of the record where same can be found. Under such circumstances, we do not feel called upon to consider said assignments.

All other assignments have been considered, and, finding no error in the record, the judgment is affirmed.

SCOTT v. MISSOURI, O. & G. RY. CO.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Dallas.
Oct. 26, 1912. Rehearing Denied
Nov. 30, 1912.)

1. RAILROADS (§ 121*)—COMPETING OR PARALLEL LINES.

The Missouri, Oklahoma & Gulf Railway Company, which runs substantially north from Denison, Tex., to Waggoner, Okl., was not a competing or parallel line, within Rev. St. 1895, art. 4529, prohibiting the leasing of one of such lines by the other, to the Denison, Bonham & New Orleans Railway Company.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 381-385; Dec. Dig. § 121.*]

2. RAILROADS (§ 82*)—FORFEITURE OF CHARTER—EMINENT DOMAIN.

The forfeiture of its charter by a railroad for failure to construct its road within the time required by law did not cause the right of way to revert to the original owner, but such easement remained subject to the provisions of Rev. St. 1895, art. 4473, which provides, in case of forfeiture of a railroad charter, its right of way shall remain subject to an extension of the charter, or the grant of a new charter over the same way without a new consideration, and it makes no difference whether the right of way is acquired directly from the owner of the fee or by condemnation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 213-219; Dec. Dig. § 82.*]

3. RAILROADS (§ 82*)—RIGHT OF WAY—USE BY ABUTTING OWNER—EFFECT.

In the absence of proof of the adverse use of a right of way by the abutting owner, the easement for the road will not be destroyed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 213-219; Dec. Dig. § 82.*]

4. RAILROADS (§ 82*)—RIGHT OF WAY—ABANDONMENT.

A railroad which obtained a right of way, graded it, paid taxes on it, and never ceased trying to use it for railroad purposes, and finally succeeded in putting it to such use, cannot be held to have abandoned it, although when the way was first graded the company put gates in each fence, and the abutting owners remained in possession.

Appeal from District Court, Grayson County; B. L. Jones, Judge.

Action by the Missouri, Oklahoma & Gulf Railway Company against J. H. Scott. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

N. H. L. Decker and R. M. Finley, both of Denison, for appellant. John T. Suggs, of Denison, for appellee.

RAINEY, C. J. Appellee, claiming the right of way over certain land, sued out a writ of injunction against appellant, who threatened, by force and violence, to prevent appellee from entering upon and constructing its railway on and across said land.

Appellant claimed to have purchased the land without notice of appellee's claim, and pleaded the statutes of limitation and abandonment of said right of way by appellee's grantors.

Upon a hearing judgment was rendered perpetuating said injunction, except as to one tract of three acres, over which appellee was awarded the right of way upon the payment of $100. From this judgment, appellant appeals.

Conclusions of Fact.

In January, 1887, the Denison, Bonham & New Orleans Railway Company was chartered by the state of Texas to construct a railroad from the city of Denison, in Grayson county, Tex., in and through the counties of Grayson, Fannin, Hunt, and Delta, by way of Bonham, in Fannin county. Said railway company, in 1888, graded its roadbed from Denison to Bonham; and it procured the right of easement over the land in controversy, except the three acres from one Turley, who then owned the land. After grading the road, in 1888 the Denison, Bonham & New Orleans Railway Company became insolvent, and did nothing further toward constructing its road until 1901, when its properties, rights, and franchises were sold under execution and bid in by the Denison, Bonham & New Orleans Railroad Company, which had been incorporated for that purpose; and the president, directors and stockholders of said railway company, by deed in writing, conveyed unto the Denison, Bonham & New Orleans Railroad Company all the right, title, and interest of the railway company to said property. This was done March 13, 1901. The Denison, Bonham & New Orleans Railroad Company then constructed its track over the right of way of the old railway company from Bonham to within five miles of Denison, at which point it deflected and connected with the track of the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company, over which it operated its road into the city of Denison. The right of way in question is located on that part of the line between Denison and where the Denison, Bonham & New Orleans Railroad Company's track defects from the old line to connect with the Katy Road.

The Denison, Bonham & New Orleans Railroad Company transferred its right to the five-mile strip of right of way to the Missouri, Oklahoma & Gulf Railway Company for a valuable consideration, with an agreement that the Denison, Bonham & New Orleans Railroad Company could use appellee's track into Denison. The appellee's road runs practically north from Denison, Tex., to Waggoner, Okl.

When the Denison, Bonham & New Orleans Railway Company first constructed its grade, gates were placed in each fence where the grade passed through, and the owners of the land remained in possession, using and cultivating the land on either side. When appellant, Scott, bought from Turley, he saw the grade that had been constructed; but he made no inquiry about the easement, although he could have learned thereof by so doing. Turley remained in possession until he sold to Scott, without in any way repudiating the right of the railway company to its easement; and when Scott bought he took possession, held it in the same way, and never did anything indicating that his right was adverse to the claim of easement. There was no intention of abandonment of said easement by the railway company; it being the intention to utilize said right of way as soon as practicable.

Conclusions of Law.

[1] 1. Article 4529, R. S., prohibits the consolidation of competing or parallel railway lines, and prohibits the purchase or leasing of one of such lines by the other. The facts show that the Missouri, Oklahoma & Gulf Railway Company's line was not a competing or parallel line, as contemplated by law, to the Denison, Bonham & New Orleans Railway Company; and therefore it does not come within the prohibition, as stated by statute.

[2] 2. The forfeiture of its charter by the Denison, Bonham & New Orleans Railway Company to construct its road within the time required by law did not cause its right of way to revert to the original owner of the fee; but such easement remained subject to the provisions of article 4473, Revised Statutes, which provides, in case of forfeiture of a railroad charter, its right of way "shall remain subject to an extension of the charter or the grant of a new charter over the same way without a new consideration." In this connection we remark that we see no difference whether the right of way is acquired directly from the owner of the fee, or by condemnation proceedings.

[3] 3. The appellant's plea of limitation is not sustained by the proof. The possession of appellant and of his grantor was not inconsistent with appellee's right of easement; there being no acts of either showing that they held adversely to the railway company's right of easement.

[4] 4. The facts fail to show an abandonment of said right of way. The evidence shows no intention of abandonment on the part of the railway companies. They graded it, paid taxes on it, and never ceased trying to use it for railroad purposes, and finally succeeded in putting it to the use for which it was originally acquired.

5. We find no material error in the record, and, considering all the circumstances, we think the justness of the case has been reached, and the judgment is affirmed.

FREEMAN v. KENNERLY.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Austin. Oct. 16, 1912. Rehearing Denied Nov. 27, 1912.)

1. NEGLIGENCE (§ 136*) — EVIDENCE — QUESTION FOR COURT OR JURY.

The question of negligence is one of law only, when from the undisputed facts no inference except that of negligence can reasonably be drawn, or when unprejudiced minds cannot reasonably disagree as to the facts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 277-353; Dec. Dig. § 136.*]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 289*)—INJURY TO SERVANT — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE — QUESTION FOR JURY.

Whether a brakeman stumbled over a clinker while walking by a moving car, or whether he recklessly placed his foot on the coupler of a car, or of an engine and was thereby injured, held, under the evidence, for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 1089-1132; Dec. Dig. § 289.*]

3. TRIAL (§ 260*) — INSTRUCTIONS — REFUSAL TO GIVE INSTRUCTIONS COVERED BY CHARGE GIVEN.

Where, in an action for injuries to a brakeman, the issue was whether he stumbled over a clinker while walking by a moving car in railroad yards, or whether he recklessly placed his foot on the coupler of a car or of the engine, and the court charged that if in undertaking to make the coupling he voluntarily placed his foot on the coupling apparatus, and thereby received the injury complained of, or if he received his injury in any manner except as alleged in the petition, the verdict must be against him, the refusal to charge that if he placed his foot on the car, or engine and was injured in so doing, the verdict must be against him, without considering any other issue, was not erroneous.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 651-659; Dec. Dig. § 260.*]

4. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 204*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—ASSUMPTION OF RISK.

Under Acts 29th Leg. c. 163, providing that, in an action against a railroad for injury of an employé, the plea of assumed risk, where the ground of the plea is knowledge of the danger causing the injury, shall not be available where the employer or superior of the employé knew of the defect, or where a person of ordinary care would have continued in the service with knowledge of the defect, etc., a brakeman who knew that clinkers and rocks were scattered over a railroad yard and along the tracks, and that such condition rendered it dangerous to make couplings in the ordinary manner, did not assume the risk of injury by stumbling over a clinker while walking by a moving car, where the yardmaster, whose duty it was to keep the track clean, knew that rocks and clinkers were scattered over the yard and along the track, and that such condition rendered it dangerous for employes, and where it could reasonably be inferred that a person of ordinary care would have continued in the service, notwithstanding knowledge of the danger.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 544-546; Dec. Dig. § 204.*]

5. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 240*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Where a brakeman injured by stumbling over a clinker while walking by a moving car to couple it with an engine attempted to perform his duty in the usual manner, and the car was moving slowly, a recovery could not be defeated on the ground that he chose a dangerous way, though he might have walked in the center space between the tracks, or over on another track.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 751-756; Dec. Dig. § 240.*]

6. TRIAL (§ 295*)—INSTRUCTIONS—PROXIMATE CAUSE.

Where, in an action for injuries to a brakeman stumbling over a clinker while walking by a moving car in a railroad yard to couple the car to an engine, the court defined proximate cause as one which in a natural and continuous sequence produces an event, and that, to warrant a finding that negligence is the proximate cause of an injury, it must appear that the injury was the natural and probable sequence of the negligence, etc., an instruction that if the brakeman while walking struck a clinker, and thereby stumbled and fell, and sustained the injury complained of, he could recover, was not erroneous for failing to state that the negligence of the railroad company must have been the proximate cause of the injury, as all parts of instructions must be considered together in determining their meaning.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 703-717; Dec. Dig. § 295.*]

7. TRIAL (§ 191*)—INSTRUCTIONS—ASSUMPTION OF FACT.

An instruction requested by a party which assumes a fact denied by the adverse party is properly refused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 420-431, 435; Dec. Dig. § 191.*]

8. TRIAL (§ 253*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—INSTRUCTIONS—IGNORING ISSUES.

An instruction in an action for injuries to a railroad employé which ignores Acts 31st Leg. (1st Ex. Sess.) c. 10, providing that the fact that an employé may have been guilty of contributory negligence shall not bar a recovery, but the damages shall be diminished by the jury in proportion to the amount of negligence attributable to the employé, is properly refused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 613-623; Dec. Dig. § 253.*]

9. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 228*)—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Acts 31st Leg. (1st Ex. Sess.) c. 10, providing that the fact that the employé suing for a personal injury was guilty of contributory negligence shall not bar a recovery, but the damages shall be diminished in proportion to the amount of negligence attributable to him, makes employers responsible for injuries to their employes incurred by reason of the negligence of the employers, and sufficiently punishes an employé for his negligence by diminishing the amount of damages which he would Appeal from District Court, Williamson County; Chas. A. Wilcox, Judge.

Action by Charles R. Kennerly against T. J. Freeman, receiver. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Fisher & Fisher, of Austin, and Wilson & Dabney, of Houston, for appellant. T. J. Lawhon, of Taylor, and A. G. Greenwood and Thos. B. Greenwood, both of Palestine, for appellee.

The Issues of Fact.

JENKINS, J. 1. Plaintiff alleged, in substance, that on September 9, 1909, he was a switchman in the employ of defendant in the yards at Taylor, Tex.; that defendant and his agents and representatives, whose duty it was to exercise ordinary care to keep said yards reasonably safe for the performance of plaintiff's duties, negligently failed to discharge such duty, but permitted said yard and roadbed to be and continue in a dangerous condition by reason of the accumulation of clinkers and rocks thereon, and that plaintiff on said date, in the performance of his duties, was walking by a moving car, for the purpose of coupling same onto a dead engine, when he stumbled over a rock or clinker, and was thereby caused to fall, and his right leg was caught under a moving wheel and crushed, necessitating the amputation of the same. Defendant alleged that said injury was caused, not by plaintiff's stumbling and falling, but by his recklessly placing his foot on the coupler of the car or of the engine; in other words, that he went between the moving car and the dead engine, and attempted to kick the knuckles of the coupler either on the car or on the engine into place, so that the coupling would be made by the impact. The couplers were automatic, but sometimes the knuckles got out of place, and in such event they had to be put in place before the coupling could be made. This might be done by a bar from the outside, or by the brakeman signaling the train to stop, and going in and arranging the knuckles with his hands, either of which ways would have been safe, and would have been an ordinary way to make such coupling, or the switchman might have kicked the knuckle into place, which would not have been the ordinary way, nor one of the methods provided by the defendant, but would have been a dangerous way, not justified by ordinary prudence. Upon this issue the court instructed the jury as follows: "(9) If you find that in undertaking to make a coupling between the moving car and the dead engine the plaintiff voluntarily placed his foot on the coupler or coupling apparatus of the car or engine, and that he thereby received the injury complained of, or if you believe that he received his injury in any manner except in the manner substantially as alleged by him in his petition, then you will find for the defendant." The jury returned a verdict in favor of plaintiff, and assessed his damage at $8,000. It is not assigned that the verdict is excessive.

[1, 2] 2. Appellant's first assignment of error is upon the refusal of the court to instruct a verdict for the appellant. This is based upon the assumptions, first, that appellee was injured by reason of his attempting to kick the knuckle of the coupler into place; and, second, that he was guilty of contributory negligence. The question of negligence becomes one of law when from the undisputed facts no inference, except that of negligence, can reasonably be drawn, or when unprejudiced minds could not reasonably disagree as to such facts. Such is not the case here as to the manner in which appellee was injured. He testified that the train was backing in on track No. 2 for the purpose of coupling onto a dead engine; that he was the rear switchman, and was walking by the side of the moving car near the end of the same, and just before said car reached the engine that he fell over a rock or clinker, and his right leg was caught under the moving wheel and crushed; that he was on the outside of the track when he fell; that he did not go in between the cars at all, and that he did not kick or attempt to kick the knuckle, or put his foot upon the same. The appellant's testimony tended strongly to refute this evidence, but it was the peculiar province of the jury to decide upon the contradictory evidence. This issue was clearly submitted to them, as we have seen from the excerpt of the charge given by the court and above set out. Threadgill v. Wells, 143 S. W. 343; Railway Co. v. Krenek, 138 S. W. 1155; Avant v. Watson, 57 Tex. Civ. App. 304, 122 S. W. 587; Brokerage Company v. Barkley, 128 S. W. 432; Railway Co. v. Holland, 27 Tex. Civ. App. 397, 66 S. W. 69; Williams v. Hennefeld, 57 Tex. Civ. App. 54, 120 S. W. 568; Railway Co. v. Sinclair, 41 Tex. Civ. App. 519, 93 S. W. 703; Railway Co. v. Hall, 17 Tex. Civ. App. 45, 43 S. W. 26.

[3] 3. Appellant requested the following charge, which was refused: "If from the evidence you believe that the plaintiff, Charles R. Kennerly, placed his right foot on either the dead engine or moving box car, and was injured in so doing, you will return a verdict for the defendant, without considering any other issue which may be submitted to you." The court did not err in refusing to give this charge, though it correctly embodies the law of the case, for the reason that the same was substantially given as above set out.

[4] 4. Appellant cites authority in support of his contention that if the employé knew of the danger or the same was so obvious that he might have learned it in the ordinary discharge of his duty, he assumes the risk, and the employer is not liable. The evidence in this case shows that the appellee knew that clinkers and rocks were scattered over the yard and along the track, and that he knew that such condition rendered it dangerous to switchmen in attempting to make couplings in the ordinary manner in which they were made. These authorities will not avail appellant, by reason of Acts 1905, c. 163, p. 386, which is as follows: "Section 1. That in any suit against a person, corporation or receiver operating a railroad or street railway for damages for the death or personal injury of an employé or servant, caused by the wrong or negligence of such person, corporation or receiver, the plea of assumed risk of the deceased or injured person, where the ground of the plea is knowledge or means of knowledge of the defect and danger which caused the injury or death, shall not be available in the following cases: First. Where such employé had an opportunity before being injured or killed to inform the employer or a superior entrusted by the employer with the authority to remedy or cause to be remedied the defect, and does notify or cause to be notified the employer or superior thereof within a reasonable time, provided it shall not be necessary to give such information where the employer or such superior thereof already knows of the defect. Second. Where a person of ordinary care would have continued in the service with the knowledge of the defect and danger and in such case it shall not be necessary that the servant or employé give notice of the defect as provided in subdivision 1 hereof."

The evidence in this case shows that the yardmaster, whose duty it was to keep the track clean, knew that rocks and clinkers were scattered over said yard and along the track, and that such condition of the yard rendered it dangerous for those employed as was the appellee at the time of his injury. It may reasonably be inferred from the evidence in this case that a person of ordinary care would have continued in the service of appellant, notwithstanding his knowledge of such danger; it appearing from the testimony that a great number of switchmen and yardmen had continued in the service of appellant in the yard at Taylor, notwithstanding said condition. Railway Co. v. Gasscamp, 69 Tex. 546-548, 7 S. W. 227; Railway Co. v. Engelhorn, 24 Tex. Civ. App. 324, 62 S. W. 561, 562; Railway Co. v. Waller, 27 Tex. Civ. App. 44, 65 S. W. 212; Williams v. Hennefeld, supra. The tenth paragraph of the court's charge is as follows: "If you believe from the evidence that plaintiff's injury was the result of a risk ordinarily incident to the services in which he was engaged, then you will find for the defendant on the issue of assumed risk. Or, if you believe from the evidence that the injury to plaintiff resulted from the negligence, if any there was, of the defendant in the manner as alleged by plaintiff in his petition, but if you further believe that such negligence, if any, and the risk arising therefrom, if any, was known to plaintiff or would have been known to him by the exercise of ordinary care in the discharge of his duties, and that a person of ordinary care would not have continued in the defendant's service with knowledge of such risk, if any, and that no superior, with authority from defendant to cause the defects in said roadbed and yard, if any, to be remedied, had actual knowledge of same, if any, for a reasonable time prior to plaintiff's injuries, then you will find for the defendant on the issue of assumed risk. But if you find that plaintiff's injury was the proximate result of the negligence, if any, of defendant in the manner as alleged by him, and that a person of ordinary care would have continued in the service of the defendant with knowledge of the negligence, if any, and the danger, if any, arising therefrom, or if you find that a superior had been entrusted by defendant with authority to cause the defects in defendant's roadbed and yards, if any, to be remedied, and that such superior, if any there was, had actual knowledge of the defects in said roadbed and yards, if any, for a reasonable time prior to the plaintiff's injury, then the defense of assumed risk would not be available to the defendant."

[5] 5. There is nothing in the contention that appellee cannot recover for the reason that he chose a dangerous way in which to perform his duty, when he might have performed it in a safer way, and thereby assumed the risk. He was attempting to perform his duty in the usual and customary manner; that is to say, he was walking beside the car and near the end of the same where he could see if the cars made the coupling. The cars were moving slowly, at the rate of three or four miles an hour. It is true that he might have walked in the center space between the tracks, or over on another track, and had he done so he would not, in case he fell, have fallen under the cars, but in neither of these positions would he have been discharging his duty in the usual and ordinary manner; and under such conditions, the alternative of choosing a safer way in which to perform his duties was not presented. Railway Co. v. Keefe, 37 Tex. Civ. App. 588, 84 S. W. 681.

6. Appellant complains of the fifth paragraph of the charge of the court, which is as follows: "An employé of the receiver of a railroad company is held in law to assume such risks as are ordinarily incident to the service he is employed to perform. But a risk which arises from the negligence of the receiver is not such a risk as is ordinarly incident to the service, and is not such a risk as is assumed by the employé, unless the negligence and the risk arising therefrom be known to him, or would be known to him by the exercise of ordinary care in the discharge of the duties of his service. And, where the risk is known to the employé or would be known to him by the exercise of ordinary care, the risk is not assumed by him, and is not available as a defense, where a person of ordinary care would have continued in the service with knowledge of the defect and danger, nor where a superior intrusted by the receiver with authority to cause the defect to be remedied has actual knowledge thereof for a reasonable time prior to an injury caused thereby." This charge presents the law, as we understand it, under the act of 1905 above referred to. The authorities cited by appellant to sustain his contention that this charge is erroneous are cases decided prior to the passage of said act of 1905.

[6] 7. Appellant complains of the eighth paragraph of the charge of the court, for that it does not instruct the jury that appellant's negligence must have been the "proximate cause" of appellee's injury. The part of the charge complained of is as follows: "And that he (appellee) was walking upon the portion of defendant's roadbed and yards provided for that purpose, and that while so engaged his feet, or one of them, struck one of said clinkers or rocks, if any, and that plaintiff was thereby caused to stumble and fall to the ground, and that his right leg was caught and crushed beneath the moving wheels of the car next to the dead engine, and that he thereby sustained the injuries alleged in his petition, then in such case you will find for the plaintiff," etc. We think it immaterial that the words "proximate cause" are omitted from said charge. The words, "that he was thereby caused to stumble and fall" and "that he thereby sustained the injuries alleged in his petition," must have conveyed the same idea to the minds of the jury as would the words "proximate cause." "It is not always essential to a correct charge that the word 'proximate' should be used. It is enough if the instructions convey the idea with sufficient clearness to impress upon the minds of the jurors the fact that the negligence complained of was the responsible cause of the injury." Railway Co. v. Reames, 132 S. W. 978. In this case the evidence does not suggest any cause other than the condition of the track, except that the appellee went in front of the moving car and attempted to kick the knuckle; and this issue, as we have seen, was submitted to the jury by another paragraph of the charge. All parts of the charge must be considered together in determining its meaning. The court in the sixth paragraph of its charge defined "proximate cause" as follows: "The 'proximate cause' of an injury, as the term is used in this charge, is a cause which in a natural and continuous sequence, unbroken by any new cause, produces an event and without which the event would not have occurred; but, in order to warrant a finding that negligence is the proximate cause of an injury, it must appear from the evidence that the injury was the natural and probable sequence of the negligence and ought to have been foreseen as likely to occur, by a person of ordinary prudence, in the light of the attending circumstances." And in the seventh paragraph of said charge the court instructed the jury that the receiver would be liable if injury proximately resulted from his negligence, if any. If appellee was injured as he testified, by reason of stumbling on a clinker or rock while in the performance of his duties, and appellant had permitted said rocks or clinkers to accumulate and remain on said road and in doing so was guilty of negligence (which issues were submitted by the court to the jury), there can be no question as to what was the proximate cause of his injury.

[7, 8] 8. Appellant complains of the refusal of the court to give the following special instruction: "If from the evidence you believe the plaintiff sustained the injuries for which he sues by one of the wheels of the train of cars running over or against his right leg, you will nevertheless return a verdict for the defendant if you further find that an ordinarily prudent person in the exercise of ordinary care would not have gotten in front or in the path of the approaching train, but would have remained a sufficient distance out of or from same to avoid being injured by the moving train, and that the plaintiff's failure, if any, in this respect, constituted negligence as that term has been defined, which directly and proximately caused plaintiff's injury." The vice in this requested charge is, first, that it assumes that appellee got in front or in the path of the approaching train, which is denied by appellee; and, second, it ignores Act 1909, p. 279, which provides that "the fact that the employé may have been guilty of contributory negligence shall not bar a recovery, but the damages shall be diminished by the jury in proportion to the amount of negligence attributable to such employé." The court on this matter charged the jury that if appellee was guilty of contributory negligence in walking along and near the side of the moving train, and that such negligence contributed to the injury complained of, and the jury should find for the plaintiff under other instructions, they should take into consideration the elements of damages as in said charge directed, but should diminish the damages that they might award appellee, if any, in proportion to the amount of negligence, if any, attributable to him.

[9] 9. Appellant assails the act of 1900 with reference to contributory negligence as being unconstitutional. He contends that this act makes employers insurers of the safety of their employes. We do not so understand it. It makes employers responsible for injuries to their employes incurred by reason of the negligence of such employers. No recovery can be had under said act unless the employer was guilty of negligence, and such negligence is shown to be the proximate cause of the injury. It is true that under the common law employers were relieved from all responsibility for their negligence, however gross, if the employe was also guilty of negligence, and his negligence contributed to the injury; but the statute referred to has, as we think wisely and justly, abolished this harsh rule of the common law. It sufficiently punishes the employe in such case for his negligence by diminishing the amount of damages which he would otherwise be entitled to recover. The constitutionality of this act is not an open question in this state. Railway Co. v. Foth, 101 Tex. 143, 100 S. W. 175; Railway Co. v. Bailey, 53 Tex. Civ. App. 295, 115 S. W. 607; Freeman v. Swan, 143 S. W. 728; Railway Co. v. Taylor, 184 S. W. 820; Railway Co. v. Alexander, 117 S. W. 932; Railway Co. v. Matkin, 142 S. W. 609.

Finding no reversible error in the record, the judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

JONES et al. v. LAWRENCE (Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Austin.

Nov. 6, 1912.)

1. CHATTEL MORTGAGES (§ 284*) — FORECLOSURE—SALE—CLAIM OF THIRD PERSON.

In a proceeding to foreclose a chattel mortgage on a horse sold by the mortgagor to two partners, a partner, not made a party to the action having intervened, is entitled to possession as against the constable levying execution issued on the judgment.

2. EXECUTION (§ 181*)—TRIAL OF RIGHT TO PROPERTY—RIGHT OF POSSESSION.

A claimant in a trial of the right to property should have judgment when he was in the rightful possession thereof, and was disturbed by levy of the writ, or when he was rightfully entitled to possession, and has been deprived of it by such levy.

Appeal from Coleman County Court; T. J. White, Judge.

Action for trial of right of property by H. E. Jones and others, plaintiffs, against J. A. Lawrence, claimant. From a judgment of the county court for claimant on appeal from a justice court, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

A. G. Walker, of Brady, for appellant. Critz & Woodward, of Coleman, for appellee.

JENKINS, J. 1. This case was a trial of the right of property in the county court on appeal from justice's court. Appellant moved to dismiss said appeal for want of a proper description of the judgment in the appeal bond, and assigns error upon the refusal of the court so to do. We overrule this assignment upon the authority of the following cases: Warren v. Marberry, 85 Tex. 196, 19 S. W. 994, and authorities there cited; also, Kuamierz v. Mahula, 77 S. W. 966; Dillard v. Allison, 40 S. W. 1024; Perry v. Cullen, 6 Tex. Civ. App. 178, 25 S. W. 1043; Ry. Co. v. Lockhart, 89 S. W. 321; Ry. Co. v. Vowel, 34 S. W. 355.

[4, 2] 2. The mortgaged property had been sold to Lawrence & Lee, who were partners in business in Coleman county. The mortgagors were sued in McCulloch county, and Lee was made a party to that suit. Judgment was rendered against the mortgagors for the debt, and against all parties as to the foreclosure of the property. The constable levied upon and took into his actual possession the mortgaged property, a horse. Lawrence filed his claimant's affidavit and bond. Judgment in the county court was rendered in his favor. We deem it unnecessary to discuss the issues raised by the numerous assignments of error further than to say that Lawrence, as one of the members of the mercantile firm, was entitled to the possession of said horse as against any right that could be acquired to same by any judgment against Lee. Lee's interest, if any, in the horse might have been levied upon in the manner pointed out by the statute. Article 2352, R. S. 1895. A claimant in the trial of the right of property is entitled to judgment, when the evidence shows that he was in the rightful possession of property, and that such possession has been disturbed by the levy of the writ, or that he was rightfully entitled to such possession, and that he has been deprived of the exercise of such right by such levy. White v. Jacobs, 66 Tex. 463, 464, 1 S. W. 344; Willis v. Thompson, 85 Tex. 307, 20 S. W. 155.

Finding no reversible error in the record, the judgment is affirmed.

RUTLIN v. TRINITY OIL CO.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. San Antonio. Oct. 30, 1912. Rehearing Denied Dec. 4, 1912.)

TRIAL (§ 194*)—INSTRUCTIONS—WEIGHT OF TESTIMONY.

In an action against a master, where the court fully charged on the issues of contributory negligence and assumption of risk, the giving of four special charges on contributory negligence and five on assumption of risk, at the request of the master, was improper as a comment on the weight of the evidence because putting undue stress on those issues, and tending to lead the jury to believe that it was the opinion of the court that they had been proven.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 413, 436, 439-441, 446-454, 456-466; Dec. Dig. § 194.*]

Appeal from District Court, Dallas County; Kenneth Force, Judge.

Action by Alex Rutlin against the Trinity Oil Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Parks & Patton and Thos. S. Plowman, all of Dallas, for appellant. Walter F. Seay, of Dallas, for appellee.

FLY, J. This is a suit instituted by appellant, a former employé of appellee, to recover damages alleged to have accrued by reason of a defective machine, designated a "former," which was used in the manufacture of cotton seed cake, whereby his hands were mashed and lacerated. Appellee pleaded contributory negligence and assumed risk. The cause was tried by jury, and resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of appellee.

There is a conflict of evidence in the case, the evidence of appellant tending to show that the injury was caused by a defect in the machine and without fault on the part of the appellant, and that of appellee tending to show assumed risk and contributory negligence on the part of appellant. It was shown by appellee that the carriage which mashed appellant's right hand would not move without a lever being pressed, but appellant, and at least one other witness, testified that he did not have his hand on the lever. The evidence was sufficient to take the case to the jury, and the court submitted it to the jury on every issue raised by the evidence, among such issues being assumed risk and contributory negligence. Not satisfied, however, with the charge given by the court, appellee requested four special charges on contributory negligence and five on assumed risk, all of which were given by the court. This was undue repetition, and gave such prominence to the issues named that it was upon the weight of the testimony. Powell v. Messer, 18 Tex. 401; Traylor v. Townsend, 61 Tex. 144; Hays v. Hays, 66 Tex. 607, 1 S. W. 895; Fore v. Hitson, 70 Tex. 517, 8 S. W. 292; Perez v. Everett, 73 Tex. 431, 11 S. W. 388; Kroeger v. Railway, 30 Tex. Civ. App. 87, 69 S. W. 806; Railway v. Condra, 36 Tex. Civ. App. 556, 82 S. W. 528. The special charges, together with the charge of the court, undoubtedly put undue stress upon the issues of contributory negligence and assumed risk, and would lead a jury to believe that it was the opinion of the court that those issues had been proved. The issues were fully presented by the court and the numerous charges requested by appellee should have been refused.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

SEIBER v. NEWMAN et al.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Amarillo. Oct. 19, 1912. Rehearing Denied Nov. 30, 1912.)

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 127*)—ALTERNATIVE RELIEF.

A party may, in the same suit on a contract, pray for performance and, in the alternative, for rescission without being put to the election of either remedy.

Appeal from District Court, Hemphill County; L. S. Kinder, Judge.

Action by C. S. Seiber against A. M. Newman and another. From a judgment in favor of one defendant and for plaintiff against another defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed in part, and reversed and remanded in part.

Willis & Willis, of Canadian, for appellant. Baker & Sanders and H. E. Hoover, all of Canadian, for appellees.

HALL, J. A peremptory instruction was given the jury by the trial court, and in accordance therewith verdict returned in favor of appellee Canadian Long Distance Telephone Company, and in favor of appellant, against A. M. Newman, for the amount of the note in suit. The judgment is affirmed as against A. M. Newman, and is reversed and remanded as to Canadian Long Distance Telephone Company. In view of another trial, it is not proper for us to discuss at length the evidence, but suffice it to say that there was sufficient testimony to have required the trial court to instruct the jury upon the issues, as contended for by appellant under his first, second, third, fourth, and fifth assignments of error. Special exception No. "C," urged by plaintiff as against defendant company's plea of estoppel, should have been sustained, as contended under the sixth assignment. Appellant's seventh assignment is not briefed as required by the rules, and is disregarded. What has been said disposes of the eighth assignment in favor of appellant. The ninth assignment is that the court erred in sustaining defendant telephone company's exception to plaintiff's special pleading in his first supplemental petition, in which plaintiff prayed in the alternative for the return of his property in the event it appeared that the same was acquired by the fraud of A. M. Newman. Since, under our system of pleading, a party may, in the same suit upon a contract, pray for performance, and in the alternative for rescission, without being held to have elected either remedy, it follows that the ninth assignment must be sustained.

Affirmed in part and reversed and remanded in part.

FT. WORTH & D. C. RY. CO. v. WININGER.
(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Amarillo.
Oct. 26, 1912. Rehearing Denied
Nov. 30, 1912.)

1. RAILROADS (§ 350*)—INJURIES TO CHILD ON TRACKS—NEGLIGENCE—EVIDENCE.

In an action for injuries to a child received while she was crossing railway tracks, evidence held sufficient to go to the jury on the question of the defendant's liability.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 1152-1192; Dec. Dig. § 350.*]

2. RAILROADS (§ 376*)—INJURIES TO CHILD ON TRACKS—DUTY OF RAILROAD EMPLOYEES—LICENSEES.

Railroad employees in charge of a train standing in a railway yard and cars moving therein, who knew of the presence of a child and her father, who were passing through the yard as licensees, were charged with the duty of using ordinary care to avoid injuring them.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 1275-1279; Dec. Dig. § 376.*]

3. TRIAL (§ 252*)—INJURIES TO CHILD ON TRACKS—DUTY OF EMPLOYEES—INSTRUCTIONS—EVIDENCE.

In an action for injuries to a child received while crossing railroad tracks in a railroad yard, a charge that it was the duty of the defendant's employees operating its trains to use ordinary care to discover and avoid injuring persons who might be upon or near its track was properly given, where the evidence disclosed that the yards were constantly used as a passageway to get from one side of the track to the other, and the person injured and her father were so using the yards at the time of the injury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 505, 596-612; Dec. Dig. § 252.*]

4. TRIAL (§ 244*)—INJURIES TO CHILD ON RAILROAD TRACKS—INSTRUCTIONS—UNDUE PROMINENCE TO ONE MATTER.

In an action for injuries to a child received while she was crossing railroad yards, an instruction which included a definition of ordinary care, with the qualification that the rule was not applicable if the injured person was not, at the time of her injury, possessed of sufficient intelligence to know and appreciate the danger of crossing under and between the cars while switching was being done, together with a definition of the issue of contributory negligence containing a similar qualification, and a submission of the issue of contributory negligence as applied to an infant of the years of the person injured, was not improper as giving undue emphasis to the exemption from contributory negligence theory.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 577-581; Dec. Dig. § 244.*]

5. TRIAL (§ 252*)—INJURIES TO CHILD ON TRACKS—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—INSTRUCTIONS—EVIDENCE.

In an action for injuries to a child, instructions defining ordinary care, with a qualification that the rule is inapplicable where the injured person is not possessed of sufficient intelligence to know and appreciate the danger, together with a definition of contributory negligence and a similar qualification, and a submission of the issue of contributory negligence as applied to an infant of the years of the person injured, were properly given, where the evidence showed that the plaintiff was less than six years old, was too small to go to school at the time, and had never more than once or twice made the trip which she was making at the time of her injury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 505, 596-612; Dec. Dig. § 252.*]

6. WITNESSES (§ 236*)—EXAMINATION—RIGHT TO COMPLAIN OF FAILURE TO EXAMINE.

A defendant, in an action for injuries to a child while crossing the defendant's railroad yard, cannot complain of the failure of plaintiff's counsel to interrogate her, when she was on the witness stand, to test her intelligence and ability to appreciate her danger at the time of the accident, as such matters could properly have been brought out by the counsel for the defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 817-826; Dec. Dig. § 236.*]

7. RAILROADS (§ 369*)—INJURIES TO CHILD ON TRACKS—DUTY TO PERSONS IN YARDS.

Where a conductor in charge of a train standing in a railroad yard saw a child and her father walking along the right of way near the cars under his care, and knew that a public crossing near by was blocked, he was charged with the knowledge that such person might attempt to cross said cars at the first opening between the same, and in attempting to do so would be in a position of danger, and it was his duty to keep a lookout in that direction before giving a signal for the movement of such cars.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 1259-1262; Dec. Dig. § 369.*]

8. RAILROADS (§ 356*)—OPERATION—DUTY TO PERSONS IN YARDS.

The constant use of railroad yards as a passageway from one side of the track to the other is sufficient to charge the railroad company with notice thereof and to impose upon its employees the duty to use ordinary care to prevent injury to persons so using the yards.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 1223-1234; Dec. Dig. § 356.*]

9. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 742*)—ASSIGNMENTS OF ERROR—PROPOSITIONS CONTAINED—REQUIREMENT FOR SINGLENES.

A reviewing court under rules for the Courts of Civil Appeals (rule No. 32 [142 S. W. xiii]), relating to briefs and providing that propositions, if more than one, under one ground of an assignment, shall refer to it and be stated separately, need not consider an assignment of error containing three separate and distinct propositions of law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3000; Dec. Dig. § 742.*]

10. DAMAGES (§ 216*)—INJURIES TO CHILD—INSTRUCTIONS—EVIDENCE.

Where, in an action for the loss of a foot while crossing railway tracks, the evidence developed that before the injury the child injured was sound, healthy, and well developed, a charge on her loss of earning capacity after she should arrive at the age of 21 years was proper, though there was no direct and specific proof thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. §§ 548-555; Dec. Dig. § 216.*]

11. DAMAGES (§ 216*)—INJURIES TO CHILD—PHYSICAL AND MENTAL SUFFERING—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where the evidence disclosed that plaintiff's leg was badly mangled above the ankle, and the ankle partly crushed, that an amputation between the ankle and knee was necessary, that the leg, from which the foot was amputated, would not develop to the same size as the other, and that the child was forced to take an anæsthetic for the amputation, remained in bed about a week thereafter, and was extremely nervous thereafter, an instruction on physical and mental suffering was properly given.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. §§ 548-555; Dec. Dig. § 216.*]

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

12. NEGLIGENCE (§ 141*)—IMPUTED NEGLIGENCE—INJURIES TO CHILD—NEGLIGENCE OF FATHER—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action for injuries to a child while crossing railway tracks, a charge authorizing a finding for defendant, if the child was induced to go between or under defendant's cars by her father, and the accident would not have occurred but for her father's act, was properly refused for its failure to require a finding that the act of the father was the sole cause of the accident, as otherwise contributory negligence of the father would be imputed to the child.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 382-399; Dec. Dig. § 141.*]

13. NEGLIGENCE (§ 141*)—INJURIES TO CHILD—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—AGE—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action for injuries to a child while crossing railway yards, a requested instruction that if there was open to the plaintiff, before she and her father started to cross defendant's train, another way which was safe, and if plaintiff voluntarily chose the unsafe way, she was guilty of negligence which, if it contributed to her injury, would preclude a recovery, was properly refused because it would hold such child responsible for contributory negligence notwithstanding her tender years and without inquiry as to her capacity to select between a safe and dangerous way.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 382-399; Dec. Dig. § 141.*]

14. TRIAL (§ 191*)—INJURIES TO CHILD ON TRACK—INSTRUCTIONS ASSUMING FACTS.

The instruction was further erroneous in assuming that the child attempted to cross defendant's train where the evidence shows that she was crossing through an opening between cars standing upon a side track, which were no part of the train which caused her injury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 420-431, 435; Dec. Dig. § 191.*]

15. TRIAL (§ 260*)—REQUESTED INSTRUCTION—INCLUSION IN GENERAL CHARGE.

A special charge requested was properly refused where the proposition presented was fully covered by the general charge of the court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 651-659; Dec. Dig. § 260.*]

16. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1060*)—TRIAL (§ 125*)—ARGUMENT OF COUNSEL—IMPROPRIETY—PREJUDICE.

In an action for injuries to a child while crossing railroad tracks, a statement of the plaintiff's counsel that "they (meaning the attorneys for defendant) make me tired in talking about sympathy for this little girl (pointing to the plaintiff). Oh, yes, I wonder how about the bondholders and coupon clippers that own this road"—was improper as relating to matters outside the record, but will not constitute reversible error where called forth by expressions of sympathy for the plaintiff by the opposing counsel, and the verdict was not excessive.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4135; Dec. Dig. § 1060;* Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 303-307; Dec. Dig. § 125.*]

17. DAMAGES (§ 132*)—EXCESSIVE—LOSS OF FOOT.

Ten thousand dollars is not excessive recovery for the crushing of a foot of a child five years and eight months old, which necessitated amputation about halfway between the foot and the knee.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. §§ 372-385, 396; Dec. Dig. § 132.*]

Appeal from District Court, Donley County; J. N. Browning, Judge.

Action by Halys Wininger, by her next friend, E. H. Wininger, against the Fort Worth & Denver City Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appealed to the Court of Civil Appeals, and, from a judgment of reversal therein, plaintiff brought error to the Supreme Court. Heard on a reversal and remand to the Court of Civil Appeals. Judgment for plaintiff affirmed.

Spoons, Thompson & Barwise, of Ft. Worth, H. B. White, of Clarendon, and Turner & Wharton, of Amarillo, for appellant. A. T. Cole, of Clarendon, and D. W. Odell, of Ft. Worth, for appellee.

PRESLER, J. In this case appellee, Halys Wininger, sues by her next friend, E. H. Wininger, to recover damages on account of injuries sustained by her in the yards of the Ft. Worth & Denver City Railway Company at Clarendon, Tex., on the 25th day of April, 1909, necessitating the amputation of her limb between foot and knee. At the time of the injury, she was about five years and eight months old. A verdict was rendered against appellant for $10,000, and judgment entered in accordance therewith. From which said judgment appellant has duly appealed, and the case is before this court for revision. At a former day of the last term, this court (141 S. W. 273), by an opinion handed down by Chief Justice Graham, reversed and rendered this cause, holding that the evidence, taken as a whole, failed to show such negligence as is alleged in the petition on the part of appellant or its employees, proximately causing the injury complained of, and that the charge requested by appellant, giving a peremptory instruction to the jury to return a verdict for appellant, should have been given. On error brought by appellee, the Supreme Court (143 S. W. 1150) on February 21, 1912, reversed the judgment of this court, and remanded said cause to this court to be disposed of in accordance with the opinion of the Supreme Court, stating the evidence on the question of appellant's liability, which statement we here adopt, as follows:

[1] "Clarendon is the county seat of Donley county, and the road of the defendant company passes through the town, we will say from east to west, dividing the town so that hotels and some business houses and residences are north of the tracks; but the main business houses, churches, and school-houses are on the south of the railroad tracks. The tracks of the railroad extended from east to west, as before stated, and the side tracks and switches, in fact, the yards of the railroad, were located on the north side of the track, embracing about 400 feet north and south, and 3,000 feet east and west. Three switch tracks were located on the north side of the main track, numbered 1, 2, and 3, and one switch track on the south. A water tank and coal chute were located in the yards.

"The company's said yards had been inclosed by a post and wire fence for many years, but the fence was not in good repair at the time of the injury, and had not been for some time prior thereto; there being places where the wire was loose from the posts, and in one or two places the top wires had been tied together so as to allow easy passage of pedestrians through the fence, and those who had occasion so to do had been for many years going through and over said fence and across said yards and tracks to such an extent as to make reasonably well-beaten paths along and across said yards, which existed at the time of the occurrence. Children living in the same vicinity with appellee on the north side of the tracks had been habitually going and coming across said yards in attending school on the south side thereof. Garnet street is the first open street east of the yards connecting the north and south sides of the city, and it was generally used by persons in the northeast and southeast portions of the city in passing from north to south over the line of railroad. Appellee resided with her father in the southeast corner of block No. 238, the east boundary line of which forms the west boundary of Garnet street, and it is the second block north from the company's yards; his residence being about 500 or 600 feet a little west of north from where the company's main line crosses Garnet street. The church to which appellee and her father had started when she received her injuries was situated in the northeast corner of block No. 42, being the fourth block and about 700 or 800 feet south of the company's main line, and between Gorst and Kearney streets. It is thus seen that appellee resided northeast of the company's yards, and the church to which she was going was southwest thereof.

"On Sunday morning, about 9 o'clock, about April 25, 1909, appellee, in company with her father, left their home to go to church, intending to cross the railroad on Garnet street; but, as they came out of their residence, they saw that an engine and train attached, headed east, was standing across Garnet street so they took one of the trails or paths mentioned, leading in a southwest direction, and followed it until after they got into the company's yards, passing onto the yards about 1,000 feet east of the water tank, and reached switch track No. 3 at about 950 feet east of the water tank; but, as there was a string of cars on track No. 3, they continued in a west course on the north side of the track until getting within about 500 or 600 feet of the water tank. They came to the caboose, which had been cut loose from the train, and here they crossed track No. 3 east of the caboose so as to be between it and track No. 2, and continued their journey west. About the time they were passing the caboose, they passed also the conductor, who was on the ground between tracks Nos. 2 and 3 and near the west end of the caboose; he seeing them, and they him. There then being a string of cars on track No. 2, they continued their journey west between tracks 2 and 3 to a point slightly east of the water tank, when they tried to cross track No. 2 by going between cars, which were separated a space of six to eight feet on track No. 2, and in attempting to cross track No. 2 at this point appellee received her injury by a car which was moving west on track No. 2; the father at the time being from one to two steps ahead of her. At the time they passed the conductor and brakeman as hereinbefore mentioned, the father was slightly ahead of the child. While appellee and her father were going west between tracks 2 and 3, after they had passed the conductor, they saw the rear brakeman on top of the train then on track No. 2, and he saw them, and they passed on by. There was a long string of empty box cars standing on track No. 2, extending from about 15 to 20 cars east of the water tank to 20 or 25 cars west of it; this string of cars being uncoupled in two or three places, leaving a short space between where uncoupled. As the crew were backing in on track No. 2 the second time to pick up the first division of their train left there, while moving from two to six miles per hour, they backed against it, causing it to move the string of cars west and on the same track, and appellee was injured about 15 cars west of where the crippled car was, and by one of the cars which was on the track when the freight train pulled into the yards, and one not belonging to the train, being handled by the crew. At the time the injury was inflicted, the east end of the train was pointing south of east, and the west end of it south of west, so as to place the most northerly portion of the train about the middle thereof and about opposite where the caboose stood, making a curve in the south side of the train. The conductor, at the time of the injury, was about 31 to 35 car lengths from the engine, and was on the north side, and could have seen appellee and her father at all times after they passed him until they passed behind a car on track No. 2, which caused the injury. The train and crew were under the control and direction of the conductor; the crew consisting of the conductor, the rear and head brakeman, and the fireman and engineer." "No bell was being rung nor whistle blown during the time."

We add to the foregoing statement the testimony of the plaintiff, E. H. Wininger, as follows: "That fence (inclosing railroad yards) has been kept temporarily up all the while, but has always had gaps through the wire admitting the passage of persons. 'The wire is lowered and raised so as to go through there, and people cross there all the time. There are four well-defined passageways between Crahart street and Garnet street that have been constantly used up to the time of this accident.' The witness testified to walking between the second and third tracks until he reached the first opening between the cars, and said: "When we got to the open space there between the cars, and it was the first opening we came to, there was no signal of any kind to indicate that the engine was going to move the string of cars. There was no ringing of the bell or blowing of the whistle. There was no signal of any character or kind given to warn any one that the train was about to move. There was no signal given up to the time of the accident. In crossing this track here, she and I started across the track—that is, the little girl, Halys, and myself—and she was possibly a little behind me. I had let her go with me, and had led her along up the track there for a while, and her nature is to want to be free, and she said, 'Papa, let me go,' and I did so. She said, 'Papa, let me go. I can get along all right without you holding my hand.' Just before we started across here—we started across, and I was possibly a step or a step and a half ahead of her. She was on my left, and, expecting nothing to happen, I did not have my eye on her directly all the time; but when this noise came down the string of cars—that is, the noise of the cars being hit by the engine—the noise of the cars being hit together by the engine seemed to excite her, and she stepped quickly about to the south rail of the middle siding and started to spring and slipped back over this south rail of the middle siding. She slipped to the north side of the south rail of the middle siding, and I started to grab her, but before I could get hold of her the wheel had passed over the foot and limb. I grabbed the child, but it was too late. The accident had already occurred, and her leg and foot were cut off. I took the child in my arms and some way got on the north side of the track. There is a space there that I know nothing about. 'There is a little space there from the time I grabbed the child. The next thing I knew I was on the north side of the track, facing towards home, with the child in my arms.' The court then continues as follows: "We have omitted all the facts that are adverse to plaintiff's claim, and have stated, as we believe, the view of the evidence most favorable to the plaintiff."

In Jee v. Railroad Co., 89 Tex. 583, 36 S. W. 83, this court said: "Negligence, whether of the plaintiff or defendant, is generally a question of fact and becomes a question of law to be decided by the court only when the act done is a violation of some law, or when the facts are undisputed and admit of but one inference regarding the care of the party in doing the act in question; in other words, to authorize the court to take the question from the jury, the evidence must be of such character that there is no room for ordinary minds to differ as to the conclusion to be drawn from it. Railway v. Kane, 69 Md. 11, 13 Atl. 387, 9 Am. St. Rep. 395; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Griffith, 159 U. S. 603, 16 Sup. Ct. 105, 40 L. Ed. 274; Railway v. Ives, 144 U. S. 417, 12 Sup. Ct. 679, 36 L. Ed. 485; Railway v. Gasscamp, 69 Tex. 547, 7 S. W. 227; Chatham v. Jones, 69 Tex. 746, 7 S. W. 600. The test there laid down has been frequently approved and reiterated by this court. That test must be applied in determining whether the Court of Civil Appeals had authority in this case to render this judgment."

The Supreme Court then further holds: "The evidence is amply sufficient to authorize a conclusion that the yards were constantly used by persons to pass from one side of the track and yards to the other, and that the school buildings and churches were on the south side. Such constant use was sufficient to charge the railroad company with notice thereof and to impose on its employees the duty to use ordinary care to prevent injury to such persons as might be passing through the yards. The evidence would justify the conclusion that the father and child were in this instance attempting to cross the track on their way to church or Sunday school. They would have crossed at Garnet street, but that was blocked by a train. That in passing over the third (north) track going south, the purpose to cross the yards was manifested, and at this point the conductor of the train which caused the injury saw them, and must have known, from the direction in which they were going, that they would probably cross the second track at the first opening. He could have seen the man and child from the time they crossed the third track until he caused the cars to move against those standing on the second track. The jury were authorized to conclude that he did see them and knew their purpose, and, without giving notice, he caused the train under his control to move back against the car which caused the injury. The evidence would support a conclusion that the conductor was negligent in failing to see that no one was in position to be injured by the movement of the cars. The evidence would warrant a jury in finding that the failure to give any warning signal of the intended movement of the train constituted negligence on his part, which caused the injury to the child. There is evidence which controverts some of the facts stated, from which a jury might draw different conclusions, and nothing said by us shall be regarded as passing upon the evidence as a whole. The evidence showed such use of the yards in question as required of the employes of the railroad company to use ordinary care to discover any persons who might be using the yards, and the conductor, knowing of the presence of the father and child in the yards, was required by the law to give notice of the movement of the cars. T. & P. Ry. Co. v. Watkins, 88 Tex. 25, 29 S. W. 232. It would be superfluous to cite other authorities. The case of Blossom Oil Co. v. Poteet (Sup.) 136 S. W. 432 [35 L. R. A. (N. S.) 449], rests upon different facts, and was controlled by different principles of law. In that case there was no act of any employé of the oil company that caused the injury; liability was predicated upon the negligence of the employes of the company in permitting the young child to remain in the mill and to get into the place of danger. This court held that the fact that the child was with the father and mother relieved the company from any obligation to care for the child. In this case the father was caring for the child, which was not injured by any act of hers, but the negligent acts of the servants of the railroad company. If the father had been injured instead of the child, he could have recovered. The cases are wholly dissimilar."

Our former opinion is therefore here vacated and held for naught, and appellant's said first assignment, complaining that the trial court erred in not giving appellant's requested peremptory instruction, is here disallowed and overruled.

[2] Appellant, under its second assignment of error, complains of the third paragraph of the charge of the court, wherein the jury is instructed as follows: "It is the duty of the employes of a railway company, operating its trains, to use ordinary care to discover and avoid injuring persons who may be upon or near its track. The degree of such care being such as a person of ordinary prudence and caution would ordinarily exercise under the circumstances, and varying as the known probabilities of danger may vary along the different portions of the route over which such trains are run, and a failure to use such care by its employes, is negligence on the part of such company for which it is liable in damages for an injury resulting from such negligence, unless such liability is defeated by contributory negligence on the part of the person injured"—contending that it was not the duty of appellant's employes operating its train to use any care to discover persons near its tracks on the occasion in question, because the accident did not happen at a place which was public to that extent which would require train operatives to keep a lookout for persons near the track and under the conditions existing at the time of the accident; that it was not the duty of the employes of the defendant to observe the movements of plaintiff and her father while they were near the track, as they were then in no danger. In this contention we cannot concur, believing it was the duty of appellant's employes, in charge of its train and cars moving upon the yards at the time, to use ordinary care to avoid injuring appellee and her father, whose presence the evidence shows was known to said employes, and that this duty would obtain, even in favor of a trespasser, and much stronger in favor of appellee and her father, whom we hold, as shown by the evidence, to have been licensees on appellant's switchyards and railroad track. We find no error in the charge complained of and the assignment is overruled. Texas & Pacific Railway Co. v. Phillips, 37 S. W. 620.

[3] Nor do we think there is any error shown under appellant's third assignment of error, complaining of the third paragraph of the court's charge, in instructing the jury that it was the duty of appellant's employes operating its trains to use ordinary care to discover and avoid injuring persons who might be upon or near its track, contending that no issue was raised by the evidence justifying such a charge. We think, however, it being shown by the evidence that the yards and track were constantly used by persons to pass from one side of the track and yards to the other, that such constant use was sufficient to charge the railroad company with notice thereof, and to impose on its employes the duty to use ordinary care to prevent injury to such persons as might be passing through the yards. The evidence would justify the conclusion that appellee and her father were in this instance attempting to cross the track on their way to church or Sunday school. We therefore conclude that the charge complained of was properly given, and that the assignment should be overruled.

[4] Appellant's fourth assignment of error complains of the fourth, fifth, and seventh sections of the court's charge on the ground that the court gave undue emphasis to the instruction that the jury should not find plaintiff guilty of contributory negligence unless they should find that she was possessed of sufficient intelligence to know and appreciate the danger of crossing under or between the cars while switching was being done, by unduly and unnecessarily repeating said instruction; it appearing from an inspection of the charge that one of the instructions complained of by appellant being a definition of ordinary care, the other a definition of contributory negligence, and the third a charge submitting to the jury the issue of contributory negligence as applied to the facts of this case, we are of the opinion that the court did not err in each of said paragraphs in instructing the jury as complained of in said assignment, and that such instruction was not an unnecessary repetition of the correct legal proposition that the plaintiff could not be guilty of contributory negligence unless the jury should find that she was possessed of sufficient intelligence to know and appreciate her danger. The said fourth paragraph of the court's charge, which is a definition of ordinary care, and in our opinion is properly qualified, is as follows: "This rule of law, however, cannot be applied to the acts and conduct of plaintiff, Halys Wininger, unless you believe from the evidence that she was, at the time of her injury, possessed of sufficient intelligence to know and appreciate the danger of crossing under or between the cars while switching was being done." In the fifth paragraph the court defines contributory negligence with a similar qualification. In the seventh paragraph the court submits to the jury the issue of contributory negligence on the part of the appellee, and properly submits said issue as applied to an infant of her years. We are further inclined to the opinion that, in view of the tender years of appellee (five years and eight months), the court would have been justified in instructing the jury, as a matter of law, that appellee was not guilty of contributory negligence, and that issue was not raised by the evidence. There is no merit in the assignment, and it is overruled. G. C. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Coleman, 51 Tex. Civ. App. 415, 112 S. W. 693; Ollis v. H. E. & W. T. Ry. Co., 31 Tex. Civ. App. 601, 73 S. W. 30; Evansich v. G. C. & S. F. Ry. Co., 57 Tex. 126, 44 Am. Rep. 586; H. & T. C. Ry. Co. v. Simpson, 60 Tex. 103; Freeman v. Carter, 81 S. W. 81; Cook v. Direct Navigation Co., 76 Tex. 358, 13 S. W. 475, 18 Am. St. Rep. 52; T. & P. Ry. Co. v. Phillips, 91 Tex. 281, 42 S. W. 852; T. & P. Ry. Co. v. Fletcher, 6 Tex. Civ. App. 736, 26 S. W. 446; T. & N. O. Ry. Co. v. Brouillette, 130 S. W. 886; M. C. Ry. Co. v. Rodriguez, 133 S. W. 690; 1 Thompson on Negligence, § 310.

[5] Appellant, under its fifth assignment of error, complains of the same portion of the same instruction referred to in the foregoing assignment, and contained in sections 4, 5, and 7 of the court's charge, on the ground that the petition, upon its face, raised the issue of contributory negligence, alleging that appellee was a child of tender years, being only five years of age, without sufficient judgment and discretion to understand the danger and peril of attempting to cross defendant's said track, and that the burden was on her to establish these allegations in support of which she had offered no testimony, and further complains that, although appellee was on the witness stand for the purpose of exhibiting her injured limb to the jury, her counsel did not ask her any questions in order to demonstrate her intelligence and ability to appreciate her danger at the time of the accident. We are of the opinion that the assignment is without merit; the evidence showing, without contradiction, that appellee at the time of her injury was less than six years old; that she had never attended school, and was too small to go to school at the time, and had never more than once or twice made the trip from her home to town or town to her home alone. In the case of H. E. & W. T. Ry. Co. v. Adama, 44 Tex. Civ. App. 293, 98 S. W. 224, where recovery was sought for injuries to a seven year old child, in response to a similar suggestion as here made, the court said: "In the case before us, if it could not be held that Naomi's tender age conclusively placed her in the category of those incapable of contributory negligence, it is certainly true that the issue was in the case, and that the possession of that discretion on her part was a thing to be shown by defendant." Which holding we here commend and hold to be applicable to the facts of this case.

[6] In this connection, we note the statement of appellant, in its assignment, to the effect that appellee was placed on the witness stand, and that her counsel did not ask her any questions in order to test or demonstrate her intelligence and ability to appreciate her danger at the time of the accident, and feel constrained to remark that this omission on the part of appellee's counsel could easily have been remedied by counsel for appellant interrogating the witness, if, notwithstanding her tender years, upon her being offered on the witness stand, he had cause to believe she had such unusual intelligence and ability to appreciate her danger at the time of the accident as would make her capable of contributory negligence. The assignment is overruled.

[7] Under its sixth assignment of error, appellant complains of the sixth paragraph of the court's charge, which is as follows: "Bearing in mind the foregoing definitions and instructions, if you believe, from a preponderance of the evidence, that, before and at the time plaintiff received the injuries complained of in her petition, it was the custom of the people residing in the north-eastern part of the town of Clarendon to cross the tracks of the defendant at or near the point of the accident, and that paths and places of entry had been made for that purpose so as to make the same a common passageway for pedestrians across defendant's right of way, tracks, and yard at said point, and that such custom and such use of said paths and passageways was with the knowledge, consent, and acquiescence of the defendant company, and that, in an attempt to cross over defendant's track at an opening between cars, the said cars were, by defendant's employés, and without the exercise of ordinary care on their part, suddenly moved backwards and towards the plaintiff, without a signal or warning of any kind to her, and that, before she could escape from her then position of peril, she received her injuries in the manner and form complained of in her petition, or if you believe from the evidence that the defendant's conductor and brakeman, or either of them, knew of the presence of plaintiff and her father before said accident, and knew, or had reason to believe, that they would probably undertake to cross over said track and between the cars, and said employes failed to exercise ordinary care in moving said cars, to prevent the accident, and you further find that such act or omission of defendant's said employes was negligence, as hereinbefore defined, and that such negligence was the proximate cause of plaintiff's injuries, then you will find for the plaintiff, unless you find that she was guilty of contributory negligence under the instructions herein given you." Contending that the language employed by the court indicated to the jury that appellee was in a position of peril at the time defendant's employes started to move the train, and that there is no evidence to sustain such a charge, and no evidence to show that appellant knew of appellee's being in a position of peril any time until after the accident, and because said charge was upon the weight of the evidence, we are of the opinion that the charge complained of was warranted by the evidence.

E. H. Wininger testified, in substance, that, at the time he saw the conductor and brakeman and passed down between the tracks, the cars were not in motion, but were standing still; that when they came to the opening in question, which was six or eight feet in width, they started to cross through it, and that no signal of any kind was given to indicate that the cars were to be moved; that, in going across the track, he was a step or two ahead of the child, and that, as the string of cars started to move, the noise seemed to excite the appellee, and she stepped quickly about to the south rail of the track and started to spring and slipped back over the south rail, and that he started to grab her, but before he could do so her leg and foot had been cut off. And again that at the time he and appellee intended to cross this track, the cars were standing still, and there were no engines attached to them that he knew of.

We are further of the opinion that the evidence conclusively showed that the employes of appellant had knowledge of the presence of appellee and her father on the tracks, and that they were negligent in failing to keep an efficient lookout and in failing to give signals of warning that the cars were about to be moved. The evidence shows that the conductor was standing on the north side of the string of cars in controversy, superintending the movement of the cars. He testified, in part, as follows: "I knew the little girl and her father were on the right of way of the Denver about four or five minutes before the accident. I saw them coming along the track. I was standing near where the coupling was being made at the time of the accident. I probably could have seen them start towards the cars if I had been looking that way, but my duties were in the opposite direction, and I was looking towards the engine, giving signals to make the coupling. I was on the north side of the train at the time of the accident, and I was on the same side of the train with the girl and her father when I last saw them walking along the track. They walked along the north side of the track, the same side that I was on. I saw Mr. Wininger and his two little girls going in a west or north direction. I saw him and the two little girls in between the passing track and No. 2 track and going south—no, north, I meant to say (west according to the directions adopted by counsel for appellant and ourselves). That was four or five minutes before the accident. I think it took them four minutes to get up to where the accident happened. I was there all the time and after they passed me, and never saw them until I heard the scream. I don't remember turning around before that and looking in their direction. When I turned I saw Mr. Wininger in a stooped position with the little girl in his arms, and the other child was close by them jumping up and down. At the same time (i. e., the time the child screamed), I saw a man come out close to her in a stooped position as though he came out from under the car. I saw a man moving very close to a car in a stooped position with a child in his arms. I first saw the appellee and her father on the right of way close to the caboose between track No. 2 and No. 3. The little girl was four or five or six feet behind her father when I first saw them." The evidence also showed that the public crossing across appellant's track on Garnet street was blocked by the cars in controversy, and that said fact was known to the conductor, who gave the signals for the movement of the train, and who had seen appellee and her father walking along the right of way near said cars. We are therefore of the opinion that he was charged with the knowledge and fact that they might attempt to cross said cars at the first opening between the same, and, in attempting to do so, would be in a position of danger and peril, and that it was his duty to keep a lookout in that direction before giving a signal for the movement of said cars. The assignment is overruled.

[8] Appellant, under its seventh assignment of error, contends that there was no testimony whatever tending to show that the use of defendant's yards by the public was known to any representative of the company who had authority to bind the defendant by reason of such knowledge, and for that reason objects to that portion of section 6 of the court's charge to the effect that, if the jury believed, from a preponderance of the evidence, that, before and at the time the plaintiff received the injuries complained of, it was the custom of the people residing in the northeastern part of the town of Clarendon to cross the tracks of the defendant at or near the place of the accident, and that paths and places of entry had been made for that purpose so as to make the same a common passageway for pedestrians across defendant's right of way, tracks, and yards at said point, and that such custom and such use of said paths and passageway was, with the knowledge and consent and acquiescence of the defendant company, etc., we are of the opinion, as held by the Supreme Court in this case, that such constant use was sufficient to charge the railroad company with notice thereof, and to impose on its employes the duty to use ordinary care to prevent injury to such persons as might be passing through the yards, and that the evidence amply warranted giving the instruction objected to. Finding no merit in the assignment, it is overruled.

[9] The proposition submitted under appellant's eighth assignment of error contains three separate and distinct propositions of law and is in violation of the rule governing the preparation of briefs, prescribed for the government of this court. The distinct propositions submitted in said assignment are as follows: First. That there was no evidence as to appellee's earning capacity, and the court erred in submitting said issue to the jury. Second. There was no evidence as to appellee's physical or mental suffering, and the court erred in submitting this issue to the jury. Third. That the tenth paragraph of the court's charge did not restrict appellee's recovery for her losses until after she should arrive at the age of 21 years. Rules for the Courts of Civil Appeals, No. 32 (142 S. W. xiii).

[10] If this assignment, however, be considered, we are of the opinion that the same does not require a reversal of this case, the evidence showing the appellee was an infant of tender years, but sound, healthy, and a well developed child, and to have entirely lost her right foot, and we think the jury were entitled to consider the question of her lost earning capacity, without direct and specific proof thereof.

[11] Again we think the testimony was abundantly sufficient to raise the issue of mental and physical suffering. E. H. Wininger testified that the wheel passed over appellee's limb some distance above the ankle, and that it was very badly mangled and the ankle partly crushed; that the leg was not cut squarely off, but there were a few strips of skin, and maybe some ligament, but it was practically cut in two and completely crushed; that her limb was amputated about halfway between her ankle and knee, and that the leg which had been amputated does not develop like the other, and that, as the child grows older, that limb gets smaller than the one which was not injured and on which she walks mainly, and that there was, at the time of the trial, a considerable difference in their size—a difference at least of one-fourth as to their comparative development; that she remained in bed something like a week after the amputation, and that the limb has caused her considerable trouble after the amputation, and that he knew from her actions and demeanor that she suffered. Dr. E. F. Ham, one of the surgeons by whom the foot was amputated, testified that he found her foot crushed to a mass, and that it was bleeding and simply crushed to a pulp, and that the child was suffering and cried, and that he administered an anæsthetic to relieve the pain of the amputated foot, and that, after the amputation, the child was nervous, and that he had noticed since she was nervous; that the amputation would retard the developments of the injured limb, and that there is always more or less inconvenience in having to care for a limb where a part of it was gone. He also testified that all persons with an amputated limb felt sensations of pain in the amputated member. The paragraph of the charge complained of expressly limits appellee's recovery for diminished earning capacity to losses after she should arrive at 21 years of age. The assignment is without merit and is therefore overruled.

[12] Under its ninth assignment, appellant complains of the refusal of the court to give the following charge: "Gentlemen of the jury, if you believe from the evidence that the act of the plaintiff, Halys Wininger, in going between or under the cars of defendant in the manner shown by the evidence, was induced and caused by her father, and that, but for such act of her father in causing her to do so, the accident would not have occurred, then you will find in favor of the defendant." It is to be noted that the charge requested does not require the jury to find that the act of her father should be the sole cause of her injury, and we are of the opinion that the charge refused was in effect an attempt to impute to the appellee such contributory negligence as the jury might find occurred on the part of her father, which the law does not permit. The charge was properly refused.

[13] Appellant, under its tenth assignment, complains of the action of the court in refusing to give its special charge No. 5, wherein the jury were instructed that, if they believed from the evidence that there was open to appellee, leading on in the direction she and her father were going just before they started to cross defendant's train, another way, and that such other way was a safe way, and that appellee voluntarily chose the unsafe way, she would be guilty of negligence, and that, if such negligence contributed to her injury, she could not recover. The vice in the charge in question, in our opinion, is that it would have the effect to hold appellee responsible for contributory negligence, notwithstanding her tender years and without inquiry as to her discretion and mental capacity to select between a safe and a dangerous way.

[14] We think the charge further erroneous in that it assumes that appellee attempted to cross defendant's train, when the evidence shows that she was crossing through an opening between cars standing upon the side track, which were no part of the train which caused her injury. The assignment is therefore overruled.

[15] Appellant, under its eleventh assignment of error, complains of the action of the court in refusing to give its requested special charge to the effect that there was no evidence of knowledge on the part of appellant of its yards and switch grounds, in particular the place where the accident occurred, being used by the public so as to make the same a public way by habitual use. We are of the opinion that this assignment is without merit, and that the evidence is amply sufficient to authorize the conclusion that the yards were constantly used by persons passing over the same within the observation and knowledge of appellant, through its agents and employes, and that it was the duty of appellant to take notice of such customary and continued use of its property by the public. We are of the opinion that the proposition requested to be submitted in appellant's eleventh special charge, the refusal of which is complained of under its twelfth assignment, was fully covered by the general charge of the court, and that there was no error on the part of the court, in refusing to give the same.

[16] Appellant, under its thirteenth and fourteenth assignments of error, insists that this case should be reversed because of certain language used by counsel for appellee in making the closing argument to the jury. The language complained of, as shown by the bill of exceptions, is as follows: "Gentlemen of the jury, they (meaning the attorneys for defendant) make me tired in talking about sympathy for this little girl (pointing to the plaintiff). Oh, yes, I wonder how about the bondholders and coupon clippers that own this road." While the language thus used by appellee's counsel was improper in that it related to matters outside of the record, it may find some extenuation in the fact that, as disclosed in the oral argument of this phase of the case, and by the bill of exception, the matter of sympathy appears to have been introduced into the discussion of the case by counsel for appellant, who may have thought it incumbent upon him as a kind-hearted man to express to the jury his feelings of sympathy for an unfortunate little girl (and the same were no doubt creditable to him), but their expression did not relate to any matter in the record, and may have been viewed by opposing counsel as in a way intended to conciliate favor with the jury for counsel's client, to which he was at liberty and in a manner invited to reply, which he appears to have done by first stating that such expressions, coming from opposing counsel, made him tired, and then by indulging the inquiry as to the owners of the road. His description of these gentlemen as "coupon clippers" and "bondholders" may have been unfortunate and calculated to inflame the minds of some jurors in some localities, but as stated by Judge Stayton in the case of I. & G. N. Railway Co. v. Irvine, 64 Tex. 535: "The use of improper language or course of argument by adverse counsel within itself furnishes no sufficient reason for reversing a judgment, and it is only in cases in which a preponderance of the evidence seems to be against the verdict, or in cases in which the verdict seems excessive, and there is reason to believe that the verdict may have been affected by such course of conduct, that it becomes a ground for reversal."

[17] And in this instance we are unable to hold that the verdict rendered is either excessive or against the preponderance of the evidence to the extent that it can only be accounted for by assuming that the minds of the jury were inflamed and prejudiced against appellant by the language complained of, as in our opinion the verdict is warranted by the evidence, and is not excessive in amount. Much larger verdicts have been sustained by the courts of this state for similar injuries. I. & G. N. Railway Co. v. Sandlin, 57 Tex. Civ. App. 151, 122 S. W. 60; Houston B. & T. Ry. Co. v. O'Leary, 136 S. W. 601; M., K. & T. Ry. Co. v. Nesbit, 43 Tex. Civ. App. 630, 97 S. W. 825.

Appellant's fifteenth assignment of error presents no new matter for our consideration. The questions presented thereunder having been heretofore considered, the assignment is overruled.

Finding no reversible error presented under appellant's assignments, or either of them, we conclude that there is no error in the judgment rendered below, and that the same should be in all things affirmed, and it is accordingly so ordered.

LEVERETTE v. RICE.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Dallas.
Nov. 23, 1912.)

DISMISSAL AND NONSUIT (§ 19*)—INVOLUNTARY DISMISSAL—CONDITION OF CAUSE.

Under Rev. Civ. St. 1911, art. 1955, which permits a plaintiff to take a nonsuit as to his cause of action, if not to the prejudice of the defendant to be heard on his claim for affirmative relief, the dismissal of an action for the price of land, in which defendant filed a plea in reconvention for the cancellation of the contract on the ground of fraud, and for damages for false representations, was prejudicial error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dismissal and Nonsuit, Cent. Dig. §§ 33-36; Dec. Dig. § 19.*]

Appeal from District Court, Hill County; C. M. Smithdeal, Judge.

Action by E. J. Rice against J. C. Leverette, with cross-action by defendant. From a judgment dismissing the entire action, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Luther Nickels, of Hillsboro, for appellant.

RAINEY, C. J. E. J. Rice instituted this suit against J. C. Leverette, alleging substantially that on or about April 23, 1911, J. C. Leverette purchased 100 acres of land in Henderson county, Tex., from E. J. Rice, and promised to pay E. J. Rice \$1,000 in cash and one horse of the estimated value of \$700, and to assume three notes, for \$268.66 $\frac{2}{3}$ each, signed by H. A. Johnson, and payable to R. C. Bristow, given as original purchase-money notes for said land; that it was agreed between Leverette and Rice that H. A. Johnson was to execute a deed to Leverette, and that Rice was to have as his profit the difference between whatever sum he would have to pay said H. A. Johnson for said land and the sum of \$2,500, as stated above, and that Leverette was to pay this difference to Rice upon the presentation of a deed duly executed by said Johnson to said Leverette; that Rice did purchase said land from said Johnson, and agreed to pay said Johnson the sum of \$1,600 therefor, and that thereupon said Johnson executed a deed to said land to said Leverette, which deed was tendered to said Leverette; and that said Leverette failed and refused to accept the deed and to pay all the consideration, as stated above, to Rice's damage in the sum of \$900, for judgment of which amount he prayed.

Leverette answered, among other things, with a general denial and with special answers, in substance as follows: "That at the time the contract sued upon was made, and prior to and thereafter, the plaintiff had no authority to sell said land, and was unable and unauthorized to carry out such sale and contract. That said contract, if any, and sale, was procured in fraud in the following respects: The defendant desired to purchase land upon which marketable timber was standing, for the purpose of removing the timber therefrom and transporting the same by rail to market, and to market the same for profit, and this fact was well known to and stated to the plaintiff by the defendant prior to and at the time of the making of such contract. Defendant further desired, and it was necessary for his purpose, that such land should be located near to, and not more than 1 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles from a switch upon the line of railway of the St. Louis & Southwestern Railway Company of Texas, and this fact was known to and stated to the plaintiff by the defendant. That the country along the line of said railway in the vicinity in question is a country whose soil is deep sand, and that by reason thereof, as well as the general topography of the country, it is very difficult to travel or to haul loads on wagons or other vehicles, and for the purpose for which defendant desired the land, under the circumstances, the land would be worthless, if located further away from such switch or railroad than 1 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles, and it would be impossible for the timber located on such land to be marketed at any profit whatever, if such land were located further away from such railroad or switch than 1 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles; but that, if such land were located within distance of railroad, such timber could be marketed at a great profit, which fact the defendant knew, and the facts were known to and stated to the plaintiff by the defendant. That the plaintiff was well acquainted with said land and its location, and the defendant had never seen said land, and was totally unacquainted with its location, etc., and this fact was known to and stated to the plaintiff by the defendant, and by reason of the limited time at the command of the defendant, and by reason of the facts herein stated, the defendant did not examine said land and its location, and the defendant stated such facts to the plaintiff, and told the plaintiff that he (defendant) would be compelled to and would rely entirely upon the truth of the representation relative to said land and its location made by the plaintiff, to which the plaintiff replied that the defendant might rely upon such representations and that he (plaintiff) would guarantee the truthfulness of the same. That the plaintiff represented said land as being land upon which marketable timber suitable for the purpose for which defendant desired said land was standing, and that said land was located within 1 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles of a switch on the line of said railroad, and not further away therefrom, and that by reason of its location said switch was easy of access from said land; and upon the strength and because of such representations and descriptions relative to said land and its location, and the statements made by plaintiff, the contract was made, and at the time the defendant stated to the plaintiff that such was his reason and the consideration for his entering into such contract. That each and all of the representations as made by the plaintiff with reference to the land were untrue and false, in that the land is located more than 3 miles away from any switch or any railroad, and that by reason of this distance that would have to be traversed to reach a railroad or switch, and by reason of the permanent conditions of the roads leading from such land to the railroad and switch, and the character of the soil and the general topography of the country, the timber upon the land cannot be marketed at any profit at all, but that such timber cannot be transported over such roads and marketed, except at a positive loss, and the land therefore is worthless upon the market, and is worthless for the purpose for which the defendant desired the same, all of which facts were known to the plaintiff prior to and at the time of the making of the contract. That if said land had been located as represented the defendant could and would easily have made a profit out of the marketing of such timber to the amount of \$10 per acre, which fact was well known to plaintiff, and this fact was the material consideration of the contract, and it was the only inducement to lead defendant to enter into such contract, and this fact was known to the plaintiff. That all of the actual facts as to the location and surroundings of the land, and of the condition of the same and of the roads, were actually known to the plaintiff at the time he made such representations, and that he (plaintiff) made such representations willfully, intentionally, deliberately, and maliciously, for the purpose of inducing defendant to make such contract, and for the purpose of defrauding the defendant, and he did thereby defraud the defendant. Defendant alleged all of the facts stated by way of cross-action against the plaintiff, as well as affirmative differences, and prayed that the contract entered into with plaintiff be canceled and held for naught, and that the defendant be held free for any responsibility thereunder, and alleged his actual damage at \$1,600, and prayed for judgment against the plaintiff in said amount by reason thereof. In addition the defendant asked for judgment against the plaintiff in the sum of \$1,000 as vindictive, punitive, and exemplary damages, and asked for such other relief to which he might be entitled."

On the 23d day of November, 1911, the case was called for trial upon the pleadings as stated above. The plaintiff presented his application for continuance, which was overruled, and the defendant announced ready for trial. The plaintiff thereupon moved the court for nonsuit, and asked the court to dismiss the case, which motion to dismiss was contested and objected to by the defendant. The motion was granted, and the entire case was dismissed, to all of which the defendant duly excepted, and gave notice of appeal therefrom to this court.

Complaint is made by appellant that the court erred in allowing plaintiff to take a nonsuit and in dismissing the cause of action, when he (appellant) had filed a plea in reconvention for the cancellation of the contract sued on, and for recovery of damages for false representations, etc. The statute permits a plaintiff to take a nonsuit as to his cause of action; but such action cannot be taken to the prejudice of the defendant to be heard on his claim for affirmative relief. R. S. 1911, art. 1955. The court erred in dismissing the cause to the prejudice of defendant, and preventing a hearing on defendant's plea in reconvention. State v. Loan & Trust Co., 81 Tex. 530, 17 S. W.

60; Long v. Behan, 19 Tex. Civ. App. 325, 48 S. W. 555.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

JAYNES et ux. v. BURCH et al.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Dallas. Nov. 30, 1912.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 100*)—APPEALABLE ORDERS—REFUSAL TO DISSOLVE TEMPORARY INJUNCTION.

Under Acts 31st Leg. c. 34, amending Acts 30th Leg. c. 107, authorizing an appeal from an order granting, refusing, or dissolving a temporary injunction, no right of appeal lies from an order refusing to dissolve such an injunction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 670-680; Dec. Dig. § 100.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 621*)—RESERVATION OF GROUNDS—CERTIFICATION—TIME.

An appeal from an order granting a temporary injunction cannot be considered, where the transcript was not filed in the Court of Civil Appeals within 15 days from the entry of record.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2724-2731; Dec. Dig. § 621.*]

Appeal from District Court, Dallas County; J. C. Roberts, Judge.

Petition by Mrs. Quincy Hamilton Burch and another against J. F. Jaynes and wife for a restraining order. From an order overruling a motion to dissolve, and continuing in force, a temporary injunction, respondents appeal. Appeal dismissed.

I. C. Underwood and C. F. Greenwood, both of Dallas, for appellants. Brooks & Worsham, of Dallas, for appellees.

TALBOT, J. This is an appeal from an order of the district court overruling a motion to dissolve, and continuing in force, a temporary injunction. The record discloses that the appellee, Mrs. Quincy Hamilton Burch, joined by her husband, T. C. Burch, filed in the district court of Dallas county, on the 21st day of September, 1912, a petition with the following fiat of the judge of said court indorsed thereon: "When the plaintiffs shall have filed a properly conditioned bond in the sum of $250, the clerk will issue a temporary restraining order, prohibiting the transfer and negotiation of the notes described in this petition, and will issue notice to the defendants to appear at 9 a. m. September 28, 1912, and show why said restraining order should not be continued in force. [Signed] Kenneth Foree, Judge 14th Dist. Tex." On September 28, 1912, the defendants, appellants here, filed a lengthy answer, which they claimed denied all the material allegations of the plaintiffs' petition, and prayed that the injunction theretofore granted be dissolved and the cause dismissed. On the 5th day of October, 1912, a judgment was entered overruling the motion to dissolve and continuing the temporary injunction in force. This judgment recites that, the cause "coming on to be heard * * * upon defendants' motion to dissolve the temporary restraining order heretofore granted, * * * came the plaintiffs in person and by attorneys, and also came the defendants in person and by attorneys, and both sides announced ready for trial upon the injunction feature of the case. * * * The petition of plaintiffs being read, and the exceptions, motion, and answer of defendants being read, * * * and the court, after having heard all the pleadings, evidence, and argument of counsel, is of opinion that the defendants' motion to dissolve said restraining order should be overruled and refused." The judgment then expressly continues in force the temporary injunction granted on September 21, 1912, and concludes as follows: "To the action, rulings, order, judgment, and decree of court the defendants then and there in open court excepted, and in open court the defendants and each of them gave notice of appeal to the Court of Civil Appeals, Fifth Supreme Judicial District of the state of Texas, at Dallas, Texas."

[1] This is, in substance, the record sent to this court, and the question arises: Has this court jurisdiction to consider the appeal? That this question should be answered in the negative seems to be well settled by the statute and decisions of the appellate courts of this state. As affecting the question before us, there is no material difference in the statute of the Thirtieth Legislature (Acts 1907, c. 107), which has been several times construed by our courts, and the statute of the Thirty-First Legislature (Acts 1909, c. 34) amendatory thereof. Neither of these statutes gives the right of appeal from an order refusing to dissolve an injunction, and the continuing of an injunction previously granted in force by express language to that effect in the order refusing to dissolve until the further order of the court is not, in contemplation of the statute, the granting of a writ of injunction. Baumberger v. Allen, 101 Tex. 352, 107 S. W. 526.

[2] The record, we think, very clearly shows that the appeal is prosecuted from the order entered refusing to dissolve the temporary injunction; but if under any sort of construction it could be said the appellants' purpose was to, and that they did, appeal from the order of Judge Foree granting said temporary injunction, then the transcript was not filed in this court within the time prescribed by the statute, and the appeal cannot be entertained by this court. As has been seen, the temporary injunction was granted on the 21st day of September, 1912, and the transcript was not filed in this court until October 20, 1912. The statute requires that the transcript in appeals from an interlocutory order granting a temporary injunction shall be filed in the Court of Civil Appeals not later than 15 days after the entry of record of such order, and the filing of the petition with the order indorsed thereon constitutes the "entry of record of such order." Walstein v. Nicholson, 47 Tex. Civ. App. 358, 105 S. W. 207; Baumberger v. Allen, supra. Not having filed the transcript in this court within the time prescribed by the statute, the appellants' right of appeal from the order of September 21, 1912, granting the temporary injunction, was lost. It was necessary, in order to confer jurisdiction on an appeal from the order granting the temporary injunction in this case upon this court, for the appellants to have filed the transcript within 15 days from September 21, 1912. Baumberger v. Allen, supra; Powdrill v. Powdrill, 134 S. W. 272. For other cases holding that no appeal lies from an order overruling a motion to dissolve an injunction, see Dodson v. Boger, 130 S. W. 1021; Bledsoe et al. v. United Brothers of Friendship and Sisters of Mysterious Ten, 131 S. W. 256.

This court not having jurisdiction of the appeal, it is dismissed.

McSHAN v. JOHNSON.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. San Antonio. Nov. 20, 1912.)

1. PARTITION (§ 78*)—PROCEEDINGS TO MAKE ACTUAL PARTITION—DIVISION BY VALUE.

Under Rev. Civ. St. 1911, art. 6108, requiring the court, before entering a decree of partition, to determine whether the property or any part is susceptible of partition, and, if so, to appoint commissioners to make such partition, the duty of dividing the land as to value is confided to the commissioners, and they may divide it according to value, although the court determines that each of the parties is entitled to one-half.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partition, Cent. Dig. §§ 265-273; Dec. Dig. § 78.*]

2. PARTITION (§ 91*)—PROCEEDINGS TO MAKE ACTUAL PARTITION—DIVISION BY VALUE.

In a partition suit, the court did not err in appointing new commissioners and surveyor to make partition, when those first appointed failed or refused to act.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partition, Cent. Dig. §§ 225-264; Dec. Dig. § 91.*]

3. PARTITION (§ 91*)—PROCEEDINGS TO MAKE ACTUAL PARTITION—DIVISION BY VALUE.

A motion in a partition suit for the appointment of a surveyor and commissioners to make partition, alleging that the court awarded a writ of partition, and that the commissioners and surveyor appointed had failed and refused to carry out their duties, was sufficient, although it did not state that a writ of partition, accompanied by a certified copy of the decree, was ever issued to the sheriff.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partition, Cent. Dig. §§ 225-264; Dec. Dig. § 91.*]

Appeal from District Court, Dallas County; E. B. Muse, Judge.

Action by L. W. Johnson against L. F. McShan. From the judgment, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Short & Feild and Walter Seay, all of Dallas, for appellant. Etheridge & McCormick, and H. L. Bromberg, all of Dallas, for appellee.

FLY, C. J. Appellee instituted a suit against L. F. McShan to partition a tract of 160 acres of land, being a part of the William Crabtree 320-acre survey, in Dallas county, claiming that each party owned an undivided one-half interest in the premises. Appellee claimed to have placed improvements on the south one-half of the tract, and that appellant had improved the north half of the land. Appellant answered that under an adjustment of the business affairs of appellant and appellee, who had been partners, it was ascertained that appellee was indebted to appellant, and that in order to have an adjustment of their business affairs they agreed that the land should be divided, so that appellant should have all the land lying south of a certain line, and appellee all lying north therefrom, and a division fence was constructed on said agreed line. The court instructed the jury to return a verdict in favor of appellee for one-half the land described in the petition, and in favor of appellant for the other half, and the court rendered judgment on such verdict, partitioning the land, one-half in value to each of the parties, without considering the value of the respective improvements, and commissioners were appointed to make the partition. Afterwards, at the instance of appellee, new commissioners were appointed; the others having failed to act. The last commissioners reported, setting apart to appellee 81.9 acres of land, of the value of $5,767.50, exclusive of improvements which had been made thereon by appellee, and to appellant 71.9 acres, of the value of $5,767.50, exclusive of improvements made by him, and the report was confirmed by the court, and judgment rendered accordingly.

The statement of facts contains nothing but the evidence heard on the confirmation of the report of the commissioners. That statement shows that the 71.9 acres of land awarded to appellant was equal in value to the 81.9 acres awarded to appellee, and that each got all of his improvements. The tract awarded to appellant was much nearer the railroad, on which is a siding and a little settlement. The only objections to the judgment are that the verdict was for one-half of the land to each party, and the court decreed to each one-half in value, instead of quantity. The law as embodied in title 101, c. 1, Rev. Civ. Stat. 1911, was followed in the proceedings of the court below. It was determined that each of the parties was entitled to one-half the land, that it was capable of partition, that it should be partitioned in accordance with the respective shares or interests of each party, specifying the share or interest of each party, and three disinterested persons were appointed to make the partition. A surveyor was appointed, and the commissioners partitioned the land, "having due regard in the division to the situation, quantity, and advantages of each share, so that the shares may be equal in value as nearly as may be, in proportion to the respective interests of the parties entitled." Rev. Civ. Stat. 1911, art. 6108 (old article 3618). The report of the commissioners was made in strict compliance with law.

[1] The amendment of 1905 gave to the court the power of determining whether the land was susceptible of division and to decree a partition in accordance with the respective shares found by the court. Gorman v. Campbell, 135 S. W. 177. The duty of dividing the land as to value, however, is confided to the commissioners, for the plain reason that they alone are in a position to make a fair and equitable division; and although the court may determine that each of two claimants is entitled to one-half the land the commissioners have the authority, and it is their duty, to divide the land according to value of the respective shares. Any other manner of procedure would be unjust and inequitable, as in this case, where appellant is not contending that he has not received as much in value as appellee, but that he should have a certain half of the land, regardless of value. Such a contention is not sustained by law, and will not be tolerated in a court of equity.

[2, 3] There is no merit in the sixth assignment of error. The court did not err in appointing new commissioners and surveyor, when the first failed and refused to act. The only objection urged to such appointment is the insufficiency of the motion asking for the appointment, in that it did not state that a writ of partition, accompanied by a certified copy of the decree, was ever issued to the sheriff. No objection was urged to the motion in the lower court, when it was presented. The motion alleged that the court had awarded a writ of partition, and had appointed commissioners and surveyor, and that they "have failed and refused to carry out their duties under said writ of partition." The motion was sufficient.

The judgment is affirmed.

negotiable vendor's lien note against the payee and indorser, which also sought to foreclose the vendor's lien, was properly brought in the district court, which had exclusive jurisdiction to render judgment, both for the debt and foreclosing the lien, under Const. 1876, art. 5, § 8 (Sayles' Ann. Appeal from District Court, Lubbock County; W. R. Spencer, Judge.

Action by O. C. Belt against Jim Robinson, Jr., and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant named appeals. Affirmed.

Jas. R. Robinson, of Lubbock, for appellant. W. D. Benson, of Lubbock, for appellee.

PRESLER, J. This suit was filed in the district court of Lubbock county, Tex., on the 2d day of November, 1910, by O. C. Belt, as owner, against A. L. Reed, the maker, and appellant, the payee and indorser, of a certain vendor's lien note, dated February 12, 1910, due six months after date, for the sum of $330, interest and attorney's fees. Appellant answered by demurrer and exception, raising the question of his liability by reason of the fact that the note was not protested or suit brought at the first term after maturity at which it could be brought; and, said demurrer and exception having been overruled, the court rendered judgment in favor of appellee for the amount of the debt, as shown by said note, and for foreclosure of the vendor's lien against both defendants, from which judgment appellant duly appeals and here, by proper assignment, contends that the court erred in rendering judgment against him, upon the ground that he was only an indorser, and that the note had not been protested, nor suit brought at the first term after its maturity.

From the findings of fact of the trial court, we find that the note in question matured on the 15th day of August, 1910, and that the first term of the district court of Lubbock county held thereafter met on the 21st day of November, 1910, to which this suit was brought. Also that a regular term of the county court of Lubbock county for civil business was held on the second Monday in October, 1910, which was the first term of said court held after the maturity of said note; and appellant contends that to hold him as indorser on said note the same should have either been protested for nonpayment, or suit brought thereon at the first term of the county court, and in support of said contention cites us to articles 315 and 304, Revised Statutes, and Smith et al. v. Ojerholm et al., 51 S. W. 37, and Cruger v. Lindheim, 16 S. W. 420, which authorities do not, in our opinion, support his contention.

It appears that appellee brought his suit to the first term of the district court of Lubbock county, which court had, under the Constitution and Statutes of this state, exclusive jurisdiction to give appellee the full redress provided by law; that is, both judgment for his debt and foreclosure of his vendor's lien on the land. Article 5, § 8, of the Constitution of 1876; article 1098, subd. 4, Sayles' Texas Civil Statutes; Handel v. Elliott, 60 Tex. 147. While the county court could only have rendered personal judgment for the debt sued on, and had no authority to foreclose the vendor's lien on the land, and as it is the policy of the law to avoid multiplicity of suits, we are of the opinion that the district court is, within the contemplation of article 304, R. S., the proper court in which this character of suit should be brought, and that the judgment appealed from should be in all things affirmed; and it is accordingly so ordered.

PORTER et al. v. JOHNSON et al.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Dallas. Nov. 23, 1912.)

1. HIGHWAYS (§ 7*)—PRESCRIPTIVE RIGHT.

The public may by adverse use for the prescriptive period acquire right of highway in a road, though the county authorities have not recognized it as a public road.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Highways, Cent. Dig. §§ 10, 12-14, 16, 18; Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

2. HIGHWAYS (§ 77*)—CLOSING—INJUNCTION—PLEADING.

Though the road, the closing of which was sought to be enjoined, was not a part of the E. road as actually laid out by the county authorities, yet it being part of "what is known" as the E. road, and this being the allegation of the petition, there is no variance.

TALBOT, J. This is an action brought by the appellees against Horton B. Porter, county judge of Hill county, Tex., J. I. Edens, W. E. Farquhar, J. F. Griffith, and G. W. Taylor, county commissioners of said county, and Eugene Edens, Mrs. Maggie Taylor, Mrs.

E. Parker, and Ernest Parker, husband of the said Mrs. E. Parker, to restrain the said county judge and commissioners, as members of and composing the commissioners' court of Hill county, from having an order, made by said court on February 17, 1911, discontinuing a public road in commissioners' precinct No. 4 of said county, alleged to be known as part of the Eureka Tap road, executed and enforced, and to enjoin the other named defendants from obstructing or closing up said road. The injunction as prayed for was granted, and by an amended petition sworn to, upon which the case was tried, the plaintiffs alleged, among other things, that they resided in Hill county, Tex., and in commissioners' precinct No. 4, and, in substance (1) that the road in question had been, upon petition and the report of a jury of view, established as a public road; (2) that if it had been used by the people of Hill county and by plaintiffs as a thoroughfare and recognized by the county as such for a period of more than 30 years; (3) that said road had been opened and dedicated to public use as a public road; (4) that the same had become a public highway and the right of the public to use it as such had been acquired by prescription; that the community public free school, known as the Eureka district school, is situated on said road, and the said road affords the nearest and most convenient way for the children of plaintiffs to reach the public schoolhouse; that to discontinue said road would, in the judgment of plaintiffs, necessitate the dividing of the Eureka school district, thereby rendering it impossible to have and maintain as good a school as now exists, and be destructive of the school interest of said community; that said road is used by the people residing in said Eureka school district in going to and from church, Sunday school, and all religious gatherings, and in going to and from their respective market towns; that the portion of said road sought to be discontinued runs through farms owned by the said Mrs. Parker, Mrs. Taylor, and Eugene Edens; that the petition filed, requesting the discontinuance, did not comply with the law, in that only six of the signers of said petition were freeholders in the precinct through which that portion of the road sought to be discontinued runs; that the order abolishing said road is void, because no notice was given of the application to discontinue the same as required by statute; that the commissioners' court in attempting to discontinue and abolish said road further failed to comply with the statute, in that said court failed to open a new road connecting that part of the road not discontinued; that plaintiffs, by proper motion, since the making of the order discontinuing said road, and filed during the term of the court at which said order was entered, stated the facts to the commissioners' court, and requested that said order be set aside and a hearing of the matter granted to plaintiffs, to the end that they have an opportunity to show why said road should not be discontinued, but that said court arbitrarily refused to pass upon said motion, and arbitrarily and fraudulently refused to hear any evidence which would lead to a disclosure of the true facts in connection with the discontinuance of said road, and which would have shown that it was not to the interest of the public to have said road discontinued; that the action of the commissioners' court in making the order discontinuing the road was a gross abuse of the authority and discretion lodged in it by the Constitution and laws of the state, was arbitrary, and in total disregard of the property rights of the plaintiffs.

The plaintiffs further alleged "that the discontinuance of the road in question had and would cause each and all of the plaintiffs to suffer special injury thereby, as distinguished from the injury suffered by the public in general, in this: That they were all property owners in the neighborhood of said road, and in the school district through which said road runs; that the abolition of the road would decrease the rental value of their land 50 cents per acre, and would affect its market value 50 cents per acre or more; that it would preclude them from securing good tenants to cultivate their land, and would make the route to market, church, school, post office, etc., much longer and more difficult, and would affect materially the market value of their land, at least to the extent alleged." They also alleged the number of acres owned by each plaintiff. They did not allege specifically that either of them lived upon or owned land abutting on that portion of the road discontinued by the order of the commissioners' court.

The defendants answered by a general demurrer and a general denial.

The case was tried with the aid of a jury, and in response to questions propounded by the court the jury found (1) that the strip of land across the tract of land owned by the appellants Edens, Taylor, and Parker, which was by an order of the commissioners' court of Hill county discontinued as a part of the Eureka Tap road, had been used by the public of that community continuously, uninterruptedly, and adversely as a roadway for a period of 10 years consecutively since 1889, and prior to the date of said order closing the same, and that the road in question was a public highway by prescription; (2) that the permanent closing of said road would cause a depreciation in the market value of the lands owned by plaintiffs, and that it would depreciate the value of the lands of certain named plaintiffs more than it would the value of the lands owned by other plaintiffs, and cause them to suffer damages not suffered by the public generally; (3) that notice of the application to discontinue the road was posted at the courthouse door of Hill county for about 20 days and in two public places in the vicinity of the road for about 10 days; (4) that the distance between the point of beginning and the point of destination of the road in question was not shortened by the discontinuance of that portion of the road involved in this suit by the order of the commissioners' court; (5) that the commissioners' court did not make a full investigation of the proposed change of the road before ordering the change, but acted arbitrarily and without substantial cause or reason for changing the road; (6) that the public interest would not be better served by the discontinuance of the road; (7) that seven of the signers of the application filed with the commissioners' court for the discontinuance of the road were residents of commissioners' precinct No. 4 and twelve of them owned land lying in that precinct. The evidence, it seems, was insufficient to authorize a finding that the road in question had been dedicated to public use, or that the same had been established as a public road by action of the commissioners' court, and these issues tendered by the plaintiffs' pleadings were eliminated by the court's charge. Upon the findings of the jury, however, upon the issues submitted, judgment was entered perpetuating the injunction theretofore granted and enjoining the members of the commissioners' court of Hill county from executing and enforcing the order discontinuing the road in question, and enjoining and restraining the defendants Edens, Taylor, and Parker from obstructing or closing up said road. From the judgment thus entered the defendants appealed.

[1] The first assignment of error complains of the court's refusal to submit the following issue requested by appellants: "Has the county, or any one acting for it, ever asserted any right to the use of the land in question for a public road adverse to the rights and title of the owner of said land? If such right referred to in the foregoing question was ever asserted, then answer when it was so asserted." The propositions contended for under this assignment, in substance, are (1) that, unless Hill county or some one acting for it asserted the right to use the land in question for a public road adverse to the rights and title of the owner, said land could not be impressed with the character of a public road; (2) that the court having submitted the case on special issues, and having failed to submit to the jury the question as to whether or not the public authorities of Hill county had adopted the road involved and the submission of such issue having been requested, it was error for the court to refuse to submit it; (3) that the appellees, being private parties, could not force upon the public authorities a road with the incidental burdens of repair and maintenance without the assent of the properly constituted authorities, and such assent could not be inferred from long continued use by the public. The correctness of the second and third of the propositions clearly depends upon the correctness of the first, and, if the first does not state the law correctly, it follows as a matter of course that the second and third are without merit. The question for decision then is, Was it essential to the right of the plaintiffs to maintain this suit and obtain the relief sought, that it be made to appear that the commissioners' court of Hill county had laid out and established the road in question as a public road, or had in some manner recognized it as a public highway? This question has been answered in the negative by this court in the case of Evans v. Scott, 37 Tex. Civ. App. 373, 83 S. W. 874. In that case it is said: "The public's right of prescription to a highway is not dependent upon the recognition of that right by the municipal authorities of the county, but is acquired by adverse use for the time and in the manner prescribed by the rules of law." This we think is the correct view of the law. It is well settled that a public highway may be created in three separate and distinct ways, namely, by dedication by the owners of the fee, either express or implied, "by long use by the public, carried on in such a manner and persisted in for such a length of time as to give a right by prescription or limitation," by being laid out and established by the municipal authorities in the manner prescribed by statute. An implied dedication arises by operation of law from the acts of the owner, and is founded on the doctrine of equitable estoppel, and it is essential in such case that the owner intended to set the land apart to the use and benefit of the public. A right by prescription rests upon the presumption that the owner of the land has granted the easement, and that the grant has been lost. It is not necessary in the latter case to show intent on the part of the owner of the land to set apart the road to public use, and the element of acceptance is not involved. Adverse use of the road for the length of time required by the public is the foundation upon which the claim rests. This use must have continued uninterrupted under adverse claim of right for the full prescriptive period, which in this state is 10 years. Evans v. Scott, supra, and authorities cited. Again: "If the public by a prescriptive use, has acquired the right, which may ripen into control by the county, it inures to all who may have had an interest in maintaining the road." Hall v. City of Austin, 20 Tex. Civ. App. 59, 48 S. W. 53. Under appropriate instructions, the jury found that the road in question had become a public road by prescription, and had the issue requested by appellants been submitted, and, had the jury found that the road had not been recognized by the commissioners' court of Hill county in any way as a public road, still the plaintiffs, if otherwise entitled to recover, would have been entitled to the judgment rendered. It follows that neither of appellants' propositions can be maintained, and that the assignment under consideration should be overruled.

[2] The second assignment of error complains of the court's refusal to give the following special charge requested by the defendants: "Plaintiffs by their pleading claim that the road in question is a part of the Eureka Tap road. Unless you believe from a preponderance of the evidence that the road in question is a part of the Eureka Tap road, you cannot under any circumstances find it to be a public road." This charge was properly refused. The proof was not materially variant from the allegations. The road is described in plaintiffs' petition as "what is known as the Eureka Tap road situated in commissioners' precinct No. 4, * * * and especially that part extending from the Grandview and Hillsboro road to the Itasca and Hillsboro road running through the farms of Mrs. E. Parker and Ernest Parker, Mrs. Maggie Taylor, and Eugene Edens." The evidence, as we understand it, without conflict shows that the road directed to be closed by the order of the commissioners' court is a part of what is known as the Eureka Tap road. It was so described by appellant Edens in both his testimony and in the notice to close the road which he says he posted before applying to the commissioners for an order to close the road. Thus the road in question was both in the pleadings and in the evidence described to be "what is known as a part of the Eureka Tap road," running through the farms of Mrs. E. Parker and Ernest Parker, Mrs. Maggie Taylor, and Eugene Edens, and, even though it was not in fact a part of the Eureka Tap road as actually laid out by the commissioners' court of Hill county, yet it was as alleged, known as a part of that road, and its identity was by both the pleadings and evidence sufficiently established. Echols v. Jacobs Mfg. Co., 38 Tex. Civ. App. 65, 84 S. W. 1082. It was not essential, as we have held, to plaintiffs' right to recover upon the theory that the road had become a public road by prescription, that the commissioners' court had recognized it as such.

It is assigned that the trial court erred in refusing to instruct the jury at defendants' request to return a verdict in their favor. The propositions advanced under this assignment are (1) "appellees having alleged that the discontinued road was a part of the 'Eureka Tap road,' and it appearing from the evidence that the 'Eureka Tap road' was a second-class road, and that it did not extend to nor cover the part of the road, the discontinuance of which is complained of, but that the east end of the said Eureka Tap road was at a point about one-fourth of a mile west of the land through which the road in controversy ran and the proof failing to sustain the allegations, a peremptory instruction should have been given"; (2) "that it appearing that the Eureka Tap road was a second-class road, and that the road in question by reason of the obstructions thereon, gates, and fences across it, could not have been a second-class road, and, it appearing without dispute that it had never been adopted by the county authorities as a part of the Eureka Tap road or otherwise, the evidence failed to sustain the allegations, and peremptory instructions should have been given." Both of the questions raised under this assignment have been decided adversely to appellants' contention in disposing of the assignments already discussed, and need not be further considered. What has been said disposes also of appellants' fourth assignment.

Appellants' fifth assignment of error will also be overruled. The evidence was amply sufficient to authorize and sustain the findings of the jury, which have been stated in a former part of this opinion, and the judgment based thereon is not contrary to law.

The judgment of the district court is therefore affirmed.

MAY v. ANTHONY.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Dallas.
Nov. 23, 1912.)

1. TRIAL (§ 191*)—INSTRUCTIONS—INSTRUCTIONS ASSUMING FACTS.

Rev. St. 1911, art. 1971, directs that the trial court shall submit all issues of fact to the jury. In an action for conversion, where the evidence was conflicting whether plaintiff tendered the proper amount due under an agreement by which defendant had possession of the property, a special instruction that if, when plaintiff tendered defendant $40, the defendant had already converted the property, so that he could not return it, plaintiff was entitled to recover, was erroneous as withdrawing from the jury the issue whether plaintiff had tendered the amount required by the agreement.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 420-431, 435; Dec. Dig. § 191.*]

2. TRIAL (§ 191*)—INSTRUCTIONS—ASSUMING FACTS.

In an action of conversion, where the evidence whether defendant, prior to plaintiff's tender, had sold all or some of the property was conflicting, a charge that if defendant, at the time of such tender, had sold or converted the property and could not by reason of his acts return it, plaintiff was entitled to damages, was erroneous in that it assumed that defendant "by reason of his acts" was liable for all the property in the event he had sold any part of it, although the amount tendered was insufficient.

[Ed. Note.—For other case, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 420-431, 435; Dec. Dig. § 191.*]

3. BAILMENT (§ 16*)—CONVERSION BY BAILEE.

Where defendant was in lawful possession of property and entitled to hold it until a certain payment was made by plaintiff, there could be no conversion until the correct amount was tendered and paid.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bailment, Cent. Dig. §§ 67-74; Dec. Dig. § 16.*]

4. TROVER AND CONVERSION (§ 34*)—PLEADING—ISSUES, PROOF, AND VARIANCE.

Where the petition in an action for conversion charged that plaintiff was the owner of the property, and that the defendant on or about May 10, 1909, unlawfully converted it to his own use, proof of conversion in June, 1910, or August, 1910, was a fatal variance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trover and Conversion, Cent. Dig. §§ 207-214; Dec. Dig. § 34.*]

5. PLEADING (§ 162*)—SUPPLEMENTAL PETITION—PURPOSE.

The only purpose of a supplemental petition is to allege new facts in reply to those alleged by the defendant in his pleading.

[Ed. Note.—For other case, see Pleading, Dec. Dig. § 162.*]

6. PLEADING (§ 162*)—AMENDED PETITION—PURPOSE.

The purpose of an amendment to a petition is to add something or to withdraw something from what has been properly pleaded, so as to remedy a defect or correct an erroneous statement; and, where plaintiff intended to correct the date of an alleged conversion, it should have been done by amendment of his original petition and not by supplemental petition.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Dec. Dig. § 162.*]

Appeal from Hill County Court; J. C. Lumpkins, Judge.

Action by F. Anthony against John May. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded for new trial.

W. H. Brown, of Ennis, and Supple & Harding, of Waxahachie, for appellant. T. H. Collier, of Ennis, and Will Hancock and Tom Whipple, both of Waxahachie, for appellee.

RASBURY, J. Appellee sued appellant in the trial court for the conversion of certain butcher's tools and fixtures, alleged to have been converted by appellant on or about May 10, 1909, and claimed to be of the reasonable fair cash market value of $587.50. For answer the appellant, in effect, pleaded that appellee rented from him a storehouse in Ennis for the year 1909, agreeing to pay therefor $25 per month in advance, to be used by appellee as a butcher's shop, who went in possession of the storehouse under said agreement and remained there until April 10, 1909, at which time he abandoned the premises and commenced removing the property alleged to be converted therefrom, notwithstanding he was then due appellant one month's rent and was bound as well for the balance of the term, whereupon appellant procured the issuance of a distress warrant and levied same upon said property, but that a few days thereafter the parties agreed that appellant should withdraw the proceedings and appellee should pay the rent then due and appellant should retain the property levied upon until appellee had adjusted all rents due under the lease, including all costs and expenses incident to the distress proceedings, appellant to re-rent the premises to the best advantage until final adjustment for the benefit of appellee. Appellant further alleged that he observed said agreement in good faith, and that at the time he was sued for conversion after allowing appellee for all sums collected by him as rents and charging him with all expenses and costs, appellee was due appellant $110, and until said sum was paid he was entitled to possession of said property and had a contract lien thereon as well as the landlord's lien. The appellee in response to appellant's answer by supplemental petition admitted, in effect, the agreement alleged by appellant, except as to payment of costs and expenses incurred by appellant, and charged that on August 1, 1910, he was due appellant only $40, which amount was on said date tendered to appellant and possession of his property demanded, which sum of money appellant declined, and at the same time refused to deliver to appellee his said property. The foregoing, in our view of the case, is a sufficient statement of the pleading, although other incidental matters were raised by the pleading. The case was tried before a jury and verdict was for appellee.

From an inspection of the record it appears to be undisputed that appellee leased from appellant for the year 1909 a storehouse in the town of Ennis, and after moving therein was preparing to abandon same and remove his property therefrom, when the appellant, on April 10, 1909, levied a distress warrant upon the property, asserting against same the landlord's lien as security for the payment of his rent for the unexpired term; that a few days subsequent thereto appellant and appellee agreed upon an adjustment of their affairs, whereby appellee delivered the property so levied upon to appellant to be held by him until he had received the full amount of rent agreed to be paid by appellee for the year 1909, either at the hands of appellee or from money derived from re-renting same to other persons.

The main issue in the case on the trial was the fact of conversion and incidentally, the time of the same, if any there was. As to whether there was a conversion of the property by appellant or a mere holding of the same under the agreement with appellee depended wholly upon the amount actually due appellant by appellee upon his rent contract at the time he claims he tendered appellant all the rent due him and demanded his property and at which time appellant refused the amount tendered, claiming the amount was insufficient, and refused to deliver appellee his said property.

The material testimony bearing upon those issues is as follows: Arch Busby testified that on June 6, 1910, appellee tendered appellant $40, claiming same was all he owed him, which was refused by appellant, who claimed there was due him $125 for rent, costs, and attorney's fees, and refused to deliver possession of the property unless said amount was paid. Charley Jeffers testified that appellant told him on June 18, 1910, to tell appellee that unless he removed the ice box from his storehouse he would throw same into the street, etc.; that he went with appellee for said purpose, and they were prevented from doing so by appellant after having loaded a portion of the same. Appellee, Anthony, testified that he expected appellant to hold his property until all the rent for 1909 was paid; admitted removing a portion of the property in January, 1910. Also testified that in company with the witness Jeffers he tendered appellant $40, being all he owed, which was declined and possession of his property refused him. He does not testify when the tender was made, unless it may be inferred that he did so on the date testified to by Jeffers. Appellant, May, testified that under the agreement appellee was to pay all rent, expenses, and costs of suit, and that at the time of the tender appellee was due him $110, of which amount $85 was for rent and the balance represented costs and attorney's fees incurred in the distress proceeding. Appellant based his conclusions as to what was due largely upon his books. Appellee based his conclusions upon what he had paid and information secured as to moneys collected by appellant from tenants.

[1] The pleading and the testimony standing as we have indicated, the court by its main charge, after reciting the agreement under which appellant held the property, told the jury: "And (if) you further believe * * * that at any time subsequent thereto plaintiff paid such amounts, if any, as were agreed between them was due to defendant, or if you believe that plaintiff tendered $40 to defendant on August 10, 1910, and that same, if accepted, would have satisfied the indebtedness then due by plaintiff to defendant under their former agreements, if any, * * * and defendant failed and refused to deliver the property of plaintiff held by him, then he would be guilty of converting such property so held, if any, and you will find for plaintiff such damages, if any, as he may have suffered thereby," etc.

At the request of the appellee the trial court supplemented its main charge and further told the jury: "If you believe from the evidence that defendant, John May, at the time plaintiff made to him a tender of $40, if he did, had already sold all or some of the property or converted the same * * * and could not by reason of his acts return the property, * * * then you will find for the plaintiff his damages as shown by the evidence, and, if such damages exceed the amount due as rents, you will find for the plaintiff such excess. * * *

The giving of this special charge is assigned as error. In our opinion the charge was probably misleading in that it assumed the correctness of the appellee's version of a sharply controverted fact, to wit, the amount of rent due by appellee. A fair analysis of the special charge is that the jury were told that, if the appellant had converted some or all of the property at the time appellee offered to pay $40, then a judgment should follow for the appellee, while under the pleading and evidence the jury were not entitled to allow any sum in damages until it had first determined if appellee had tendered the correct amount of rent, and that question was in sharp conflict; the appellee contending that he only owed $40, and the appellant maintaining he owed $110. The effect of the special charge was to destroy the force and effect of that portion of the main charge that told the jury there could be no conversion of the property unless the sum tendered by appellee "would have satisfied the indebtedness then due by plaintiff under their former agreement." Article 1971, R. S. 1911, is mandatory, and, among other matters, directs that the trial judge "shall submit all controverted questions of fact solely to the decision of the jury." Orange Lumber Co. v. Thompson, 113 S. W. 565.

[2] We are further of opinion that the second objection to said special charge is correct. One of the incidental questions in the case was whether or not appellant had prior to the tender of the $40 sold all or some of the property; the testimony in that connection being sharply conflicting and tending to show from the appellant's standpoint that the property was intact, except that claimed to have been removed by the appellee. As applied to this feature of the suit, the charge clearly assumes that appellant "by reason of his acts" is liable for all said property in the event he has sold any one of the articles and makes him liable, even though the amount tendered was insufficient.

[3] Appellant was in lawful possession of the property and entitled to hold same until his rent was paid, and it seems to us there could not be a conversion until the correct amount of rent was tendered. In truth, it would seem that appellee could never be in a position to sue for conversion under the facts in the record until the rent was paid, and any instruction from the court permitting a recovery otherwise would be error; and the jury should have been told that they must first find the correct amount had been tendered before considering other matters which might under a different state of facts alone constitute conversion.

[4] We are also of opinion that the court erred in instructing the jury to find for appellee if in their opinion the appellant converted said property at any time subsequent to the agreement made between the parties, or at any time appellee might be able to show he had tendered the amount of rent due. While our rules of pleading and practice are almost as broad as any occasion may demand at the same time for reasons that are elementary, there must be at least certainty and definiteness. The petition charged that appellant was the owner of the property, etc., and "that the defendant on or about the 10th day of May, 1909, unlawfully and willfully took possession of said property" and converted same to his own use. It seems to us that proof of conversion in June, 1910, the time when Arch Busby testified the tender was made, or in August, 1910, when the pleading alleged the tender was actually made, are both too far removed from "on or about the 10th day of May, 1909," to afford a basis for the entry of a judgment upon the pleading in this case.

[5, 6] The most we care to say in reference to the appellant's first assignment of error is that appellant is, of course, correct in asserting that the only purpose of a supplemental petition is the allegation of new facts not before alleged in reply to those alleged by the defendant in his pleading. And in that connection it is not improper for us to pursue the subject and say that the purpose of an amendment to the petition is to add something to or withdraw something from that which has been previously pleaded, so as to perfect that which is or may be deficient or to correct that which has been incorrectly stated. And it would follow, under these rules, that, if appellee intended to correct the date of the alleged conversion, it should have been done by an amendment of his original petition and would have been improper in a supplemental petition.

We have carefully examined the other assignments of error, and we find nothing complained of therein that will not probably be corrected on another trial.

Because of the errors indicated, the judgment of the trial court is reversed, and the cause remanded for another trial.

1. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§ 86*)—PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Const. art. 16, § 37, declaring that materialmen shall have a lien upon the buildings for material furnished, and the statutes enacted in pursuance of it, fix the lien only on the land and buildings, and not upon any money in the hands of the owner; the giving of notice by a materialman to the trustees of a school district of a claim for materials for a school building gives no lien on or priority of rights in the building fund remaining in the hands of the trustees.

Where the court, in determining the priorities between two transfers from a fund of the same date, in its judgment states that one of them should be paid in full before the other, but made no affirmative finding as to actual priority, there being no statement of facts in the record, the judgment will be sustained; it being presumed that the court had facts before it to support the priority adjudged.

Appeal from District Court, Grayson County; B. L. Jones, Judge.

Action by the A. A. Fielder Lumber Company against Nelle Snyder Smith and others. From a judgment against Nelle Smith and her husband declaring priorities against a certain fund, the Fielder Lumber Company and others appeal. Affirmed in part, and reversed and rendered in part.

Head, Smith, Hare & Head, J. H. Wood, and J. T. Cunningham, all of Sherman, and Holloway & Holloway, of Dallas, for appellants. McReynolds & Hay and Abney & Hassell, all of Sherman, and Edward P. Dougherty, of Dallas, for appellees.

RASBURY, J. Nelle Snyder Smith and her husband, B. L. Smith, contracted with the school trustees of Van Alstyne independent school district of Grayson county to furnish all material and labor necessary to build and complete a public school building in the town of Van Alstyne according to certain plans and specifications prepared by John Tulloch, architect, and under his supervision. The consideration to be paid the contractors was $11,000, payments upon which amount were to be made every two weeks upon estimates of the architect, as the work progressed. During the progress of the work the appellant Fielder Lumber Company filed suit in the district court against Nelle S. Smith and B. L. Smith, and against Messrs. McKinney, Howle, Henderson, Umphress, Cartwright, Sheridan, and McDonough, trustees of the public schools of Van Alstyne. The Van Alstyne Lumber Company, W. F. Barnett, Mosher Manufacturing Company, Continental State Bank, and Palmer Pressed Brick Works were also made defendants. J. G. Knapple and M. F. Dougherty & Son intervened in the suit. Appellant Fielder Lumber Company alleged that it sold and delivered to Nelle S. Smith and B. L. Smith certain lumber and building material upon which there was a balance due of $2,335.08, which was used by them in constructing a school building owned by the trustees of the public schools of the town of Van Alstyne; also alleged that, within the time and manner provided by law, it fixed and secured the statutory materialman's lien on said school building and the lot of land upon which it stood, at which time there was in the hands of the trustees $2,200 to be used in the construction of said building, and sought appropriate relief by foreclosure and sale or a direction by the court to the school trustees to pay the debt from the funds in their possession belonging to said Smiths, and asserted that, if not entitled to the materialman's lien, it was in equity entitled to payment from the funds because of the notice given and the material furnished. The school trustees answered admitting the contract with the Smiths, disputed the legal right of Fielder Lumber Company to fix a lien on the school building since by law such lien was void as against public policy, claimed that all money due on the contract had been paid to the contractors except $2,138, which was by the contract reserved until final completion and acceptance of the building by the architect; that the other defendants and the interveners were claiming prior and superior rights to the fund, and that they were unable to determine to whom payment should be made; they tendered the money in their possession into court, and asked that it be paid to whomever was entitled thereto. Appellant Palmer Pressed Brick Works, in like manner with appellant Fielder Lumber Company, established, within the time and manner provided by law, the statutory materialman's lien on the school building and land, and asserted as well a superior equitable lien upon the funds in the hands of the trustees independent of the statutory lien based upon notice to the trustees of the furnishing of material with which to construct said building.

We shall not attempt to give in detail the pleadings of the other defendants and interveners for the reason that no issue is made upon the sufficiency thereof. Their claims to the fund in the hands of the trustees rest upon assignments from the contractors properly urged in their pleading. The case was tried without the intervention of a jury, and the case is here upon findings of fact and conclusions of law prepared by the trial judge. By its decree the trial court entered judgment in favor of all parties to this appeal against B. L. Smith for the amounts of their respective claims. The school trustees were directed to retain from the fund in their hands $202 with which to complete the building, and to pay the balance of $1,936 into the registry of the court. The court further decreed that appellants Fielder Lumber Company and Palmer Pressed Brick Works acquired no lien either upon the school building and land or the fund in the hands of the trustees, and that the assignment given Mosher Manufacturing Company was insufficient in law to constitute a transfer or assignment of part of the fund due the contractors or create any interest therein. The money tendered into court was directed to be paid as hereafter shown and to the exclusion of any participation therein by appellants, Fielder Lumber Company, Palmer Pressed Brick Works, and Mosher Manufacturing Company. From that judgment, the last three named have appealed.

It would consume too much time to consider separately the counter propositions of each appellee to the propositions of appellants, Fielder Lumber Company, Palmer Pressed Brick Works, and Mosher Manufacturing Company, and we shall not attempt to do so, but content ourselves by a careful consideration of each. This brings us to a consideration of the proposition asserted by appellant Fielder Lumber Company under its first assignment of error; and that of the Palmer Pressed Brick Works asserted, under its second assignment of error, that giving notice of their accounts to the school trustees and filing same for record with the county clerk as required by article 5623, Rev. Civ. St. 1911 (being the notice provided to be given as a preliminary to fixing the statutory materialman's lien), had the effect to garnish the unincumbered and unexpended funds in the hands of the school trustees, and subjected same to the payment of appellant's debts. In the well-prepared and excellent brief of counsel for appellant Fielder Lumber Company, it is conceded that, by statute and decision, liens for material, labor, etc., are not permitted to be established against the state's public buildings. The reason and policy of this rule is too well known to require a discussion of the same by us, and we content ourselves by reference to the authorities quoted by counsel for appellant. Article 2845, R. S. 1911; Atascosa County v. Angus, 83 Tex. 202, 18 S. W. 563, 29 Am. St. Rep. 637; Dallas v. Loonie, 83 Tex. 291, 18 S. W. 726.

[1] But it is contended by counsel that section 37, art. 16, of the Constitution, which declares that " * * * materialmen of every class shall have a lien upon the buildings and articles made or repaired by them for * * * material furnished," evidences the intention of the framers of the Constitution to favor those creditors whose material goes into the actual construction of a building, and that hence, while the notice and subsequent proceedings were ineffectual to establish the statutory lien, in equity such notice was a garnishment of the fund and would give appellant's claim precedence over subsequent assignments by the contractors in the same manner that service of a statutory writ of garnishment would when such writs are available. We do not believe the statutes and decisions of our courts are susceptible of such a construction. It is true that the courts, in discussing and construing the statutory provisions enacted under article 16, § 37, of the Constitution, providing for the speedy and efficient enforcement of the lien provided for by the Constitution, have used the expression that such liens, when established in the manner provided by law, operate to garnish any money in the hands of the owner of the land and building. Nothing more, however, could be meant by such expression than that the owner of the building, in the event he paid out the money to some subsequent claimant, would be in a similar attitude that a defendant in statutory garnishment would be who paid out money to a subsequent claimant after service of the writ. We are confirmed in this conclusion by the fact that the mechanic's lien law fixes a lien, not upon any money in the hands of the owner of the building and land, but upon the land and building, and he may do with the fund as he pleases, subject to the right of the lienholder to be reimbursed by the owner to the amount of his claim or the extent of the fund in the hands of the owner on a foreclosure of his lien and a sale of the property. Texas Builders' Supply Co. v. National Loan & Inv. Co., 22 Tex. Civ. App. 349, 54 S. W. 1059; Fullenwider v. Longmoor, 73 Tex. 480, 11 S. W. 500. We think the most that can be claimed under the steps taken by appellants Fielder Lumber Company and Palmer Pressed Brick Works, since a lien cannot be established against the school land and buildings, is that the trustees of the school had actual notice that the contractors owed them for material which went into the building at a time when the trustees had funds in their possession due the contractors. But in our opinion such facts do not establish any right in appellants whatever to the fund, legal or equitable. We agree that in this case the situation is difficult and unequal for appellants, but the correction lies with the Legislature rather than with the courts. Herring-Hall-Marvin Co. v. Kroeger et al., 23 Tex. Civ. App. 672, 57 S. W. 980. What we have said above disposes of the right of appellants Fielder Lumber Company and Palmer Pressed Brick Company to any priority of right to the fund in the hands of the trustees. We will discuss the other propositions raised by these parties in discussing the appeal of Mosher Manufacturing Company.

[2] The trial court, after adversely disposing of the claims of the appellants Fielder Lumber Company and Palmer Pressed Brick Company, found as a fact that the contractors had executed the following assignments against the funds in the hands of the trustees:

"In consideration of the sum of one dollar, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, and the further consideration herein-after mentioned, we have hereby assigned, transferred and set over, and by these presents do assign, transfer and set over unto the Continental State Bank of Van Alstyne, Texas, all moneys due or to grow due under and by virtue of a certain contract or contracts or agreements heretofore made and entered into on the sixteenth day of September, 1909, by and between Nellie Snyder Smith and B. L. Smith of Dallas, Texas, of the first part, and the board of school trustees of the Van Alstyne independent schools, parties of the second part, for the erection and completion of a school building in the town of Van Alstyne, Texas, under the supervision of John Tulloch of Sherman, Texas, by the said party of the first part for the sum of eleven thousand dollars, on original contract and subsequent contracts for additional work and changes at a cost of sixteen hundred and ninety-five dollars, making a total of $12,695.00, to be paid out by the board of trustees upon order of John Tulloch according to the terms of said contracts or agreements. Provided that this assignment shall be constructed to convey our final estimate or payment which according to the terms of said contract shall be paid upon completion of the building according to the terms thereof and shall be 20 per cent. of the total sum of $12,695.00, or $2,539.00. And we hereby make, constitute and appoint the said Continental State Bank, or the president or cashier thereof, our true and lawful attorney, irrevocable in our name, place and stead, but for its own use to ask, demand, sue, attach, levy, compromise, recover and receive all such sum or sums of money that are now or may hereafter become due, owing or payable for or on account of the debt and demands above assigned, and due receipts thereof to be given in our name or otherwise. The foregoing assignment is intended however to secure the Continental State Bank for money advanced to Nellie Snyder Smith, to meet pay-roll expenses, in the sum of eight hundred ($800.00) dollars, as evidenced by one certain note bearing even date herewith for said amount and due in thirty days from date and for any renewals or extensions of said note, or other moneys advanced, whether evidenced by note, overdraft or otherwise, though not herein particularly mentioned. In witness whereof we have hereto set our hands and seal this 29th day of January, 1910. Nellie Snyder Smith. B. L. Smith."

Mrs. Nellie Snyder Smith in Account with Mosher Manufacturing Company.

Oct. 29. Mdse. $250 00
Nov. 23. Mdse. 4 00
————— $254.

"Dallas, Texas, Feb. 4, 1910. Mr. John Tulloch, Arch't. Sherman, Texas—Please pay to Mosher Manufacturing Co. the sum of two hundred and fifty-four dollars ($254.00) account iron in Van Alstyne school buildings and charge same to my account, and oblige, Yours truly, Mrs. Nellie Snyder Smith."

On February 21, 1910, said document was filed with G. T. McDonough, secretary of said school board, who executed a receipt therefor in words as follows: "Van Alstyne, Texas, Feb. 21, 1910. Received of Mosher Manufacturing Company an order for the sum of $254.00 to be paid out of any funds belonging to Nellie Snyder Smith in the hands of the school board of the Van Alstyne independent school district. G. T. McDonough, Secy. School Board."

As bearing on the Mosher order, the court also found as facts that the school building was being constructed under supervision of John Tulloch, architect, upon plans and specifications prepared by him; that the contract price was to be paid every two weeks during progress of the work for labor and material acceptable to the architect and upon his estimates; that Nellie Snyder Smith, acting for herself and her husband, incurred the Mosher debt; and that it was for material used in the construction of the school building. The trial judge also found from the testimony in reference to the claim of J. G. Knapple as follows: "On February 12, 1910, said Nellie Snyder Smith executed and delivered to J. G. Knapple an order, addressed to G. T. McDonough, directing and requesting him to pay said Knapple the sum of $275 out of the amounts due or to become due the contractors in connection with said contract, which order was left on the desk of G. T. McDonough by said J. G. Knapple on February 12, 1910, but has been lost. Said McDonough did not accept or agree to pay said amount, and had no authority to do so, and never saw it, and had no knowledge of it. The defendant B. L. Smith did not sign said order or have actual knowledge of its execution." The findings of fact of the trial judge as to the claim of W. F. Barnett is as follows: "On February 12, 1910, the defendants Nellie Snyder Smith and B. L. Smith were without funds and unable to meet their pay roll and pay laborers employed in the erection of said building, and on said date, after the attempt of the said Fielder Lumber Company to establish a lien thereon, the defendant Nellie Snyder Smith entered into an agreement with the defendant W. F. Barnett, whereby he agreed to advance and furnish money from time to time to pay for labor employed on said building and to meet the weekly pay roll of said contractors, and to induce said Barnett to make such advancements. The said Nellie Snyder Smith expressly agreed that he should be repaid and reimbursed for the amount so advanced out of the amount due and to become due said contractors by said school trustees for the erection of said school building; and the defendant Nellie Snyder Smith then and there verbally agreed that the amounts so advanced and to be advanced by said Barnett should be repaid out of said fund. That B. L. Smith and Nellie S. Smith are both insolvent, and were at the time."

In relation to the sufficiency and priority of the transfers and orders herein set out, the court by its judgment allowed, first, the claim of the Continental State Bank and directed it should be paid in full out of the fund; second, the claim of J. G. Knapple, and ordered it paid in full after the claim of the bank; third, the claim of Barnett and ordered it paid in full after payment of claim of Knapple. The Mosher claim was not allowed for the reasons stated. If allowed, however, it would have been the second order given in point of time. The payment of these claims, as allowed, exhausted the fund. In discussing the issues between those holding assignments of the fund and the issues raised by appellants in that respect, it is impracticable to discuss each assignment, since many similar assignments are contained in the five or six briefs on file. It may be said, however, that the issue is made (1) that the assignment to Continental State Bank is ineffectual because it shows that it was given to secure payment of a debt and is not a transfer of part of a particular fund, but in the nature of a chattel mortgage, and without force unless registered as such; (2) that Nellie Snyder Smith, being a married woman, was without authority to make the assignments to Knapple and Mosher Manufacturing Company; (3) that the alleged oral assignment to Barnett was but a promise to assign, and hence ineffectual; (4) that the assignment to Mosher Manufacturing Company did in law constitute an equitable assignment and was enforceable as such.

Discussing the issues above outlined in reverse order, we come to the claim of appellant Mosher Manufacturing Company, which was disallowed by the court for the reason that the same was insufficient in law; meaning, of course, that the Mosher transfer or order did not contain all the elements or the elements necessary to constitute, in law, an equitable assignment of any interest the contractors had in the fund due them by the school trustees. The law of equitable assignment is no longer an open question in this state, the question having been reviewed repeatedly by our Courts of Civil Appeals and Supreme Court; but as a result of varying facts in nearly every case involving the doctrine, due to the impossibility of observing in the hurry of business affairs the niceties and formalities of contracts drawn by those trained in legal matters, the question continues to arise, and the difficulty lies rather in the true construction to be put upon the order than the legal principle applicable in a given case. In the leading case of Harris County v. Campbell, 68 Tex. 27, 3 S. W. 246, 2 Am. St. Rep. 467, it is said: "It now seems to be held, by the great weight of authority, that an assignment of a part of a chose in action for a valuable consideration is good in equity, and that it may be made either by direct transfer or by an order drawn upon the particular fund." As to what will constitute a sufficient designation of the particular fund, coupled with the intention to appropriate part thereof to the use of another, is necessarily susceptible of no general rule, and in this respect each case must be determined on the particular facts developed. In the case at bar, it is maintained that the Mosher order is insufficient because not payable out of any particular fund, and because not addressed to the proper custodian of the fund. We are unable to see, as between the parties, and while the fund is yet in the hands of the holder, that it is material to whom the order may be directed, if it clearly shows, as we have just said, an intention to appropriate a part of the particular fund to the use of another. Undoubtedly a valid and enforceable transfer could be made of the fund or a portion thereof, without the necessity of directing the order to any person. While good reason can be seen in the case at bar from addressing the order to Tulloch, who was the supervising architect of the building, and in a general sense the agent of the school trustees, and upon whose certificate alone estimates for the work done upon the building were paid, yet conceding, for the sake of the argument, that he was not the holder of the fund, and that the order was improperly addressed, it nevertheless seems to us that such facts in no sense invalidated the order, if in other respects sufficient; that is to say, if, from the body of the order and the proven circumstances surrounding its execution, it can be definitely said that the contractors expressly or impliedly intended to appropriate to Mosher's use $254 of the money due them from the school trustees. And in this connection it is to be remembered that the question of notice is not involved, nor is any attempt made to hold the trustees for any greater amount than is admittedly due by them, leaving it a bare question of intention between Mosher and the contractors to be gathered from the order and the other testimony. The order is directed to John Tulloch, supervising architect for the trustees of the Van Alstyne school building, employed by the trustees as such and to prepare plans and specifications, and upon whose certificate estimates due under the contract were to be paid to the contractors. It directed him to pay to Mosher $254 "account iron in Van Alstyne school building," and the court found in its conclusions that the Mosher debt was for material used in constructing the school building. The order concludes with the request that same be charged "to my account." The account could hardly be construed to mean anything else than a reference to the account between the contractors and the school board, and meaning, of course, to charge the amount thereof up against the sum due the contractors; for while the record does show the contract between the school trustees and the contractors to construct the school building, and does show that Tulloch was the architect to supervise the work of the contractors and certify estimates, and does show, also that the iron for which the debt was due was used by the contractors in the school building, yet we are unable to find a single circumstance in the record or in the wording of the order indicating a contrary intention. In view of the facts and circumstances related above, and in deference to and approval of the decided tendency of our appellate court to sustain this character of transfer when it can be done without violence to the settled rules of evidence, we cannot escape the conclusion that it was the intention of the contractors, in giving said order, to appropriate to the use of Mosher the sum named therein out of any funds due the contractors by the school trustees, and that, as between the parties to this suit, it had that effect. Harris County v. Campbell, 68 Tex. 22, 3 S. W. 243, 2 Am. St. Rep. 467; Clark v. Gillespie, 70 Tex. 513, 8 S. W. 121; McBride v. Am. R. & L. Co., 127 S. W. 233; Stillson v. Stevens, 23 S. W. 322; Bellharz v. Illingsworth, 132 S. W. 106.

[3] What we have said in reference to the Mosher order meets the objection to the allowance of the Knapple order, which we understand is attacked because improperly directed to McDonough, secretary of the school board. In other respects the findings of the trial judge quoted herein establish the giving of a sufficient transfer by the contractors to Knapple and its subsequent loss by Knapple. The loss of the transfer could in no manner affect the validity or sufficiency of same, since it was but the evidence thereof.

[4] In connection with our conclusions in reference to the sufficiency of the Mosher transfer, it has been uniformly held in this state, all questions of notice and the legal sufficiency of the transfer aside, that such transfers shall rank in the order of their respective dates, and be satisfied in full accordingly, by which process the Mosher order displaces all the other orders other than the transfer to Continental State Bank. Olive v. San Antonio, B. S. Co., 27 S. W. 789; Henke & Pillott v. Keller et al., 50 Tex. Civ. App. 533, 110 S. W. 783; Harris County v. Campbell, supra.

As indicated in another place in this opinion, and as found by the court, the contractors, during the progress of the work, were without money with which to pay their labor. They secured sufficient money from Barnett to meet the expense of the laborers on the work, and in consideration thereof agreed orally that Barnett should be reimbursed for same out of the money they were to receive for constructing the school building. In evidence of such oral agreement, they subsequently executed a written transfer covering the original transaction. The claim is made that the oral agreement between Barnett and the contractors was in law no more than a promise to assign a part of the fund, and similar to the attempted assignment in Henke & Pillott v. Keller, supra.

[5] By the findings of the trial judge, the contractors agreed that Barnett should be repaid and reimbursed for the money he advanced out of the amount due, and to become due, from the school trustees, and then and there assigned to him orally sufficient of said fund to reimburse him for such advances. It does seem to us that the language of the court establishes and finds as clear cut an oral assignment as could be expected. When all essentials necessary to constitute an equitable assignment are proven to have been agreed to by the parties orally, such agreement is quite as effective as a written agreement, and it has been accordingly determined. Clark v. Gillespie, supra; Rollison v. Hope, 18 Tex. 446; Johnson v. Amarillo Imp. Co., 88 Tex. 510, 31 S. W. 503; Campbell v. Grant, 36 Tex. Civ. App. 641, 82 S. W. 794.

[6] Nellie Snyder Smith, wife of B. L. Smith, with the knowledge and consent of her husband, was in active charge of the work according to the findings of the trial judge; the legal effect of which was to constitute her his agent in all things pertaining thereto. Hence we overrule all the assignments of error raising her lack of authority to execute the transfers of the moneys due under the contract. Richburg v. Sherwood, 101 Tex. 10, 102 S. W. 906; Wetzel v. Simon, 87 Tex. 403, 28 S. W. 274, 942.

[7] The claim urged by appellant Palmer Pressed Brick Works that the assignment to Continental State Bank is a mortgage rather than an assignment is not, in our opinion, a fair construction of the instrument. The first and second clauses of the instrument clearly show a transfer of the money that will be due the contractors on their last estimate for work on the school building. The only language in the transfer that could be held to create a mortgage is the last clause, wherein it states the purpose of the transfer to be to secure payment of a note for $800; and, since the transfer at no other place states the actual consideration or purpose of same, we conclude the last clause was intended only to describe the debt the contractors intended to pay.

The case as to the appellants Fielder Lumber Company and Palmer Pressed Brick Works will be affirmed, and reversed and rendered as to appellant Mosher Manufacturing Company, with instructions to the lower court to reform its judgment so as to satisfy in full, out of the fund deposited in court by the school trustees, each of the transfers given by the contractors in the order of their dates, which is first the claim of Continental State Bank, second, the claim of Mosher Manufacturing Company. The claims of Knapple and Barnett, so far as the record discloses, being given simultaneously, the balance of said fund, after paying the bank and Mosher, shall be apportioned between them; each to receive that portion or percentage of the remaining part of the fund that his judgment bears to the whole thereof, based upon the amount found to be due by the trial court. In all other respects the judgment of the court is affirmed.

Affirmed in part; reversed and rendered in part.

On Rehearing.

Appellee Knapple in his motion for rehearing urges that we erred in directing that, after payment in full of the claims of Continental State Bank and Mosher Manufacturing Company, the balance of the fund in controversy should be apportioned between him and appellee Barnett, and in this contention we concede he is correct. The trial court found as a fact that the transfers to Knapple and Barnett were both executed February 12, 1910, as stated in our opinion, but made no affirmative finding as to actual priority.

[8] The trial court did, however, direct in the judgment below that Knapple should be first paid in full before any sum should be paid to Barnett. There is no statement of facts in the record, and it is the well-settled rule in such cases that, in order to sustain the judgment of the trial court, we shall presume the court had before it facts sufficient to support its judgment, or, in the case at bar, the priority of the Knapple claim, although omitted from the court's finding. Ellis v. National Exchange Bank, 38 Tex. Civ. App. 619, 86 S. W. 776; Jarrell v. Sproles, 20 Tex. Civ. App. 387, 49 S. W. 904; Malone v. Fisher, 71 S. W. 996; Drake v. Davidson, 28 Tex. Civ. App. 184, 66 S. W. 889; Maes v. Thomas, 140 S. W. 846.

It is accordingly ordered that the judgment be reformed, and the court below, in accordance with the view here expressed, be directed that, after payment in full of the claims of Continental State Bank and Mosher Manufacturing Company, the claim of appellee Knapple be next paid in full, if there be sufficient funds; any balance to be applied to the claim of said Barnett.

COMMONWEALTH FIRE INS. CO. v. OBENCHAIN et al.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. San Antonio. Nov. 6, 1912. Rehearing Denied Dec. 4, 1912.)

1. MORTGAGES (§ 480*)—FORECLOSURE—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—PAYMENT.

In an action to foreclose a deed of trust, in which defendant counterclaimed for insurance due him on account of loss by fire, evidence held to present a question for the jury whether the mortgagee, a fire insurance company, undertook and agreed to attend to the insurance, and did attend to it for a time in such manner as to give the mortgagor the right to believe it would continue to do so.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 1399; Dec. Dig. § 480.*]

2. INSURANCE (§ 328*)—FORFEITURE—CHANGE OF TITLE OF INTEREST.

A mortgagee, a fire insurance company, agreed to attend to the insurance on the premises and did for a time, justifying the mortgagor in believing that it would continue to do so. The policies while kept in force were made for only one year at a time. The form of policy customarily used by the company contained a provision that it would be void if any change in the title or possession of the premises took place. The mortgagor conveyed as security for a debt, but the premises were reconveyed, and more than two years thereafter a loss occurred. Held, that the conveyance did not affect the company's liability, since it was fair to assume that, if it had continued to have policies issued, they would have been for only one year, and an act avoiding one policy would not avoid subsequent policies.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 794-822, 825; Dec. Dig. § 328.*]

3. INSURANCE (§ 113*)—PROVISIONS OF POLICY—NOTICE TO INSURED.

Where a mortgagee agreed to attend to the insurance on the mortgaged premises, and procured policies of insurance thereon and retained them in its possession, the mortgagor was chargeable with notice of their provisions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 135; Dec. Dig. § 113.*]

4. INSURANCE (§ 362*)—NONPAYMENT OF PREMIUMS—EXCUSE.

A mortgagee, a fire insurance company, whose mortgage required the premises to be kept insured, and authorized the mortgagee to pay insurance premiums and recover them from the mortgagor with interest, agreed to attend to the insurance, and for some time did so. There was no evidence that the mortgagor had paid any premiums to the local agents, and the president of the company testified that the insurance was dropped, not because of the nonpayment of premiums, but because by a payment on the loan the premises constituted sufficient security without insurance. The mortgagor was never notified that the company would no longer attend to the insurance. Held, that the mortgagor's failure to pay a premium when notified by a local agent that it was due did not relieve the company from liability.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 925-930; Dec. Dig. § 362.*]

5. TRIAL (§ 192*)—INSTRUCTIONS—ASSUMPTION OF FACTS.

Where it appeared that the president of an insurance company, also named as the trustee in a deed of trust given to the company, in negotiating the loan, insisted that the insurance should be carried in his company, the court did not err in treating it as undisputed that the company selected itself to carry the insurance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 432-434; Dec. Dig. § 192.*]

6. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1066*)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where it was claimed that an insurance company had agreed to attend to keeping the premises insured, an instruction requiring notice to, or knowledge by, "defendants" that it would no longer attend to the matter in order to relieve it of liability was not prejudicial to the company, although it required notice to, or knowledge by, insured's wife as well as insured, where there was no contention that either one had notice or knowledge.

7. EVIDENCE (§ 139*)—ADMISSIBILITY—SIMILAR TRANSACTIONS.

Where defendant gave two deeds of trust on different lots to plaintiff, an insurance company, and a recovery for loss by fire on one of the lots was sought on the theory that the company had agreed to attend to the insurance on the premises, the testimony of a person purchasing the other lot, subject to the deed of trust, that the company without any request from him issued a policy and sent him a bill for the premium, was admissible to show its course of dealing with respect to the property and to show how it construed its transaction with respect to the insurance thereon.

Appeal from District Court, Dallas County; J. C. Roberts, Judge.

Action by the Commonwealth Fire Insurance Company against H. L. Obenchain and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Coke, Miller & Coke, of Dallas, for appellant. W. P. Ellison, W. H. Clark, Ed. Dougherty, and Cockrell, Gray, Thomas & McBride, all of Dallas, for appellees.

MOURSUND, J. This is a suit by appellant against appellees for $1,500, together with interest and attorneys' fees, balance due on note, dated April 1, 1904, executed by appellees to appellant, and to foreclose lien on a part of block 525 in the city of Dallas, existing by virtue of a deed of trust executed by appellees to I. Jalonick, as trustee for appellant, to secure the payment of said note. Defendants admitted plaintiff's claim, but set up a cross-action alleging that plaintiff was indebted to defendants at the time of the filing of the suit in the sum of $1,600 on account of fire loss; that on April 1, 1904, plaintiff made defendant H. L. Obenchain a loan of $7,500, for which Obenchain executed two notes, one for $5,000, secured by deed of trust on a lot on which was situated a one-story brick house, and the other for $2,500, secured by deed of trust upon the premises described in plaintiff's petition, on which at that time was situated a two-story frame building; that the debt sued for by plaintiff is the balance due on said $2,500 note. It was further alleged that, at the time of making said loan, the houses above mentioned were insured in other companies, but that plaintiff company, through its president and the trustee in said deeds of trust, Isaac Jalonick, required defendants to give the insurance upon said buildings to plaintiff company, insisting that said company was in the insurance business as well as in the loan business, and that it must have the insurance, and that the loan would not be consummated unless the insurance was carried by plaintiff company; that plaintiff then and there agreed with defendants that it would carry the insurance on said two buildings for their mutual benefit and Isaac Jalonick, trustee, as his interest might appear; that plaintiff company prepared the deeds of trust given to secure said loan, and the one covering the premises described in plaintiff's petition contained the following clause: "That we will keep the buildings on said premises, or that may hereafter be erected thereon, insured in such company or companies as said trustee (I. Jalonick) may select, to the amount of $1,600, with loss, if any, payable to the legal holder or holders of said note as its interest may appear; that we will keep all fences, buildings, and other improvements thereon in good repair and will do no act by which the value of said premises may be impaired, and that we will on demand repay the legal holder or holders of said note, or trustee, all sums of money they may advance to satisfy, and pay taxes, assessments, insurance premiums, and charges of whatever nature chargeable against said premises or against said note or this deed of trust, with 10 per cent, interest per annum from date of advancement, all said advancements to be a lien on the property hereby conveyed and secured by this deed of trust." It was further alleged that the other deed of trust contained the same clause, except that it provided for a different amount of insurance to be carried; that the matter of insurance was thereby taken out of defendants' hands, allowing them no option in the matter, and providing for paying itself all premiums and securing itself therein; that said trustee, who was, and ever since has been, the president of plaintiff company, selected said company to carry the insurance risks, and did insure said houses, and led defendants to believe, and they did believe, that said houses were insured, the brick building as long as defendant H. L. Obenchain owned same, and the frame building on September 17, 1909, when it was destroyed by fire; that, by reason of the premises, plaintiff company is indebted to defendants on its policy to the amount of $1,600. It was further alleged that if said policy on said frame building had lapsed, as claimed by plaintiff, then that plaintiff undertook and agreed to insure the same and keep it insured to the extent of $1,600, and to protect itself and the defendants to that extent, and constituted itself the agent of the defendants, protecting and securing itself in the payment of all insurance premiums, and required defendants to agree to same, and that the policies were retained by plaintiff company; that defendants were left no choice, and relied upon said undertaking on the part of plaintiff to insure said property from year to year, and, if it was not insured, then it was through the negligence, wrong, and breach of agreement on the part of plaintiff company, whereby defendants have suffered damage and loss to the amount of $1,600; that said acts and agreements by plaintiff constituted an insurance by it of these defendants against all loss by fire to the extent of $1,600, whether any formal policy was issued or not. Defendants further alleged they had paid all premiums on notice that they were due; that, as plaintiff kept the policies, defendants had no record of expiration dates, and relied wholly on plaintiff to insure the property as it had agreed to do, and plaintiff at no time gave defendants any intimation of any change of plans or policy.

Plaintiff filed a supplemental petition containing demurrer, general denial, and plea that on April 1, 1904, and continuously since said date, the form of insurance policy, customarily in use by plaintiff and other companies, contained, in substance, the following provision: "That said policy, unless otherwise provided by an agreement indorsed thereon or added thereto, shall be void, if the hazard be increased by any means within the control or knowledge of the insured, or if mechanics be employed in building, altering or repairing the insured premises for more than 15 days at any one time, or if the interest of the insured be other than unconditional and sole ownership, or if any change other than by the death of the insured take place in the interest, title, or possession of any part of the subject of insurance, except change of occupants without increase of hazard, whether by legal process, or by judgment, or by voluntary act of the insured or otherwise, or if the building mentioned and described in said policy, whether intended for occupancy by owner or tenant, be or become vacant and unoccupied, and so remain for 10 days." It was further alleged that defendant H. L. Obenchain executed and delivered to W. H. Flippen, as trustee for J. B. Adoue, a deed of trust on the premises described in plaintiff's petition, dated July 26, 1904; that about October 1, 1906, he executed and delivered to J. T. Elliott a general warranty deed to the lot on which said two-story frame house was situated; that plaintiff never received any notice of the execution of either of these two instruments; that the said two-story frame house became vacant and so remained for more than 10 days at a time at various periods; that several times between April 1, 1904, and the date of the fire mechanics were employed in altering and repairing said building for more than 15 days at one time; that plaintiff was never notified of said vacancies or alterations or repairs, and had no knowledge thereof, and, if plaintiff had issued any policies on said house, same would have contained the provision aforesaid. Plaintiff also pleaded the statutes of limitation of two and four years. Defendants filed supplemental answer containing demurrer and special exceptions to the supplemental petition, a general denial, a special plea setting up that at the time of the fire, and for more than two years prior thereto, the defendants were the bona fide owners of said property, and that same was unincumbered except as to plaintiff's lien.

Upon the trial, the jury on June 2, 1911, returned a verdict against plaintiff, and in favor of defendants on their cross-action for $45, with interest thereon from September 17, 1909, to date. Judgment was entered September 13, 1911, nunc pro tunc as of June 2, 1911, that plaintiff take nothing by its suit, and that defendants recover of plaintiff $45 with interest from date. Plaintiff appealed.

The first assignment of error complains of the refusal to instruct a verdict for plaintiff as against defendants' cross-action. The propositions, briefly summarized, are that the evidence was insufficient (1) because it fails to show it was plaintiff's legal duty to defendants, or either of them, to have insurance on said building at the time of the fire to the extent of $1,600, or any other sum; (2) because by conveyance made by defendants to Elliott in October, 1906, the policy then on the property was vitiated, and plaintiff was under no obligation to renew same upon its expiration or upon the reacquisition of title by Obenchain and wife; (3) because, when defendants reacquired the title, plaintiff was under no obligation to reissue policy until advised by defendants of such reacquisition of title by them, with a request for the issuance of another policy.

[1] The execution and delivery of the two deeds of trust and the notes described in defendants' cross-action is admitted. The deeds of trust contained the clause copied in our statement of defendants' cross-action. The loans were made on April 4, 1904. On December 26, 1905, there was paid on the $2,500 note the sum of $1,000. At the time of the loan, the houses on the two pieces of property mentioned in said deeds of trust were insured in other companies than plaintiff company. On January 4, 1905, Chas. L. Dexter, local agent for plaintiff, insured the two-story frame building, and upon the expiration of the policy on January 4, 1906, D. M. Craddock, the successor of Dexter as local agent, renewed same for another year; the policy being written in the name of the estate of A. T. Obenchain. Craddock testified the premium was never paid to him, and the insurance was dropped at the expiration of said policy on January 4, 1907, and no subsequent policy issued. That he thought he gave the policy to plaintiff company, and, according to his recollection, the same contained a reservation of plaintiff's interest as the same might appear. He did not get the order for the insurance from defendant H. L. Obenchain nor deliver policy to him. Defendant H. L. Obenchain testified that he was the owner of the premises described in plaintiff's petition, and that the house on same was almost entirely destroyed by fire on September 17, 1909; the damage amounting to over $2,000. He then testified: "At the time I executed the deed of trust, the property was insured in one of Mr. Addison's companies; I don't know the name of the company, never did know. When I made this loan with Mr. Jalonick, we had a conversation about the insurance, and then, after it was consummated under his instructions, I informed Mr. Addison that Mr. Jalonick had charge of my insurance thereafter, and he would have to give it up to him. The conversation with Mr. Jalonick took place after the loan was all agreed to. He says, 'Mr. Obenchain, we are in the insurance business as well as in the loan business, and we will have to have the insurance on that property,' and I told him I preferred to attend to that myself. He says, 'Don't make any difference; the loan wouldn't be made unless we have the insurance; we are in the insurance business as well as the loan business,' and I had arranged to use this money here in releasing the estate from the administration, and the court was ready and I had to put loans on it." (This evidence appears to have been limited by the court to be admitted only for the purpose of showing the facts in regard to the selection of the company in which the insurance should be placed.) Again the witness testified: "I agreed that Mr. Jalonick should notify the other company that he was to take the insurance; that is all. He stated, as I said, that they were in the insurance business as well as the loan business, and that they would have to have the insurance on that property. He selected his own company; I understood him to select. He said, 'We will have to have that insurance;' that is, the Commonwealth Insurance Company. * * * Then: "Mr. Jalonick kept the policies, * * * had them issued or attended to the issuing of them, and kept the custody of them. I told him in this conversation that I preferred to attend to my own business, but he told me that they had to have that insurance, and that was all there was to it; I never had anything more to say about it." He also testified to having another conversation over the telephone with I. Jalonick, the president of plaintiff company and trustee in said deeds of trust, after the fire; a portion of his testimony concerning said conversation being as follows: "I says, 'Well, Mr. Jalonick, you remember when you made me the loan that you informed me that you were in the insurance business as well as in the loan business, and that you would have to have the insurance on that property?' He says, 'Yes.' I says, 'Well, is my property insured?' He says, 'Why, yes.' I says; Well, where is my policy?' I says, 'I can't find it, or something. He says, 'Well, I will find it for you.' I says, 'Well, I am very pleased to hear that, Mr. Jalonick.' I says, 'I started to write you.' He then asked if I had had a loss, and I told him 'Yes'; that I moved out of the house on the 1st day of September, and it burned up on the 17th. He asked how long it was vacant. I told him it was not vacant a minute; that I moved out and the other people moved in. He asked if the other people had any insurance. I told him I didn't know; that I heard they did. He asked how much. I told him I understood $1,000, and he says, 'All right.' I asked him if he would get my policy for me, and he replied he would." That next day Jalonick called for him over the telephone at his residence, in his absence, and, upon his return, being informed of such fact, he rang up Jalonick and told him who he was.

We now quote from Obenchain's testimony in regard to this conversation: "He said, 'Oh, yes,' and hesitated and hummed and hawed a minute, and then says, 'Why, when you were speaking to me the other day, I thought you were speaking of an investment.' I told him I didn't know what he meant by investment; that I just wanted to know if he had my insurance as he had agreed to carry, and he said that I was not insured. I asked why not, and he replied that they weren't attending to my business for me. I told him that it looked like he undertook to attend to it when he made me take it away from my agents and turn it over to him, and he replied that I wasn't insured, and they weren't going to pay a dollar of it. I told him that it looked to me like he ought to settle up my insurance, and finally remarked that it wasn't any use for us arguing a lot. He said, 'We carried your insurance up until January, 1906, and at that time you made a payment of $1,000 on your note, and we didn't care for any further security and we just dropped the insurance.' I told him I didn't know anything about that, and he said, 'We will see about that,' or something of the kind, and then I told him my wife had paid him $1,000, and he wouldn't say that he had ever taken the $1,000; he wouldn't say that he had ever said anything to my wife about insurance or anything of that kind, and finally wound up and told me that he didn't owe me a dollar, and wasn't going to pay me a dollar."

It appears from the evidence of B. R. Parks, who purchased the premises conveyed in the deed of trust securing the $5,000 note, that the brick building thereon was insured by plaintiff company in March, 1908, when he bought it. He assumed the payment of said note, and some months after his purchase received a notice from plaintiff that it had rewritten his insurance, and inclosed bill for premium, all without any request from him; that he did not want to carry insurance, because he wanted to tear down the building, and, after receiving the second notice, called on Mr. Jalonick and objected to paying premium. The witness then testified as follows: "Mr. Jalonick said that, under this loan, the contract or deed of trust provided they had the exclusive right to keep this property insured; that I had always had my own way about things, and now they had the exclusive right, and I had to pay the price, and I think, if I remember correctly, I had the policy on that property canceled and tore down the property and rebuilt and paid off the loan in October, 1908, some time."

I. Jalonick testified, in part, as follows: "I will tell you why the policy lapsed. * * * Dexter wrote it and Craddock renewed it. In December, 1905, the policy—that is, the loan—was paid down to $1,500. * * * The policy was written (I think Craddock wrote it) in 1906, and expired 1907. Well, I remember that policy had expired, the loan had been reduced to $1,500, and the real estate was ample security for $1,500; and that is why I was indifferent and didn't think it was up to me to continue the policy on it, ask for that additional security, in addition to the land. The company was protected by the real estate, and I have something else to do besides write up renewals of 5,000 or 6,000 policies. We took this contract from Harry Obenchain empowering me to select the company for renewals to protect the loan as long as the loan needed protection. * * * It was up to Mr. Obenchain to protect his insurance; that was his affair. I represented the company; I didn't represent Mr. Obenchain."

It appeared from policy register of Mr. Addison, deceased, that he issued policy for $1,500 on the two-story frame house in favor of estate of A. T. Obenchain for one year, expiring January 4, 1905, with mortgage clause in favor of Guarantee Loan & Investment Company, and on May 30, 1904, after the deed of trust to plaintiff in April, rider was attached showing satisfaction of interest of said Loan & Investment Company, and showing loss payable to I. Jalonick as his interest might appear. The evidence shows that Obenchain on October 1, 1903, executed to J. T. Elliott a warranty deed conveying said premises, reciting a consideration of $8,000, of which $6,500 was cash, and the remainder the assumption of the balance of $1,500 due plaintiff on its note. Jalonick testified he did not know of said instrument until after the fire. Obenchain made this conveyance to Elliott partly for the purpose of getting money to pay his interest, and partly to make a prospective purchaser more eager to buy the place. Elliott let him have $260, which he paid to Jalonick. Obenchain testified that he considered himself the owner of the property all the time. Jalonick testified the blank form of insurance policy introduced in evidence was the form customarily used by the plaintiff for many years. This form contains the clause copied by us in stating the allegations of plaintiff's supplemental petition. We think the evidence was sufficient to go to the jury, and that, if the jury believed the testimony of defendant H. L. Obenchain, it was authorized to find against appellant on the ground that, through its president, it undertook and agreed to attend to defendants' insurance matters, and did attend to same in such manner as to give him the right to believe they would continue to do so.

[2] Nor do we think the execution of the deed to Elliott, which appears to have been intended as a mortgage, will excuse appellant from liability. If the fire had occurred during the time when this conveyance was in effect, it might be a serious question, but the fire occurred in September, 1909, about two years after the reconveyance by Elliott. Jalonick testified they insured the house only for one year at a time; that it was cheaper to insure for three years, as it would only cost two premiums; and that he supposed it was not insured for three years at a time

"because Mr. Obenchain didn't want it that way—didn't ask for it." Assuming that any policies issued would have been only for one year, as we think, from the testimony, we have a right to do had appellant issued such policies in accordance with the agreement with Obenchain, the one in force on September 17, 1909, would not have been subject to any objection by reason of the condition of the title, and payment thereof could not have been refused because of some act invalidating a prior policy, even though the existence of such prior act was unknown to appellant. Appellant had a lien on the premises to secure the payment to it of all premiums paid by it, together with 10 per cent. interest, which was a greater rate of interest than the loan itself bore, and could have recovered such premiums in this suit by pleading and proving same.

[3] While we think Obenchain was chargeable with notice of the provisions of the policy, even though same was not in his possession, yet we do not think that an act by him which would avoid one policy should be construed to avoid all subsequent policies. For the reasons indicated, we overrule the first assignment.

[4] The second assignment complains of the refusal to give a special charge, reading as follows: "If you believe from the evidence that defendant H. L. Obenchain received notice from D. M. Craddock, local agent of plaintiff, that a premium was due on the policy issued by said Craddock January 4, 1906, and said Obenchain failed to pay said premium to plaintiff or said agent, then you will return a verdict for plaintiff on defendants' cross-bill or counterclaim." Appellee contends the evidence fails to show that notice of accrual of the premium was received by Obenchain, and for that reason the charge was correctly refused. We have read the statement of facts carefully, and conclude that the evidence on such point was sufficient to go to the jury. Appellee also contends the charge was correctly refused because it was immaterial whether such premium was paid or not; that Obenchain, under the facts of this case, had the right to depend upon plaintiff carrying his insurance until it notified him that it would no longer do so.

It is undisputed that Obenchain was never notified that plaintiff would decline to write further insurance on either of his two properties, or that it had declined to do so, and received no notice prior to the fire that the insurance had been dropped. He did nothing with respect to his insurance being changed to plaintiff company from the companies in which he carried it at the time of the loan, except to state to Addison, the agent, that Jalonick would look after his insurance in the future. The policies were issued by plaintiff company evidently by instructions from Jalonick. Jalonick reinsured on the date of its issuance the policy issued by Craddock on January 4, 1906, as shown by certificate attached thereto. On the next day a change was indorsed on the policy making the name of the insured read H. L. Obenchain instead of estate of A. T. Obenchain. This indorsement is not signed by Craddock, nor did he recollect making same. Craddock had no dealings with Obenchain, and sent out his bills on the first of the succeeding month, so it is evident that Obenchain knew nothing of this mistake until long after it was corrected; and, as Craddock knew nothing about the ownership of the property, it is evident that some one in plaintiff's home office had this change made, and was at that time giving the matter supervision. Neither Dexter nor Craddock testified to ever having received any premiums on the Obenchain policies. Dexter did not know who paid the premium on the policy issued by him on the two-story frame building, nor did he testify it was paid to him. Jalonick testified that Obenchain never paid a cent on any premium on any insurance policy, and then qualifies by adding that he never paid any to the company direct; that all premiums were collected through local agents. Edwards, who was auditor, cashier, and chief clerk, testified that no premiums were paid to him by Obenchain on said property to the best of his recollection. Obenchain testified positively that he paid to plaintiff's home office all premiums of which he received notice. It is admitted that the premium was paid on the first policy issued on the two-story frame building; and, while policies were issued on the brick building as late as 1908, no one of plaintiff's witnesses, who were its officers or agents, admitted that Obenchain ever paid a premium thereon. The $1,000 was paid on the $2,500 note in December, 1905, before Craddock issued the policy on January 4, 1906, yet said policy was permitted to remain in force until January 4, 1907, although no necessity existed for doing so for the protection of plaintiff, as shown by the testimony of Jalonick, in explaining why the insurance was not renewed, and although bill was sent out on the first of the following month, and, according to Craddock's testimony, was not paid to him. If Obenchain's testimony is true, Jalonick, speaking for plaintiff company, insisted on having the insurance because they were in the insurance business, and that Jalonick himself thought they had been insuring the property all along, and assured Obenchain over the telephone after the fire that the policy was in force. It appears from Obenchain's testimony that after the fire he went to plaintiff's home office and saw Craddock, and no one could or would give him any information about his insurance, and he told Jalonick, when the latter returned to Dallas, that he had made such inquiry and asked him whether he still had insurance, and then Jalonick assured him the policy was in force. It also appears that Jalonick, again speaking for plaintiff, insisted upon keeping the policy upon the brick building in force after it had been sold, claiming such right because the deed of trust gave it, and the same was still in force; the indebtedness having been assumed by the purchaser.

We think the evidence shows such a course of dealing in regard to this matter as to make plaintiff liable to Obenchain, even if the latter failed to pay the premium on the 1906 policy, and that plaintiff could only have relieved itself of further liability by notifying him that it would no longer undertake to write his insurance. Aside from Jalonick's testimony giving his reason for dropping the insurance, the evidence fails to show that it was dropped for nonpayment of premium. His testimony makes it certain that it was not the act of a local agent refusing to renew because of such nonpayment, but, speaking for the company of which he was head, he gives an entirely different reason, and that was that, after the payment of the $1,000, they were secure enough without the insurance, and were not looking after Obenchain's business. After such payment, plaintiff was better secured than ever in the repayment to it of premiums, together with 10 per cent. interest, and had nothing to lose by keeping same paid, especially as the loan itself only bore 8 per cent. interest. Having selected itself as the company to carry the insurance, and given Obenchain to understand and believe it was carrying the same, good conscience and fair dealing demanded that he be notified whenever plaintiff wished to give up its benefits and be relieved of its liabilities in the matter. For the reasons given, we hold it was not error to refuse said special charge, and the assignment is overruled.

[5] The third assignment complains of the charge of the court because it assumes that plaintiff selected itself as the company in which Obenchain should carry his insurance. Jalonick, the president of plaintiff company, was also the trustee in the deed of trust, and, in negotiating the loan, he insisted the insurance should be carried in plaintiff company as soon as the then existing policy expired, and there was no error in the court treating it as undisputed that plaintiff company selected itself to carry the insurance after the expiration of the policy then outstanding on the property.

[6] The fourth assignment also attacks the charge. The first proposition is that the charge was erroneous because it uses the word "defendants" instead of "defendant," thereby including Josephine Obenchain. The charge was made more burdensome in every respect upon defendants by using the plural, except where it speaks of plaintiff notifying defendants, and of defendants having notice or knowledge that plaintiff had ceased to carry the insurance. It is true notice to H. L. Obenchain alone would have been sufficient, and, if there was any contention that he had notice or knowledge that plaintiff had ceased to carry the insurance, this charge would have been erroneous as placing the burden upon plaintiff of showing notice to both or knowledge by both. However, it is undisputed that no notice was given Obenchain, and no contention is made by plaintiff that either of the defendants had notice or knowledge, so we consider this error in the charge as harmless. The second proposition is that there is no evidence that plaintiff, by its course of dealing, undertook to attend to the insurance and led Obenchain and wife to believe it would continue to do so. We think the evidence was ample to support the submission of this issue. The third proposition is that the charge leaves out of consideration the duty of Obenchain to pay premiums. We have fully discussed this matter under the third assignment. This assignment is overruled.

[7] By the fifth assignment appellant complains of the admission of the evidence of B. R. Parks, which is stated in our discussion of the first assignment of error. We think this evidence was clearly admissible. It showed the course of dealing by plaintiff with respect to property on which they had liens, with insurance clauses, and showed how plaintiff construed its transaction with Obenchain with respect to the insurance upon his property.

Finding no error in the record, the judgment is affirmed.

TEXAS & P. RY. CO. et al. v. GOOD.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. El Paso.
Nov. 7, 1912. On Rehearing, Dec.
11, 1912.)

1. REMOVAL OF CAUSES (§ 75*)—AMOUNT IN DISPUTE.

Though one of the defendants in an action against connecting carriers for injury to a shipment of cattle is a federal corporation, there may not be a removal to the federal court, no joint liability being alleged, but the acts of negligence of each defendant being separately alleged, and the damage claimed of such corporation being less than $2,000, and nothing in the petition showing the damage occurring on its line exceeded such amount, and that a less amount was claimed to defeat the jurisdiction of the federal court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Removal of Causes, Cent. Dig. § 132; Dec. Dig. § 75.*]

2. CARRIERS (§ 228*)—INJURY TO SHIPMENT—NEGLIGENCE—EVIDENCE.

Negligence in transportation of a shipment of cattle injured in transit cannot be shown by evidence of another shipment about the same time having made the trip safely; it not being shown the two shipments were made under the same conditions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 957-960; Dec. Dig. § 228.*]

3. EVIDENCE (§ 527*)—OPINIONS.

Men of experience in the cattle business, qualified to know the effect of dipping cattle in arsenic solution, may give their opinion as to the effect of such dipping of cattle after being given certain feed.

8. TRIAL (§ 234*)—INSTRUCTIONS—BURDEN OF PROOF—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Instructions that defendants have the burden of proving their respective pleas of contributory negligence by a preponderance of evidence are proper.

On Rehearing.

9. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1050*)—HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

Error in admitting evidence is harmless; other evidence to substantially the same effect having been admitted without objection.

10. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1058*)—HARMLESS ERROR—EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE.

Refusal to allow a witness to answer a question was harmless; he having elsewhere been permitted to testify to substantially the same facts.

Appeal from District Court, Midland County; S. J. Isaacs, Judge.

Action by E. C. Good against the Texas & Pacific Railway Company and others. Judgment for plaintiff against two of defendants, and they appeal. Reversed and remanded.

Douthit & Smith, of Sweetwater, W. L. Hall, of Dallas, John B. Howard, of Midland, R. S. Shapard, of Dallas, and Baker, Botts, Parker & Garwood, of Houston, for appellants. A. S. Hawkins, of Phoenix, Ariz., and W. E. Allen, of Midland, for appellee.

HIGGINS, J. This suit was brought by the appellee against the Texas & Pacific Railway Company and the Houston & Texas Central Railroad Company, and also against the Houston East & West Texas Railway Company, to recover damages to 848 head of cattle shipped from Humble, Tex., to Houston, over the line of the Houston East & West Texas Railway, thence to Ft. Worth over the Houston & Texas Central Railroad, and thence over the Texas & Pacific Railway to Sweetwater, Tex., where they were unloaded and held for several days for the purpose of being dipped, in accordance with the quarantine regulations of the state and federal governments, then reloaded and shipped over the Texas & Pacific Railway to Monahans, Tex. It was alleged that, by reason of delays in transportation and rough handling, 67 head died between Ft. Worth and Monahans, 59 head after arrival at Monahans, and the rest upon arrival were badly crippled and in bad condition, and that the Texas & Pacific Railway Company had damaged the cattle in the sum of $1,990, and the Houston & Texas Central Railroad Company and the Houston East & West Texas Railway Company in the sum of $5,945. Upon trial verdict and judgment were rendered in favor of appellee against the Texas & Pacific Railway Company in the sum of $1,600, and against the Houston & Texas Central Railroad Company in the sum of $2,000, and in favor of the Houston East & West Texas Railway Company.

[1] The defendant Texas & Pacific Railway Company being a federal corporation, the defendants filed petition and bond praying for the removal of the cause to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Texas, which petition was by the court refused, and to such action error is here assigned. The correctness of the court's action in this matter must be tested by a consideration of the effect of the allegations in the plaintiff's petition. It is well settled that "the matter in dispute," which in cases of this kind is the controlling factor in determining the right to a removal to the federal court, is the amount of damages claimed in plaintiff's petition. The aggregate amount of damages alleged in this case is far in excess of this sum, but there is no joint liability alleged on part of the Texas & Pacific Railway Company with its codefendants, nor is there any prayer for joint recovery against such defendant with the others. The acts of negligence on the part of each company were distinctly and separately alleged, and the damage alleged to have been inflicted by the first two carriers was alleged and claimed jointly, and the damage inflicted by the Texas & Pacific Railway is separately alleged and claimed. After having alleged the manner in which the injuries were sustained, the petition concludes as follows: "Wherefore, by reason of the premises, plaintiff says he has been damaged as follows: By the defendant Texas & Pacific Railway Company in the sum of $1,990, and he waives all other and further damages against said Texas & Pacific Railway Company, and by the defendants the Houston East & West Texas Railway Company and the Houston & Texas Central Railroad Company in the sum of $5,945. Wherefore, plaintiff prays for citation to each of the defendants, and that on trial hereof he have judgment against the defendant the Texas & Pacific Railway Company for the sum of $1,990 and against the Houston East & West Texas Railway Company and the Houston & Texas Central Railroad Company for the sum of $5,945 and 6 per cent. interest from September 25, 1910, and costs of suit and relief general and special, in no event the recovery against the Texas & Pacific Railway Company to be more than $1,990." It is clearly apparent that the amount claimed against the Texas & Pacific Railway Company does not exceed $2,000, and no judgment could have been rendered against it for more than that sum; and the court therefore did not err in overruling the petition for removal. Railway Co. v. Cushman, 64 S. W. 795; Railway Co. v. Dishman, 38 Tex. Civ. App. 277, 85 S. W. 319.

In the petition of appellant for removal it was alleged "that the plaintiff for the sole purpose of defeating the jurisdiction of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Texas over this cause, and in fraud of the jurisdiction of said court, attempts to waive all damages against the Texas & Pacific Railway Company over the sum of $1,990 as appears from plaintiff's petition which is referred to for a more particular statement of the cause of action," and it is here contended that the real amount in controversy against the Texas & Pacific Railway exceeds the sum of $2,000, and that the effect of the allegations of the plaintiff's petition is an attempt to waive a portion of the damage inflicted by the Texas & Pacific so as to fraudulently defeat the jurisdiction of the Circuit Court of the United States. But we do not so construe the petition. It is true that practically all of the cattle which died did so after reaching the line of the Texas & Pacific Railway Company, and, if this were the determining question as to where liability rested, it might be that this contention would be well taken. But it does not necessarily follow that, because they died after reaching the Texas & Pacific, all of their injuries were there sustained, and it is the contention of appellee that the manner in which they were handled by the first two carriers contributed to their death upon the line of the Texas & Pacific; and there is nothing in the petition upon its face to show that the damage occurring upon the line of the Texas & Pacific exceeded the sum of $2,000.

By its second assignment appellant complains of the refusal of the court to strike out the testimony of the plaintiff Good relative to the market value of the cattle in controversy at Monahans, because it developed upon cross-examination that his knowledge was not such as to authorize him to testify to such market value. Justice MCKENZIE is of the opinion this position is well taken, and that the assignment should be sustained. The writer also has grave doubts as to the competency of Good to testify to market values, but is not prepared to hold that he was not so qualified.

[2] At about the same time appellee shipped the cattle in controversy in this suit, it appears he also shipped from Navasota, Tex., on the line of the Houston & Texas Central Railway Company to Ft. Worth, and thence to Sweetwater and Monahans over the Texas & Pacific Railway, another herd of cattle of the same kind and grade as those involved here. Navasota is about 80 miles north of Humble, Tex., and upon trial plaintiff Good was asked in what condition the Navasota cattle reached Sweetwater as compared with the condition of the Humble cattle, and he testified they arrived at Sweetwater in fairly good condition and in good shape. To this question and the answer of the witness defendants objected for immateriality and irrelevancy, and because it was an isolated instance of comparison and not admissible, in absence of a showing that the Navasota shipment moved under identically the same conditions. The bill of exception discloses that appellee's counsel at the time stated that he offered the testimony for the purpose of comparison to show the relative condition of the cattle when they reached Sweetwater, and that he would follow it up by showing the relative condition when they reached Monahans. Counsel in their brief concede that negligence in transportation ordinarily cannot be established by comparison, and the fact that one shipment of cattle made the trip safely while another shipment arrived in an injured condition would not be a circumstance showing negligence. They seek to avoid this principle, however, by the contention that the testimony was admissible for the purpose of showing that the condition in which the cattle arrived at Monahans was due to the manner in which they were handled, rather than to the dipping process which they underwent at Sweetwater; the contention of the appellants being that this dipping process and the fact that they were held in Sweetwater without sufficient food was responsible for their condition, rather than any improper handling in transportation. The testimony, we think, was inadmissible, and is not cured by any special instruction in regard to the Navasota shipment, as contended by appellee. It is not contended that the Navasota and Humble shipments were shown to have been under the same conditions so as to render a comparison of the condition of the respective shipments upon arrival admissible, and we cannot see how a showing that the Navasota shipment arrived in good condition at Sweetwater would have any bearing upon the question or throw any light on the question of whether it was the dipping process or methods of handling which injured the Humble shipment. It was shown that the Navasota shipment was likewise dipped at the same time and went to Monahans, and they did not die in the manner in which the other shipment died, but the authorities hold that negligence in transportation cannot be shown in this way. Railway Co. v. Galloway, 140 S. W. 369; Railway Co. v. Wilson, 50 S. W. 156; Railway Co. v. Smith, 84 Tex. 348, 19 S. W. 509; Railway Co. v. Boykin, 99 Tex. 259, 89 S. W. 639; Railway Co. v. Harlan, 62 S. W. 971.

The fourth, fifth and sixth assignments, which complain of the exclusion of certain testimony, we think are without merit, and are overruled without comment.

[3] The seventh and eight assignments are sustained. Defendants offered to prove by the witnesses T. L. Hughes and Ben Van Tuyl that in their opinion it would have had a bad effect upon cattle, and was calculated to produce death, to hold the same on pasture without feed for seven or eight days, and then dipping the same in arsenic dip after a feed on maize and Kaffir corn; the objection urged being that it was not a matter calling for expert opinion, and that the witnesses were not qualified. We think that it was a matter peculiarly calling for the testimony of men experienced in the cattle business and who knew the effect upon cattle of dipping in arsenic solution, and both of the witnesses were shown to have been qualified to know what such effect would be.

The testimony of the witness Bryant, the exclusion of which is made the basis of the ninth assignment, was properly rejected, because he was not shown to have been qualified to testify to the matter inquired about.

[4] It appears that upon the trial of the cause appellants offered in evidence the depositions of Mose Gamble and Jack Jones, who testified that they helped to gather these cattle at Humble, and as to the condition of the cattle at that point at the time of shipment, to the effect that the cattle had stampeded just before shipping, and that same were thin and in a bad condition and tired from their drive and stampede; thereupon, in rebuttal, plaintiff Good was placed upon the stand by his counsel, and asked who were the witnesses Gamble and Jones, to which he replied they were negroes. The testimony was admitted over the objection of defendants that same was immaterial, irrelevant, prejudicial, and an attempt to impeach the credibility of the witnesses in a manner not permitted by law. We think this testimony also was inadmissible. We do not deem it such an error as would require the reversal of the cause, but, in view of a retrial of the cause, we deem it proper to say that the testimony should be excluded; the objections urged being well taken.

[5] The eleventh assignment, complaining of the charge of the court upon proximate cause, is overruled, as well as the twelfth assignment, which complains of refusal of the court to give a special charge upon proximate cause. This special charge was fully covered by the general and special charges given by the court at the request of the appellants, and the refusal of this one was not error.

The objection urged to the sixth paragraph of the court's charge was not well taken, and the thirteenth assignment is overruled.

[6] Special charge No. 12 requested by defendants was upon the weight of the evidence, and was properly refused. Special charge No. 24 was covered by the main charge, and was properly refused. The same is true of the special charge No. 5.

[7] The tenth paragraph of the court's charge reads as follows: "If you find from the evidence that said cattle or any of them were injured by the negligence of the defendants, and if you further find that said cattle, or any of them, were injured by reason of their inherent weakness or by plaintiff's failure to provide sufficient food or pasturage for same at Sweetwater, Tex., or by said cattle being dipped by plaintiff and having loaded said cattle too soon after said dipping process, then you will find for the plaintiff against the defendants guilty of such negligence for whatever damage plaintiff sustained as the proximate cause of the negligence, if any, of said defendant or defendants." We think this paragraph of the charge confusing and misleading, but do not regard the same reversible error, in view of the numerous special charges given at the request of the defendants directly instructing the jury not to allow plaintiff any damage by reason of the inherent weakness of the cattle or by plaintiff's failure to provide sufficient food and pasturage at Sweetwater, or by them being dipped or driven and loaded too soon after the dipping process.

[8] The court did not err in instructing the jury that the burden of proof was upon the defendants to prove their respective pleas of contributory negligence by a preponderance of the evidence, and the eighteenth assignment is therefore overruled.

Special charge No. 13 was properly refused, because the issues here presented were fully covered by the main charge of the court and other special charges given at the request of the defendants. Same is true of special charges No. 14 and No. 17.

There was no error upon the part of the court in giving special charge No. 2 requested by plaintiff, and complained of in twenty-second assignment.

Those assignments which complain of the insufficiency of the testimony to support the verdict and judgment are all overruled.

This cause was submitted prior to the retirement of Chief Justice PETICOLAS from the bench. The decision, however, was handed down after his retirement, and after Chief Justice HARPER had taken his place, but Judge HARPER did not participate in the decision, and the decision rendered is by the majority of the court only, composed of Justices MCKENZIE and HIGGINS.

Reversed and remanded as to the Texas & Pacific Railway Company and the Houston & Texas Central Railroad Company. As to the Houston East & West Texas Railway Company, the judgment is affirmed.

HARPER, C. J., not sitting.

On Rehearing.

HIGGINS, J. [9] In his motion for rehearing appellee has pointed out testimony of the witness Good with reference to the condition of the Navasota cattle upon their arrival at Sweetwater, which was admitted without objection upon the part of the appellants, and, in substance, is the same as that complained of in their third assignment of error. In the original opinion it was held error to admit testimony showing the relative condition of the Navasota cattle when they reached Sweetwater as compared with the condition of the Humble cattle, but, inasmuch as other testimony to substantially the same effect appears to have been admitted without objection, the error was therefore harmless, and the assignment should have been overruled. Railway Co. v. Harlan, 62 S. W. 971; Railway Co. v. Kennedy, 51 Tex. Civ. App. 466, 112 S. W. 339. Appellee in his brief filed in the cause did not call our attention to this additional testimony, and it was therefore not discovered by us. As to the testimony of the witness Van Tuij, our attention is also called to the fact that he was permitted elsewhere to testify to substantially the same facts which he would have testified to had he been permitted to answer the question referred to in the bill of exception upon which the eighth assignment is predicated, and this assignment should also have been overruled. Williamson v. Railway Co., 122 S. W. 897; Lodge v. Rumpy, 45 S. W. 422. This matter was called to our attention by appellee in his brief, and should have been noted by us.

[10] As to the testimony of the witness Hughes, the exclusion of which was made the basis of the seventh assignment, it is also contended that he was thereafter permitted to testify to the same effect substantially as he would have testified in answer to the question referred to in the bill of exception. However, we do not concur in their contention that he elsewhere testified to substantially the same facts that he would have testified to had he been permitted to answer the question shown by the bill, and we therefore adhere to the view that the seventh assignment was properly sustained, and therefore overrule the motion for rehearing.

DAIMWOOD v. DRISCOLL et al.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. San Antonio. Oct. 23, 1912. On Motion for Rehearing, Dec. 11, 1912.)

1. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 383*) —JURISDICTION—SALES OF LAND—COLLATERAL ATTACK.

Though, in order to sell lands to pay debts, there must be a citation as directed by Rev. St. 1895, art. 2123, on collateral attack it will be presumed that due service had been obtained.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 1554; Dec. Dig. § 383.*]

2. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 383*) —APPLICATION TO SELL LANDS—COLLATERAL ATTACK.

An application by an executor, in form one to sell lands to pay debts, which alleged that there were no debts against the estate, except that due the executor, that the estate was not capable of partition among the heirs in a manner just and profitable to them, or any of them, and that, in order to partition said estate with any degree of accuracy, a sale was necessary, is not one for partition, but one for the payment of debts; and, although it does not comply with Rev. St. 1895, art. 2123, providing essentials for such application, it is not void, and cannot be attacked collaterally.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 1554; Dec. Dig. § 383.*]

3. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 383*) —SALES OF LAND—NOTICE.

A sale of land by an executor by order of court, without notice, is not void, but voidable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 1554; Dec. Dig. § 383.*]

4. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 383*) —SALES OF LAND—NOTICE.

Where the court, acting on an application by an executor, made an order of sale and confirmed it, a purchaser could assume that the order was properly made upon notice and facts that authorized it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 1573-1582; Dec. Dig. § 388.*]

5. INFANTS (§ 29*)—SALES OF LAND BY EXECUTOR.

Where an infant solemnly ratified the sale of land of an executor after reaching maturity, he cannot set it aside for irregularities after the land had greatly increased in value.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Infants, Cent. Dig. §§ 37-40; Dec. Dig. § 29.*]

6. INFANTS (§ 30*)—CONTRACTS—AFFIRMANCE—CONTRACTS.

An infant, who did not attempt to disaffirm a sale until three years after his majority, will be held to have affirmed it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Infants, Cent. Dig. §§ 41-49, 54, 55; Dec. Dig. § 30.*]

On Motion for Rehearing.

7. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 383*) —SALES OF LAND—FORM OF APPLICATION.

The failure to show the expenses and claims of the executor, in an application for sale of land, as required by Rev. St. 1895, art. 2123, rendered the sale only voidable, even though there were no debts due to any one; and it could not be collaterally attacked.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 1554; Dec. Dig. § 383.*]

8. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 383*) —SALES OF LAND—COLLATERAL ATTACK.

Where the application to sell lands showed that debts were due the executor, it will be presumed, on collateral attack, that the law in regard to claims of an executor was fully complied with.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 1554; Dec. Dig. § 383.*]

Appeal from District Court, Nueces County; W. B. Hopkins, Judge.

Action by W. H. Daimwood against R. Driscoll and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Charles Turner, of Corpus Christi, and L. C. McBride, of Dallas, for appellant. G. R. Scott and Boone & Pope, all of Corpus Christi, and Dougherty & Dougherty, of Beeville, for appellees.

FLY, J. This is an action of trespass to try title to three-fifths of 1,323.89 acres of land in Nueces county out of the Puenticitas grant, instituted by appellant against R. Driscoll, Samuel Althaus, and Jim Jacobson. Appellee Driscoll pleaded not guilty, and three, five, and ten years' limitation, and further pleaded his title to the land through a sale made by the executor of the estate of Mrs. Ursula Daimwood under authority of an order of the probate court of Nueces county, and that each of the heirs of Mrs. Ursula Daimwood, among the number appellant and Ida Magnenat and Amelia Augusta Daimwood, whose interest in the estate appellant claimed, received his or her proportion of the money received from the sale of the land, and each, in all things, fully ratified said sale. The suit was dismissed as to Althaus and Jacobson by appellant, and the cause was tried by the court and judgment rendered in favor of appellee.

On May 14, 1895, Mrs. Ursula Daimwood died in Corpus Christi, Nueces county, leaving a will in which she bequeathed the land in controversy, which she owned in fee simple, to her five children, Lelia Belle Daimwood, now Henderson, born September 18, 1880, Maggie May Daimwood, born February 14, 1882, Ida Gertrude Daimwood, now Magnenat, born November 1, 1883, Amelia Augusta Daimwood, born January 12, 1885, and appellant, William Henry Daimwood, born June 7, 1886. Lelia Belle was married to Fred D. Henderson December 6, 1905, and Ida Gertrude to Fred L. Magnenat October 25, 1906.

It was provided in the will that Charles A. Meuly, the brother of the testatrix, should be the executor of the will, and on March 23, 1896, he duly and legally qualified as such, and, together with appraisers, returned into court an inventory and appraisal of the estate; the land in controversy being included therein. The inventory and appraisal were duly approved, and on May 4, 1899, the executor applied for and obtained from the probate court an order of sale of the land in controversy. The application for an order recited "that there are now no debts against said estate, except what is due your executor, and that said estate is not capable of partition among the heirs of said estate in a manner that would be just and profitable to them, or any of them, and that, in order to partition said estate with any degree of accuracy, a sale will be necessary." The only citation of the heirs indicated by the record was by posting notices.

In order to procure a sale under the provisions of chapter 22 of title 39, Rev. Stats., it is provided that an application for an order of sale shall be in writing, with a description of the real estate sought to be sold, accompanied by an exhibit in writing, verified by the affidavit of the executor or administrator, showing the claims approved and established by suit against the estate and the amount claimed on each, the estimated expenses of administration, and the property remaining on hand liable for the payment of such charges and claims. Article 2123. The citation in that case is a general one to all persons interested in the estate, describing the land to be sold, and requiring such persons to appear at the term named in such citation and show cause, should they so desire, why the sale should not be made. The citation is to be posted in the manner provided for other citations for 30 days, and the return made in the usual manner. That kind of notice was given in this case.

[1] Probate courts are courts of general jurisdiction in matters pertaining to estates of deceased persons. Murchison v. White, 54 Tex. 83; Crawford v. McDonald, 88 Tex. 626, 33 S. W. 325. But, in order to obtain the power and authority to sell the lands of an estate to pay debts, or to partition them, there must be citation as directed by statute. In a collateral attack, however, as this undoubtedly is, it will be presumed that due service had been obtained. Bouldin v. Miller, 87 Tex. 359, 28 S. W. 940; Hines v. Givens, 29 Tex. Civ. App. 517, 68 S. W. 295; Templeton v. Ferguson, 89 Tex. 57, 33 S. W. 329; Moore v. Hanscom, 101 Tex. 293, 106 S. W. 876, 108 S. W. 150.

[2] The citation was issued as provided for in case of a sale of land to pay debts, but the application for the sale does not comply with the law; but it has been held that, even though the application fails to state the grounds given by statute, still that will not render the sale void. Kleinecke v. Woodward, 42 Tex. 314; Gillenwaters v.

Scott, 62 Tex. 670; Jackson v. Houston, 84 Tex. 622, 19 S. W. 799; Weems v. Masterson, 80 Tex. 45, 15 S. W. 590; Taffinder v. Merrell, 95 Tex. 95, 65 S. W. 177, 93 Am. St. Rep. 814. Not being void, it could not be attacked in a collateral proceeding.

The application for the sale could not have been one for partition, although it so stated therein; for it had none of the essentials of an application for a partition. As an application for the payment of debts, although defective, it would form the basis for an order that could not be attacked in a collateral proceeding.

[3] If there was no notice of the sale given by the executor, it would not follow that the sale was void; for it has been held a number of times in this state that orders of sale of real property, without the notice prescribed, are not void, but merely irregular and voidable. George v. Watson, 19 Tex. 369; Hurley v. Barnard, 48 Tex. 87; Heath v. Layne, 62 Tex. 686; Lyne v. Sanford, 82 Tex. 58, 19 S. W. 847, 27 Am. St. Rep. 852; Kendrick v. Wheeler, 85 Tex. 247, 20 S. W. 44; Halbert v. Martin, 30 S. W. 388; Hirshfield v. Brown, 30 S. W. 962.

[4] When the court acted upon the application and made the order of sale and then confirmed it, appellee was not required to look beyond those orders, and could proceed upon the assumption that the order was properly made upon notice and facts that authorized it. Weems v. Masterson, herein cited; Robertson v. Johnson, 57 Tex. 62; Edwards v. Halbert, 64 Tex. 667; Butler v. Stephens, 77 Tex. 599, 14 S. W. 202; Corley v. Goll, 8 Tex. Civ. App. 184, 27 S. W. 820; Stroud v. Hawkins, 28 Tex. Civ. App. 321, 67 S. W. 534. As said by our late Chief Justice James in the case of Corley v. Goll: "We are strongly inclined to the opinion that where such a sale is brought into question in a collateral manner the decree of confirmation should protect the purchaser, and be preclusive of all questions, save that of jurisdiction of the court over the estate, which, as we have seen, the court had in this instance." Or, as said in Heath v. Layne, cited: "The purchaser is not required to go behind the order of probate sale to see that the administrator has been duly appointed and continued, and that the proceedings have all been regular." The record in this case does not show want of jurisdiction in the probate court. If the record showed a failure to obtain service for a partition, it did not show it as to a sale. Those interested in the estate were properly cited as to a sale of the property.

[5] The money arising from the sale was used for the maintenance and support of the heirs, and all of them, having full knowledge of the sale, ratified and confirmed it when they became qualified so to do. All the facts and circumstances tend to show that they knew about the sale of the land and settled with the executor and gave him a full receipt for everything for which he was indebted to each of them. He testified to that fact, and none of them denies it. The land brought its market value, and appellant, as well as his sisters, received the benefit of every dollar of it. It has been held that an infant is not permitted, in equity, to enjoy the proceeds of a sale of his property, and then repudiate the sale as irregular or void, any more than an adult, whether the sale is by act of the infant or by authority of law. Goodman v. Winter, 64 Ala. 410, 38 Am. Rep. 13; Commonwealth v. Shuman, 18 Pa. 346. But if this be not the true doctrine, when he solemnly ratifies the sale of land by accepting the proceeds of the sale after reaching maturity, he should not, in equity and good conscience, be allowed to set it aside on account of irregularities after the land has greatly increased in value. Ferguson v. Railway, 73 Tex. 344, 11 S. W. 347; Nanny v. Allen, 77 Tex. 240, 13 S. W. 989.

[6] Ordinarily any words or conduct clearly and unequivocally indicating an intention to be bound by the contract is sufficient. Mechem on Sales, § 104. In Bingham v. Barley, 55 Tex. 281, 40 Am. Rep. 801, it was held that the retention of the purchase money or property may well be considered an affirmative act showing an intention to affirm; and so long silence and acquiescence may furnish conclusive evidence of ratification. In this case, not only did appellant settle with the executor on the basis of the sale of the property, but he waited nearly three years after attaining his majority before he instituted this suit. As said in the last case cited: "The doctrine of reasonable time in which to disaffirm commends itself to our judgment. It is not the policy of the laws of this state to extend favor and indulgence to laches. Boys here become men owning and capable of managing property, precociously, and lands increase in value with surprising rapidity, and the country is fast filling up with new settlers seeking homes. Shorter periods of limitation are more needful to the welfare of the people than in other countries of slower growth. To apply the statute as the limit of time upon the minor's coming of age to avoid his deed would unsettle titles, stimulate cupidity, and work only mischief. * * * The silence or nonclaim of the minor for a considerable length of time, though less than the period of limitation for the recovery of lands, may as effectually prove his affirmance or ratification, in connection with the circumstances of the case, as his express acts or declarations to that effect." It has been held that even one year was not a reasonable time in which to disaffirm a sale made during minority. Askey v. Williams, 74 Tex. 294, 11 S. W. 1101, 5 L. R. A. 176.

The application made by the executor, while imperfect as an application for sale for debts, was treated as one by the court, and all the proceedings were taken as under an application for sale, and not for partition. There was no application for partition; but it is merely stated as an inducement to or reason for the sale that the property was not bringing interest, and was incapable of partition among the heirs. The executor did not ask the court to partition the land, but only sought to sell; and the court did not in terms authorize a partition, but did grant the authority to sell. That a partition was not desired is further apparent from the fact that only a part of the lands of the estate were included in the partition. In his report of sale the executor did not mention a partition, but merely reported a sale and prayed for a confirmation of the same; and in the order of confirmation there is no mention of a partition, but only of a sale which was approved and confirmed by the court. There was no partition of the estate, or any part of it, by the executor until the heirs had reached their majority. The rules relating to the sale of property of an estate, and not of partition, must be applied in this case. The application for sale was undoubtedly defective, but it is not subject to collateral attack. Taffinder v. Merrell, herein cited; Driggs v. Grantham, 41 S. W. 408.

The judgment is affirmed.

On Motion for Rehearing.

The probate court is one of general jurisdiction in matters pertaining to estates of decedents, and this attack on its judgment is a collateral one, subject to the rules that prevail in regard to such attacks. Crawford v. McDonald, 88 Tex. 626, 33 S. W. 325; Alexander v. Maverick, 18 Tex. 179, 67 Am. Dec. 693; Guliford v. Love, 49 Tex. 735; Harris County v. Stewart, 91 Tex. 133, 41 S. W. 650.

[7] The county court of Nueces county undoubtedly had acquired jurisdiction of the estate of Ursula Daimwood; and the court was as certainly within the exercise of its ordinary functions in selling the land to pay the debts of the estate, whether they were due the executor or any one else. The failure to show the expenses and claims of the executor in the application for sale did not render the sale void; and, even though there were no debts due to any one, the sale would be merely voidable, and could not be attacked in a collateral proceeding. Jackson v. Houston, 84 Tex. 622, 19 S. W. 799; Templeton v. Ferguson, 89 Tex. 47, 33 S. W. 329.

It is earnestly insisted that the court attempted a partition of the land, and yet no partition is mentioned in the report of sale or order of confirmation; and in his final report it is shown that there was no partition of the proceeds arising from the sale of the land. No reference is made to a partition after the mention in the order of sale that it was made "for the purpose of distribution among the heirs of said estate."

[8] The application for sale represented that debts were due the executor; and it will be presumed that the law in regard to claims of an executor or administrator was fully complied with. Lyne v. Sanford, 82 Tex. 58, 19 S. W. 847, 27 Am. St. Rep. 852; Kendrick v. Wheeler, 85 Tex. 247, 20 S. W. 44; Diggs v. Grantham, 41 S. W. 409.

The order of sale was not void, and was ratified by appellant.

The motion is overruled.

MCWHORTER v. ERIKSEN.

11, 1912.)

PUBLIC LANDS (§ 173*)—SETTLEMENT—SUFFICIENCY.

Plaintiff purchased school lands from a purchaser from the state before the expiration of the three years' occupancy by such purchaser. Plaintiff's wife immediately went on the land, made her home thereon, but plaintiff did not personally go thereon for over two months, and was not there continuously after that time. Held, that there was not a sufficient settlement on the land by plaintiff under Rev. St. 1895, art. 4218k, requiring substitute purchasers to file the conveyance or transfer, together with an affidavit that he desires to purchase the land for a home, and has in good faith settled thereon.

Appeal from District Court, Midland County; S. J. Isaacs, Judge.

Trespass to try title by Ed Eriksen against S. D. McWhorter. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and rendered.

John B. Howard, of Midland, for appellant. A. S. Hawkins, of Phoenix, Ariz., for appellee.

MCKENZIE, J. There have been two former appeals in this cause. See Erickson v. McWhorter, 132 S. W. 847; same, 143 S. W. 245. This is a suit in the form of trespass to try title brought by appellee as plaintiff against appellant as defendant for the land in controversy. Upon trial it was agreed that on March 3, 1908, appellee, by regular transfer and applications duly filed and accepted in the general land office became the substitute purchaser from the state of the land in controversy, and that thereafter the Land Commissioner canceled appellee's purchase on the ground of failure on his part to occupy and improve the land, as required by law. The Commissioner thereafter awarded the land to appellant. Upon trial, judgment was rendered in favor of appellee, and the appellant appeals the case to this court. In the trial it was admitted as a fact that appellee was never upon the land until two months after the transfer to him by Donelson, his grantor, and abandonment by Donelson of said land. It is undisputed that the affidavit of settlement made by the appellee, which accompanied the transfer and applications as filed in the General Land Office, was of the same date as the said transfer and applications, and was made at the same time and two months prior to appellee's going upon the land. Donelson's abandonment of the land occurred on or about the date of the transfer, and appellee's wife, immediately upon the abandonment of the land by Donelson, went upon and took possession thereof and occupied same until said cancellation. The appellee seeks to excuse his failure to go and make settlement in person upon the land for two months after the transfer and abandonment thereof by Donelson upon the ground that settlement and occupancy of the land was made by his wife; that her settlement and occupancy was a fulfillment of the requirements of the law, and such as to render unnecessary his settlement upon said land.

The question then is, Can the wife, for the husband, make the settlement which is required by the law for substitute purchasers of land originally purchased from the state under the act of 1905? Or, to restate the question, Can Eriksen, as substitute purchaser of Donelson, recover the land in controversy, although he did not go upon the land until two months after Donelson had transferred the land to him and had abandoned it? The land in controversy was purchased from the state under the Act of 1905, c. 103, section 3 of which act provides that: "Each application shall contain the affidavit of the applicant to the effect that he desires to purchase the land for a home, or as additional to the home applied for, or as additional to his own land which has been theretofore purchased from the state, or as additional to his own private land, as the case may be, and that he is or will, as the case may be, in good faith become in person an actual bona fide settler on some portion of the land he purchases, or upon his other land, as the case may be, within ninety days from the date his application is accepted, also that he is not acting in collusion with others for the purpose of buying the land for any other person or corporation, and that no other person or corporation is directly or indirectly interested in the purchase thereof; also every application shall be accompanied by the obligation of the applicant in a sum equal to the amount of the deferred payment offered for the land." And section 4 provides that: "All sales shall date from the day the successful applicant's application was filed in the land office. The applicant shall have ninety days from the date of the acceptance of his application within which to actually settle upon the land so purchased, and he shall within thirty days after the expiration of said ninety days given within which to make settlement, file in the land office his affidavit that he has in good faith actually in person settled upon the land purchased by him. Should the applicant fail to make and file the affidavit and proof of settlement as herein provided within the time specified, the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall indorse that fact upon his application, canceling the same, and immediately place the same upon the market by notice to the clerk, fixing a date not less than thirty days thereafter when application may be filed for the purchase thereof, and any sum which may have been paid upon a former application, canceled as aforesaid, shall be forfeited to the fund to which the same belonged."

In order to arrive at the status of the parties, it becomes necessary for us to construe the meaning of the above language as pertaining to settlement. This language, we think, is definite and intelligible. In plain words the statute requires that the original purchaser of land from the state shall make actual settlement in person thereon, and further requires that such original purchaser shall make affidavit to the fact that he has made actual settlement in person upon said land. The very terms of the statute inhibit any other than actual settlement in person by the purchaser; else the purchaser would be incompetent to make the required statutory affidavit of settlement.

Article 4218k of the Revised Statutes of 1895, being in force at the time when Donelson transferred the land to the appellee, and which controls transfers of school land before the three years' residence has been completed, is as follows: "Purchasers may also sell their lands, or a part of the same, in quantities of forty acres or multiples thereof, at any time after the sale is effected under this chapter, and in such cases the vendee, or any subsequent vendee, or his heirs or legatees, shall file his own obligation with the Commissioner of the General Land Office, together with the duly authenticated conveyance or transfer from the original purchaser and the intermediate vendee's conveyance or transfer, if any there be, duly recorded in the county where the land lies or to which said county may be attached for judicial purposes, together with his affidavit, in case three years' residence has not already been had upon said land and proof made of that fact, stating that he desires to purchase the land for a home, and that he has in good faith settled thereon, and that he has not acted in collusion with others for the purpose of buying the land for any other person or corporation, and that no other person or corporation is interested in the purchase, save himself, and thereupon the original obligation shall be surrendered or canceled or properly credited, as the case may be, and the vendee shall become the purchaser direct from the state, and be subject to all the obligations and penalties prescribed by this chapter, and the original purchaser shall be absolved in whole or in part, as the case may be, from further liability thereon."

Our Supreme Court, in construing this statute in the case of Hardman v. Crawford, 95 Tex. 193, 66 S. W. 206, says: "The statute authorizes the actual settler to convey to another, but requires of the vendee to make the same character of settlement upon the land as was required of the original purchaser. In other words, the state allows an actual settler to be substituted by another with the same qualifications, and performing the same duties, but there is no provision by which land once sold to and occupied by an actual settler can be transferred, before the expiration of three years' occupancy, to another person, unless the state at the same time acquires another actual settler in place of the one that is released. This is a matter of statutory provision, and so plainly expressed as to leave no room for construction."

Following our Supreme Court's construction of article 4218k, supra, Eriksen, as substitute purchaser, was required to make the same character of settlement upon the land as was required of the original purchaser. Eriksen's settlement, then, was required to have been made at the same time that Donelson transferred the land and made abandonment of his settlement so that the continuity of settlement of both Donelson and Eriksen be maintained. It is evident, too, that it was never intended by the Legislature that the substitute purchaser should be relieved in any manner of performing the obligations which were required of the original purchaser. As said in Busk v. Lowrie, 86 Tex. 132, 23 S. W. 984: "The language stated was used by the Legislature for a definite purpose, which was to secure real bona fide settlers upon the land. The word 'actual' is used in the sense of being a real, and not a constructive or virtual, settlement." Accordingly it is our opinion that Eriksen's settlement was not such settlement as was required. The settlement as required of Eriksen is not such as can be made for him by his wife, his agent, or his proxy; it must be actual and in person. To hold otherwise would permit the wife, for the husband, to make the settlement and to occupy the land without any necessity of the husband's actual presence thereon at any time. If we should construe the statute as permitting the wife to make the settlement for the husband, should we not construe it as also permitting the wife to make the required affidavit of settlement for the husband? Then would it not follow with truth and reason that the wife, for the husband, may acquire the lands of the state, though applied for by the husband, without the necessity of the husband ever going upon said land? Because of his admission that he did not go upon the land for a period of two months after Donelson had made the transfer of the land to him, and after the land had been abandoned by Donel-son, we are required to hold that Eriksen failed to make the settlement as required by law.

We have examined with much care the opinion rendered in this case on a former appeal. 143 S. W. 245, supra. It is our opinion that the personal views of the writer as therein expressed are applicable to the occupancy of land by an actual settler only after settlement has been made. The question in the instant case is one of settlement and not of occupancy. The cases cited by the writer of that opinion (143 S. W. 245, supra) dealt with the question of occupancy only, unless it be the case of Willingham v. Floyd, 32 Tex. Civ. App. 161, 73 S. W. 831. In the latter case the land involved was purchased under the law then in force, which required a settlement on the land by the applicant before making application to purchase. Floyd, the appellee, testified as follows: "After I returned from having the land surveyed, I hired a dray wagon, purchased a tent, and sent the wagon, the tent, a lot of provisions, and household furniture to be placed on section 14, at the spot I had selected for my home. I also sent my wife out in a separate conveyance, along with E. W. Lee and his family, who went out the same day to take up some land near by. All these went out on the evening of the 29th of July. I did not go out with my wife to the land, because there was a great demand and rush for this land, and I stayed in town for the purpose of making my applications and getting same filed first; and it was my intention to go out to section 14 as soon as I made my application, and this I did. I sent my wife to this section on said day, because I considered it my home at that time, and thought that my wife should be at her home." This testimony shows that the husband went upon and surveyed the land and located the home site, whereas, in the instant case, the husband, as substitute purchaser, never so much as saw the land for two months after his vendor had made transfer and abandonment.

Upon the trial, in due time appellant requested the court to peremptorily instruct the jury to return a verdict for him, which the court refused. This ruling is assigned as error, and we are of opinion it should be sustained. It becomes our duty, therefore, to reverse the judgment of the trial court, and to now render judgment for the appellant.

Reversed and rendered.

HARPER, C. J., did not sit in this cause.

HIGGINS, J. I concur with justice McKENZIE in the view that this cause should be reversed and here rendered for appellant, but I do not fully concur in all of the reasoning of his opinion. I think the facts clearly disclose that Eriksen made a settlement upon the land, but that this settlement was constructive rather than actual, and that the law requires a settlement of the latter character. It was undisputed that Eriksen himself was never upon the land until two or three months after the same was transferred to him by Donelson; but it is contended that settlement was made by him within the meaning of the law by the fact that his wife at once entered into possession thereof and established their home thereon, and that this was sufficient. The material facts were undisputed upon this issue, and are as follows: Mrs. Eriksen testified: "My husband and I acquired this land from Donelson that we might have a home. My husband and I had not taken up any land from the state at that time. * * * I went out there to examine the land for Mr. Eriksen and myself. Mr. Eriksen was engaged in blacksmithing at the time the trade for the land was finally made. After the trade was made, I went out there and made settlement on the land and moved on it as soon as I could get there. At that time old Father Donelson, his daughter-in-law, Mrs. Donelson, and my little nephew went with me. Old Father Donelson was the man we got the land from. This was immediately after the deal for the land was closed. I moved on the land and built a house. When I went out there the first time, I took horse feed and something to eat and some posts and wire and some lumber. I took some bedding and household effects. I took bedding and clothes for myself and the little boy until I returned. I put the stuff on the land that I carried out there. I sent back for other material and put up a house as quick as I could get it up. It took, of course, a few days. I put up a 10 by 14 boxed house. I put fencing there. We put something over two miles of fencing as quick as we could get it up. I do not remember the exact time it took to put it there. We did not make very much clearing there. We dug out a tank there. There had been some work, and we put in a couple of days with a team and scraper cleaning it out—Son and myself. We did not put in any crop the first year. We did afterwards. Mr. Eriksen furnished the money to buy the improvements. We wanted the improvements to establish our claim to the land and make the title good. We thought the law wanted us to put the improvements there and of course make a home. * * * I think I know why Mr. Eriksen did not go with me when I first went out on the land. It was because his business required his attention—blacksmithing. He stayed in town to provide means to sustain life and improve the home and pay the debts that was on it, etc. He had no other means to pay these notes against the land but his labor and his income from the shop. * * * My husband and I did not have any other home anywhere from the time we made this trade with Donelson up to the time that the land was canceled and until the three years' occupancy was completed."

Eriksen himself testified as follows: "I made a trade with Donelson for this land. I bought the land and paid him a bonus. He partly lived it out, and I bought the four sections and the claim for a certain amount, paid part down, and paid part in small notes along in one, two, and three years, somewhere along there. I got a deed to the land from Donelson. It shows the consideration correctly. * * * I bought this land to have a home. I thought it was good time to begin a start to get a little home of my own. When we talked about making the trade, we agreed for her to go and look at the land as I was busy in the shop, to see whether it was what we wanted or not, and if it was, we would buy it, and when they came back they agreed the land was all right and bought the land for a certain consideration. We put in a home we had in Hillsboro, our homestead, and some little money and the balance in notes—about $3,000 or $3,500—something about like that in notes. * * * I do not remember how soon after the deal was closed it was until I went out on the land. It was not long until I went out there and spent a while. I can't get it down. I have been trying to think it up, but I cannot remember. It was not long because I was anxious to see it. When I went out the first time, I stayed somewhere about a couple of weeks. I did not go on the land sooner because I did not feel like I could leave my business and do ourselves justice. It was very busy times, and I tried to pick slack times to go out there whenever I could. I made other trips out there. I cannot remember the time. I was out there three or four times—two or three trips—before the land was canceled. * * * When I was out there I worked, helped build fences, and done some little plowing and whatever I could do. I considered that my home, during the meantime, was in Andrews county on the four sections. I had no means of livelihood but my trade. I never learned any other business."

The cases of Andrus v. Davis, 99 Tex. 303, 89 S. W. 773, and Bustin v. Robison, 102 Tex. 526, 119 S. W. 1140, to my mind clearly held that the occupancy required must be actual rather than constructive, and it is difficult to read the Acts of 1905 relating to the sale of free school land without reaching the conclusion that the Legislature clearly and definitely intended that actual settlement and occupancy is required rather than constructive. In Bustin v. Robison, supra, the court held that a temporary absence from the land did not operate as a break in the actual occupancy required by the law, but there is nothing in that opinion, as I construe it, which militates against the view clearly held in the Andrus Case that actual occupancy is required. Personally I regard this provision of the statute requiring a continuous personal occupancy as most unfortunate, and one which has materially retarded and delayed the development of this portion of our state, but I think the legislative intent clear, and the courts must observe it.

In the case at bar, I think it clearly appears, as a matter of law, that Eriksen's settlement upon the land was constructive rather than actual, and as such was insufficient.

Appeal from Taylor County Court; T. A. Bledsoe, Judge.

Action by W. P. Thurmond against W. J. Standard. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Cunningham & Oliver, of Abilene, for appellant. Dallas Scarborough, of Abilene, for appellee.

WILLSON, C. J. By his promissory note dated March 28, 1907, appellant undertook to pay to appellee's order October 1, 1907, "waiving grace and protest," $213, interest and attorney's fees. By his suit commenced October 2, 1911, appellee sought a recovery on the note. As a defense against such a recovery appellant set up the statute requiring a suit based on such a cause of action to be commenced within four years from the time the cause of action accrues. Sayles' Stat. art. 3356. A judgment having been rendered in favor of appellee for the amount of the note, appellant prosecuted this appeal.

[1-3] Appellant by his contract having waived the days of grace he otherwise would have been entitled to (Sayles' Stat. art. 318; 1 Daniel, Neg. Inst. § 633; Perkins v. Bank, 38 Mass. [21 Pick.] 485; Hirschfeld v. Bank, 83 Tex. 452, 18 S. W. 743, 15 L. R. A. 639, 29 Am. St. Rep. 660), it is clear, under the rules controlling in such cases (Geistweidt v. Mann, 37 S. W. 372; Watkins v. Willis, 58 Tex. 523; Smith v. Dickey, 74 Tex. 61, 11 S. W. 1049), that appellee's cause of action accrued October 2, 1907. To be without the bar of the statute, his suit must have been commenced within four years from that date. As four years from October 2, 1907, expired with October 1, 1911, and the suit was not commenced until the next day, it is plain that it was within the bar of the statute and could not be maintained. That October 1, 1911, was Sunday, did not operate to extend the time within which the suit otherwise must have been commenced. Insurance Co. v. Shrader, 89 Tex. 40, 32 S. W. 872, 33 S. W. 112, 30 L. R. A. 498, 59 Am. St. Rep. 25; Allen v. Elliott, 67 Ala. 437; Perkins v. Bank, 38 Mass. (21 Pick.) 485.

The judgment will be reversed, and a judgment will be here rendered that appellee take nothing by his suit.

Appeal from District Court, Taylor County; Thomas L. Blanton, Judge.

Action by J. H. Guitar against O. P. Harlan and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

H. H. Sagebiel, of Stamford, and D. M. Oldham, Jr., of Abilene, for appellants. Eugene De Bogory, of Abilene, for appellee.

WILLSON, C. J. Appellee, as the holder, sued appellants O. P. Harlan, G. C. Bishop, and one J. W. Kemp, as the makers of a promissory note, dated September 20, 1907, for the sum of $2,750, interest and attorney's fees, payable October 14, 1907, to the order of the Photo Print Manufacturing Company, incorporated under the laws of the state of Oklahoma. He recovered a judgment against appellants for the sum of $2,117.50, being one-half of the amount of the note, including interest accrued and attorney's fees. The appeal is by appellants Harlan and Bishop alone.

[1, 2] It appeared that the note was given by appellants and Kemp to cover part of the purchase price of a machine for copying pen-written records, the right to sell similar machines in Texas, and capital stock of the photo company of the face value of $4,000, sold to appellants and Kemp by the photo company acting by its president, one Gregory. Two or three days after the date of the execution of the note, the photo company, by an indorsement "without recourse," transferred the note to appellee and appellant Harlan for a consideration of $2,000 paid to it, $1,000 by Harlan, and the other $1,000 by appellee. Appellants contended that they were induced to make the note by a fraud practiced on them by Gregory; that the consideration therefor had failed; and that appellee had notice thereof at the time he purchased the note. Appellee contended that if it was true that appellants were so induced to execute the note, and that the consideration therefor had failed, he nevertheless was entitled to recover, because he purchased the note before its maturity, in due course of trade, for a valuable consideration paid, and without notice of any vice in it. The judgment rendered involves a finding in accordance with appellee's contention, and if there was testimony authorizing the finding the judgment should be affirmed; for if appellee was such a purchaser the matters relied upon as a defense against the recovery sought were not available to appellants as against him. There is testimony in the record which, we think, authorized such a finding. Appellee, as a witness, testified that he "knew what the note was given for," but "did not know that the machine was not giving good satisfaction at that time." He further testified that before he bought the note he told appellant Harlan he was "thinking seriously of buying it," and asked Harlan, "How about it?" and that Harlan replied: "It is all right. It is going to be paid." It was after this conversation with Harlan that appellee purchased the note. It seems to us that the testimony referred to tended to show that appellee did not have notice of the vice in the note, and that we should not say that the finding to that effect involved in the judgment was without evidence to support it. It appears from testimony in the record that after appellee agreed with Gregory to purchase the note he agreed that Harlan might have a one-half interest in it if he would pay to Gregory one-half the purchase price. Harlan thereupon paid to Gregory one-half of the $2,000 appellee had agreed to pay for the note. It is insisted that the effect of the transaction was to make Harlan and appellee partners in the purchase of the note, and that, Harlan having knowledge of the vice in the note, appellee, as his partner in the transaction, was chargeable with such knowledge. It is, perhaps, a sufficient answer to this contention to say that the judgment involves a finding, supported by testimony, that appellee purchased the note on his own account, and then sold to Harlan a one-half interest in it; but we think it also may be said that the judgment involves a finding, not without support in the testimony, that Harlan himself at that time did not know or have reason to believe that the consideration for the note had failed.

We conclude as the court below did that appellee, as an innocent purchaser, was entitled to protection as against the defenses asserted by appellants. Therefore the judgment is affirmed.

4. EASEMENTS (§ 8*)—WAYS—PRESCRIPTION.

To establish a way by prescription, there must be an adverse user of the same against the owner, and, where the way is also used by the owner, no such adverse possession exists, nor does it exist where the way is merely used by permission, or where it is used over uninclosed and unimproved lands.

Appeal from District Court, Hays County; Frank S. Roberts, Judge.

Action by W. M. Kuykendall against H. G. Williams. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed and rendered.

K. E. McKie, of San Marcos, for appellant. Thos. J. Saunders, of San Marcos, for appellee.

RICE, J. Appellant and appellee owned adjoining tracts of land; appellant's tract abutting upon the public road leading from Kyle to Dripping Springs, and situated between said road and appellee's tract. Appellee brought this suit on the 11th day of January, 1912, for a mandatory injunction, requiring appellant to unlock and leave open a certain gate opening into said public road from his inclosure, alleging that there was, and had been for 30 years prior thereto, a roadway leading from said public road through said gateway over and through appellant's pasture to the stockpens upon his own tract of land. After plea in abatement, setting up the fact that prior to the filing of this suit he had sold the land to C. C. Waller, whom he claimed was a necessary party to said suit, appellant filed a general denial and special answer denying the matters set up in appellee's petition. A temporary writ of injunction was granted which, upon final trial before the court without a jury, was perpetuated, requiring appellant to unlock and keep open the gate leading from his pasture into said public road, and establishing said passway according to appellee's contention, from which judgment appellant has prosecuted this appeal, and has assigned many reasons for a reversal of the judgment, some of which present interesting questions; but, in the view we have taken of this case, we think it is only necessary to discuss the several assignments complaining of the insufficiency of the evidence, to support the judgment. Appellee does not contend, nor does the evidence sustain the theory, that the passway in question was ever a public road; but his insistence is to the effect that it is either a way by necessity or by prescription.

[1] The authorities hold that such an easement can only be acquired by a grant in one of three ways: First, by express grant, as by a deed; second, by implied grant, as a way of necessity; and, third, by prescription or limitation, which presumes a grant. See volume 10, Am. & Eng. Ency. Law, p. 409; Cyc. vol. 14, pp. 1145-1166.

[2] It is also held in Texas Western Railway v. Wilson, 83 Tex. 156, 18 S. W. 325, that the burden of proof is upon the party claiming the easement, without any direct or express grant, to establish all of the necessary facts by which the right may be presumed in his favor, such as peaceable possession, exclusive, continued, and adverse to the owner of the land. A failure in proof of any of such facts is fatal to the right asserted. See, also, Cyc. vol. 14, p. 1196. In the present case there is no express grant claimed.

[3] A way of necessity arises where one party has granted land to another not having any outlet save over the land of the grantor, in which the grantor, by implication, grants a right of way. Sassman v. Collins, 53 Tex. Civ. App. 71, 115 S. W. 337. In the case at bar the roadway in question is not one of necessity for the reason that the evidence shows that there are two other roadways by which appellee can reach the same public road. It is true that said routes are shown to be more difficult, and one of them farther, than the one in dispute. In Hall v. City of Austin, 20 Tex. Civ. App. 59, 48 S. W. 55, and Alley v. Carleton, 29 Tex. 74, 94 Am. Dec. 260, it is held that a way of necessity must be more than a way of convenience, but must be an absolute necessity, without which the party claiming it would be wholly deprived of the use of his land; and that it is not sufficient in establishing a way of necessity to simply show that it would be expensive to obtain another outlet. Besides, in the present case it appears that appellee did not purchase his land from appellant, but from one Rogers, through whose land there is a passway to the public road.

[4] With reference to the claim by prescription, it is shown from the evidence that appellant purchased his tract of land in 1875, and that appellee purchased his from Rogers about eight years prior to the institution of this suit. It seems that for some time prior to appellant's purchase, and before the lands in question were inclosed, there was a dim roadway leading from a point somewhere in appellee's pasture, near his stockpens, across both of said tracts of land into the public road at said gateway, which had been occasionally traveled; but it is shown, however, that appellant inclosed his lands about 25 years prior to the institution of this suit, placing for his own convenience a gate at a point where this old roadway intersected the public road, and that, passing after that time through his inclosure by way of said roadway, was permissive only. Appellee himself testified that the gate was only left unlocked at this point for about six months after his purchase, but, from that time up until the filing of suit, it had been kept locked and the passage closed except for a short time when he and his tenant Blocker enjoyed the privilege of a key, furnished him by appellant. In order to establish a roadway by prescription, there must be an adverse user of same against the owner of the land, without which no such right can be established. Where the way is also used by the owner, no such adverse possession exists; nor does it exist where the roadway is merely used by permission of the owner. See Cunningham v. San Saba County, 1 Tex. Civ. App. 480, 20 S. W. 941; Worthington v. Wade, 82 Tex. 26, 17 S. W. 520; Sassman v. Collins, supra. Prior to the fencing of the land by appellant, no right of way was acquired as against him, because, under the law of this state, merely traveling over uninclosed and unimproved lands is not the adverse holding such as contemplated by law. See Cunningham v. San Saba County and Worthington v. Wade, supra.

We think the evidence in this case wholly fails to establish appellee's contention in either respect; and, it appearing that the case has been fully developed, it becomes our duty to render such judgment as should have been rendered by the court below, which is to reverse and render the judgment in favor of appellant, and it is accordingly so ordered.

Reversed and rendered.

ST. LOUIS & S. F. R. CO. v. CARTWRIGHT et al.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Dallas. Nov. 16, 1912. Rehearing Denied Dec. 7, 1912.)

1. NEW TRIAL (§ 71*)—GROUNDS—VERDICT CONTRARY TO EVIDENCE.

Where the evidence was conflicting, but sufficient to sustain the finding of the jury, a new trial, on the ground that the verdict was against the preponderance of the evidence, was properly denied.

[Ed. Note.—For other case, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 144, 145; Dec. Dig. § 71.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1002*)—REVIEW—QUESTION OF FACT.

Where the evidence was conflicting, but sufficient to sustain the finding of the jury, the verdict will not be disturbed, as against the weight of the evidence, on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3935-3937; Dec. Dig. § 1002.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 500*)—RECORD—MATTERS TO BE SHOWN BY RECORD.

Where there was no judgment or record entry showing any ruling on an exception to the petition, such ruling cannot be reviewed, although preserved by a bill of exceptions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2295-2298; Dec. Dig. § 500.*]

4. CONTINUANCE (§ 31*)—SURPRISE AT TRIAL.

Where the petition in a shipper's action contained general allegations of unnecessary and unreasonable delay and rough handling of the shipment, surprise justifying a continuance cannot be predicated on the admission of evidence of particular acts of delay and rough handling, although defendant had excepted to the petition as too general, especially where defendant had taken depositions to rebut such evidence, thus showing that it was not surprised thereby.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Continuance, Cent. Dig. §§ 96-98; Dec. Dig. § 31.*]

5. TRIAL (§ 251*)—INSTRUCTIONS—APPLICATION TO ISSUES.

The refusal of an instruction requested by defendant, relative to an issue not submitted to the jury as a ground of recovery, was not error, since the failure to submit such issue withdrew it from the consideration of the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 587-595; Dec. Dig. § 251.*]

Appeal from District Court, Kaufman County; F. L. Hawkins, Judge.

Action by Matthew Cartwright against the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad Company and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, the defendant named appeals. Affirmed.

Andrews, Ball & Streetman, of Ft. Worth, and A. H. Dashiell, of Terrell, for appellant. Wynne & Wynne, of Wills Point, for appellee.

TALBOT, J. The appellee Matthew Cartwright sued the appellant, St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad Company, and the Paris & Great Northern Railroad Company and the Texas Midland Railroad for damages to 180 head of beef cattle, shipped on the 5th day of June, 1909, from Kaufman, Tex., to East St. Louis, Ill. The plaintiff alleged four grounds of negligence, namely: (1) "That the cars in which the cattle were loaded were not properly bedded." (2) "That they were negligently delayed on each and all the lines of railway of said defendants over which said cattle were being transported." (3) "That the cars were roughly handled and bumped and jostled together, knocking said cattle down and against each other, and against the sides of the cars, causing them to be bruised, torn, and scratched, and several of them to be crippled; that the employees of each of said defendants were guilty of this kind of handling of said cattle." (4) "That the cattle were unloaded at Newburg in muddy pens, and that the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad Company was guilty of negligence in not having suitable pens for unloading stock for feed and rest."

It was alleged that the cattle were intended for the St. Louis market of Monday morning, June 7th, and arrived too late for that morning's market, and had to be held over to the market of June 8th; that by reason of the delay the cattle lost in weight 40 pounds per head; that the market declined from the 7th to the 8th 10 cents per hundredweight; that on account of the bruised and muddy appearance of the cattle, etc., they lost 50 cents per hundredweight.

All the defendants answered, specially excepting to plaintiff's petition, because the "allegations of delay and rough handling do not state the time and places, and on what line of road, the delays and rough handling occurred." The St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad Company further answered, after a general denial, (1) that the usual and ordinary time for transportation of cattle from Kaufman, Tex., to East St. Louis, Ill., was from 42 to 48 hours; (2) that the cattle were received from the codefendant, Texas Midland Railroad at Paris, Tex., at 5:15 p. m. the same day, arriving at St. Louis at 9 a. m. on the morning of June 7th, carried through the city of St. Louis and across the river to the National Stockyards, East St. Louis, and there delivered, June 7th, at 11:40 a. m.; (3) that on arrival at Newburg, Mo., on June 6th, at 6:30 p. m., the cattle had been on the cars 31 hours and 15 minutes; that it was impossible to run the cattle from Newburg to East St. Louis, Ill., in the remaining 4 hours and 45 minutes, and that they were compelled to unload said cattle in Newburg for rest, feed, and water in compliance with the federal statute prohibiting carriers from keeping cattle on board the cars longer than 36 hours without unloading for feed, rest, and water; (4) that if the pens at Newburg, Mo., were muddy it resulted from natural causes; (5) that if any of the steers were crippled en route it was caused by the natural viciousness of the cattle; (6) that the cattle were handled with ordinary care and dispatch, and transported in a reasonable time; and that it is impossible to transport cattle without delay for numerous causes.

During the progress of the trial plaintiff offered testimony of delays and rough handling of his cattle and at certain points on appellant's line of road, after which the defendants moved that said testimony be stricken out, and the court overruled the motion. Then the defendants filed a motion to withdraw their announcement of ready, and to continue the case on the ground of surprise, in order that they might secure testimony to rebut the evidence of specific acts of rough handling and delays offered by plaintiff, and this motion was by the court overruled.

The case was tried before a jury, and a verdict returned for plaintiff against the defendant St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad Company for the sum of $1,024.05, and against the plaintiff, and in favor of the other defendants, Paris & Great Northern Railroad Company and Texas Midland Railroad. The motion of the defendant St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad Company having been overruled, it appealed.

[1, 2] The first, second, third, and fourth assignments of error complain, respectively, of the court's action in overruling appellant's motion for a new trial, and for grounds of this complaint assert, in effect, that the verdict of the jury is not only against the great preponderance of the evidence on the questions of unreasonable delay in the transportation of the cattle and of rough handling of the same, but that there is no evidence showing either such delay or such handling on appellant's road. In this view of the evidence we do not concur. The evidence was conflicting, but sufficient to sustain the finding of the jury upon both of these issues. This being true, the trial court was justified in overruling the motion for a new trial; and under repeated decisions of the appellate courts of this state we would not be warranted in disturbing the verdict and judgment on the grounds urged in the assignments under consideration. It is the peculiar province of the jury, under our practice, to determine all questions of fact.

[3] The fifth assignment of error is as follows: "The court erred in overruling special exception No. 1, in defendant's first amended answer, excepting to the allegation in plain-tiff's original petition, upon the ground that the allegations of rough handling and delay did not state the time and place, and on what line of road, the delay and rough handling occurred." We find no judgment or record entry showing any such ruling as that complained of in the assignment; and, in the absence of such a judgment, the ruling, although preserved by a bill of exception, which is contained in the transcript, cannot be reviewed on appeal. For a discussion of the question and citation of authorities sustaining this view, see Daniel v. Daniel, 128 S. W. 469, decided by this court, and writ of error denied by the Supreme Court.

[4] The question, however, is incidentally raised by appellant's seventh assignment of error. This assignment is that the "court erred in overruling and not sustaining the defendant's motion to withdraw its announcement of ready, and to continue this case on the ground of surprise in the introduction of the evidence of the delays at Paris, Springfield, and Newburg, and the rough handling at or near Springfield and Newburg, so as to enable the defendant to obtain evidence in rebuttal of the specific acts of the delay and rough handling testified to by the witness." The assignment is submitted as a proposition, and, in addition thereto, the following proposition: "The defendant having used proper diligence to require the plaintiff to disclose the facts constituting his cause of action, and being surprised by the evidence of Harden, and the evidence being material, the application to withdraw the announcement of ready, and to continue the cause, should have been granted." There was no error in this action of the court. The general allegations of unnecessary and unreasonable delay and rough handling of the cattle were sufficient to admit proof thereof, and surprise could not be predicated upon its admission. Railway Co. v. Jones, 41 Tex. Civ. App. 327, 91 S. W. 611; Railway Co. v. Martin et al., 49 Tex. Civ. App. 197, 108 S. W. 981; Railway Co. v. Cunningham, 51 Tex. Civ. App. 368, 113 S. W. 767. Besides, the record discloses that the appellant, anticipating that testimony would be offered by appellee to show delays and rough handling of the cattle at the points mentioned in the assignment, had prepared itself to introduce rebutting testimony in regard thereto by taking the depositions of the several conductors in charge of the shipment from Paris, Tex., to the point of destination, the deposition of the foreman of the Paris & Great Northern Railroad Company at Paris, Tex., the depositions of its stockyard foreman and its assistant superintendent at Newburg, Mo., and also the depositions of certain of the employees of the Terminal Railroad Association and of the St. Louis National Stockyards. By the testimony of these witnesses, appellant endeavored to meet the issues pleaded and sought to be proved by appellee, and this refutes the idea that appellant was, in fact, surprised at the admission of testimony showing delays and rough handling of appellee's cattle at Paris, Springfield, and Newburg. Under the circumstances disclosed by the record, the court did not err in refusing to allow appellant to withdraw its announcement and continue the case.

[5] Nor did the court err in refusing to instruct the jury, as requested by appellant, that if the cattle were delivered at the stockyards by appellant on June 7, 1909, before the market closed for that day, appellee could not recover any damages by reason of the cattle having been held over until June 8th. The only grounds of negligence submitted, and upon which the jury were authorized by the court's general charge to predicate a verdict in favor of appellee, were delays in transit, rough handling of the cattle, and placing them in muddy pens at Newburg, Mo., resulting in injury to the cattle and causing them to shrink in weight. The issue tendered by the pleadings of the appellee, to the effect that he sustained damages on account of the negligence of appellant in failing to transport the cattle to St. Louis in time to be placed on the market for sale on the 7th of June, 1909, was not submitted to the jury as a ground of recovery; and the failure to submit such issue had the effect to withdraw it from the consideration of the jury altogether. The refusal to give the special charge, therefore, resulted in no injury to appellant, and furnishes no just ground of complaint.

We are further of the opinion that the evidence was sufficient to justify the conclusion that the pens in which the cattle were placed in Newburg, Mo., were muddy and filthy as a result of the failure of appellant to exercise ordinary care to better their condition, and that appellant was guilty of negligence in putting the cattle in these pens and keeping them there for the length of time shown by the evidence, which proximately resulted in a depreciation in their value and loss to appellee. The court did not, therefore, err in overruling appellant's motion for a new trial, based on the alleged insufficiency of the evidence to establish this issue.

There are several assignments of error that have not been discussed. Some of these assignments have been disposed of by what has already been said, and none presents reversible error. The material allegations of the plaintiff's petition were sufficiently established by the evidence to warrant the verdict rendered, and the judgment of the district court based thereon will be affirmed.

Affirmed.

MORRIS et al. v. SHORT.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Texarkana. Nov. 7, 1912. On Motion for Rehearing, Dec. 5, 1912.)

1. DEEDS (§ 114*)—CONSTRUCTION—DESCRIPTION OF PROPERTY.

A description of land in a deed as 1,000 acres of land undivided and a part of a larger tract, situated in certain counties on the head-right surveys of D. and others, for a more full description of which reference was made to a recorded deed, was sufficient to convey 1,000 acres in whatever portion of such larger tract belonged to the grantor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. §§ 316-322, 326-329; Dec. Dig. § 114.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 842*)—REVIEW—CONCLUSIONS OF LAW.

The trial court's construction of a deed is not binding on appeal, since it is a conclusion of law rather than a finding of fact.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3316-3330; Dec. Dig. § 842.*]

3. DEEDS (§ 95*)—CONSTRUCTION—LANGUAGE OF INSTRUMENT.

A deed which is not attacked for fraud, accident, or mistake should be construed according to its terms.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. §§ 233, 241-254; Dec. Dig. § 95.*]

4. DEEDS (§ 120*)—CONSTRUCTION—LANGUAGE OF INSTRUMENT.

A deed, absolute on its face, cannot be construed as a contract for a contingent interest in the land, in the absence of evidence of a contract different from that imported by the terms of the deed.

5. ESTOPPEL (§ 39*)—PROPERTY CONVEYED—AFTER-ACQUIRED TITLE.

Where a deed contained no express warranty nor any language limiting the warranty against incumbrances implied from the use of the words "grant" or "convey" under Rev. St. 1895, art. 633, and the grantor at the time had no title, a title subsequently acquired by him vested immediately in the grantee by force of the implied warranty.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 4, pp. 3519-3527.]

7. ESTOPPEL (§ 38*)—PROPERTY CONVEYED—AFTER-ACQUIRED TITLE.

For an after-acquired title to pass to a grantee under a warranty of title, it is not necessary that the conveyance should have been upon a valuable consideration.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Estoppel, Cent. Dig. §§ 99-107; Dec. Dig. § 38.*]

8. ESTOPPEL (§ 58*)—ELEMENTS—PREJUDICE TO PERSON SETTING UP.

Attorneys were not estopped from claiming that a deed to them conveyed an absolute title, by an answer, filed by them in a prior action, alleging that their client conveyed such land to take effect as a valid deed only in case he was successful in pending litigation, as against a subsequent purchaser who did not rely thereon and who paid nothing of value for his conveyance.

On Motion for Rehearing.

9. JUDGMENT (§ 256*)—CONFORMITY TO FINDINGS.

A party to an action conveyed an interest in land, the title to which was in dispute, to his attorneys by a deed absolute on its face. It was claimed that it was intended only as a contract to convey one-half of the land recovered by him in that action. He recovered nothing in that action, but subsequently acquired title to such land. Held, that a finding by the trial court, in a subsequent action, that the attorneys were entitled to a part of the land, necessarily involved a finding that the conveyance was not on the contingency claimed, and hence the court erred in limiting their recovery to one-half of the land.

Appeal from District Court, Upshur County; R. W. Simpson, Judge.

Trespass to try title by U. F. Short against M. L. Morris and another. From the judgment, defendants appeal, and plaintiff cross-appeals. Reformed and rendered.

John S. Barnwell, of Gilmer, and Morris & Pope and A. U. Puckitt, all of Dallas, for appellants. Warren & Briggs, of Gilmer, and U. F. Short, of Dallas, for appellee.

HODGES, J. This suit was instituted in the court below by U. F. Short, the appellee, in the form of an action of trespass to try title, against Morris and Crow, the appellants, for the recovery of a tract of 621 acres of land situated in Upshur county. The following is a statement of the substantial facts as we gather them from the briefs of counsel and from the record filed in the case:

Jas. B. Simpson is the agreed common source from which all the parties deraign title. In 1891 Jas. B. Simpson became insolvent. He was at the time the owner of 7,630 acres of land situated in Camp and Upshur counties, of which the land in controversy is a part. In order to place this property beyond the reach of his creditors, Simpson, on the 21st day of July, 1891, made a deed purporting to convey all of his land situated in those two counties to one Kennett Cayce. The deed recited a consideration of $11,500 paid in cash, and was afterwards placed of record in both counties. The facts, however, show that Cayce was a fictitious person and that no consideration in fact passed to Simpson. At the time this scheme was attempted, Simpson was indebted to the following creditors: Sam Thurmond, T. L. Torrans, the Bankers' & Merchants' National Bank of Dallas, and the National Park Bank of New York. None of these claims appear to have been secured by liens at that time.

On January 14, 1892, Thurmond recovered a judgment against Simpson on his claim in the district court of Marion county for the sum of $924.96. An abstract of this judgment was filed in the office of the county clerk of Camp county on February 25, 1892, but none was filed in Upshur county. On the same date that Thurmond recovered his judgment Torrains also recovered a judgment against Simpson for the amount of his claim, which was something less than $1,000. An abstract of this judgment was filed for record in the office of the county clerk of Upshur county on February 28, 1892.

On February 3, 1892, a power of attorney purporting to have been executed by Cayce to M. L. Robertson and acknowledged before Jas. B. Simpson was filed for record in Camp county. Robertson was a son-in-law of Simpson. On May 25, 1892, Robertson, claiming to act by virtue of this power of attorney from Cayce, executed a deed purporting to convey all of the lands described in the deed from Simpson to Cayce to the appellee Short, reciting a consideration of $5,500. On the same day Short executed a deed conveying all of the same land, except 200 acres, to W. D. Simpson, a son of Jas. B. Simpson. This deed recited a consideration of $4,250 paid in cash. According to the court's findings, all of these transactions were for the purpose of aiding Jas. B. Simpson to hold his property beyond the reach of his creditors, and no consideration was in fact paid in any of them.

On March 8, 1892, William Kelly sued Kennett Cayce in the district court of Dallas county on an account amounting to $6,208.92, procured a writ of attachment, and caused it to be levied upon all of the lands described in the deed from Simpson to Cayce. The levies were made March 5, 1892. On October 10, 1893, Kelly recovered a judgment in his suit against Cayce and for the foreclosure of his attachment liens. The lands were subsequently sold under that judgment and purchased by Kelly, to whom the sheriff executed a deed.

In view of the fact that the trial court concluded that an agreement between Kelly, Short, and W. D. Simpson was entered into for the purpose of aiding Jas. B. Simpson to defraud his creditors, it may be proper to say in this connection that the various transactions between Simpson, Short, and Kelly, and the judgment recovered by Kelly against Cayce, and the sale thereunder, are not considered in this case in determining the rightful owner of the title to the land in controversy. They are here referred to simply for the purpose of showing the basis of the claims which gave rise to the litigation that arose thereafter and which is a part of the history of the case.

On February 22, 1892, the Bankers' & Merchants' National Bank of Dallas sued Jas. B. Simpson on its claim and procured a writ of attachment to be issued to Camp county, which was by the sheriff of that county levied upon the lands in both Camp and Upshur counties. A judgment was thereafter rendered in the bank's favor for $2,154 with the foreclosure of the attachment lien. An execution was issued on this judgment and placed in the hands of the sheriff of Camp county, who, on the 7th day of February, 1894, sold the lands in both counties; the Dallas bank becoming the purchaser. Previous to that time, on July 5, 1892, the same lands had been sold under the Thurmond judgment and purchased by the Bankers' & Merchants' National Bank of Dallas. Both of the above-mentioned sales are treated in this litigation as affecting only the lands in Camp county, inasmuch as the sheriff who made the sales had no authority to execute process on property in Upshur county. Hence it is not contended that either of the last-mentioned sales affected the title to the lands involved in this suit.

On January 16, 1893, the National Park Bank of New York recovered in the district court of Dallas county a judgment against Jas. B. Simpson for something over $50,000; but no process was issued thereon to Upshur county till 1897.

Shortly after the sale made on the 2d day of January, 1894, under the judgment procured by Kelly against Cayce, at which Kelly became the purchaser, H. S. Hepburn, who had been appointed receiver for the Bankers' & Merchants' National Bank of Dallas, brought a suit in the district court of Camp county to recover all of the Simpson lands situated in that county; the receiver claiming by virtue of the sales made under the Thurmond judgment as well as that in favor of the Bankers' & Merchants' National Bank. Wm. Kelly, U. F. Short, the appellee, and W. D. Simpson were made parties defendant in that suit. Kelly claimed the lands by virtue of the sheriff's deed under his judgment against Cayce. After that suit was instituted, Wm. Kelly, Jas. B. Simpson, and Short entered into a written agreement in which they undertook to make a common defense. The agreement was dated the 5th day of April, 1894. Jas. B. Simpson contracted in the name of W. D. Simpson, Jr., his son. The writing recited the fact that the above-mentioned suit was pending. The parties agreed to make a common cause, and it was provided that if they were successful Kelly should have the first 2,000 acres. If over 2,000 acres were recovered, then Short should have 200 acres. After Kelly and Short had received their respective portions, the balance, which the parties estimated at 3,000 acres, should belong to W. D. Simpson, and an equitable partition should be made between the parties. It was further stipulated that each of the parties was to furnish his own attorney at his own expense, and that the court costs should be apportioned between them in proportion to their respective shares.

Shortly afterwards Wm. Kelly entered into a contract with Morris and Crow, the appellants in this cause, by which he engaged them to represent him in the litigation referred to in the written agreement. Kelly executed the following deed to Morris and Crow, dated the 23d day of May, 1894: "Know all men by these presents that I, Wm. Kelly, of Dallas county, Texas, for and in consideration of five thousand dollars to me in hand paid by Morris & Crow in certain services rendered me in recovering a debt due me by Kennett Cayce, have granted, sold and conveyed, and by these presents do grant, sell and convey to Morris & Crow, a firm composed of M. L. Morris and W. M. Crow, residing in Dallas county, Texas, one thousand acres of land, undivided and a part of a tract of land containing 7,630⁸/₁₀ acres situated in the counties of Camp and Upshur, Texas." Then follows more particular description. "To have and to hold all and singular the premises together with all and singular the rights and appurtenances thereto in any wise incident or appertaining, unto the said Morris & Crow, their heirs or assigns, forever in fee simple."

This deed is the beginning and the basis of appellants' claim to an interest in the land in controversy. It appears from the testimony that Morris and Crow had represented Kelly in his suit in which he recovered a judgment against Cayce, and that they thereafter represented him in the future litigation regarding the validity of Kelly's claim to the land in controversy as well as that in Camp county.

The defendants mentioned in the suit instituted by Hepburn, receiver, filed a cross-bill asking for affirmative relief. An ineffective effort was thereafter made by the receiver to dismiss the case and prosecute substantially the same cause of action in the federal court. Hepburn afterwards resigned as receiver, and H. C. Weaver was appointed to succeed him. On the 8th day of December, 1896, Weaver, as receiver, conveyed to Short, the appellee, all of the interest claimed by the Bankers' & Merchants' National Bank of Dallas to the land there in controversy.

On February 12, 1896, W. D. Simpson, Jr., executed a deed to Sheppard & Jones, a firm of attorneys composed of Jno. L. Sheppard and J. F. Jones. That deed is as follows: "Know all men by these presents that I, Wm. D. Simpson, Jr., of the county of Dallas, state of Texas, in consideration of professional services rendered and to be rendered in the cases of H. S. Hepburn, Receiver, v. U. F. Short and Others, pending in the district court of Camp county, Texas, and in the United States Circuit Court at Jefferson, Texas, by Jno. L. Sheppard and J. F. Jones, have granted, bargained, sold and conveyed, and by these presents do grant, bargain, sell and convey unto the said Jno. L. Sheppard and J. F. Jones of the county of Camp, state of Texas, all that certain lot, tract or parcel of land described as follows: An undivided one-third interest in all lands that this vendor may recover in the suit No. 1293, H. S. Hepburn, Receiver, v. U. F. Short and Others, now pending in the district court of Camp county, Texas, or that this vendor may recover in the suit of H. S. Hepburn v. U. F. Short et al., now pending in the United States Circuit Court at Jefferson; and special reference is here made to the pleadings in said cases for a particular and specific description of said land. It being understood, however, that should the court impose any charge upon this vendor's interest in said lands, that the vendees herein shall bear their one-third proportion thereof. And this vendor further covenants and agrees upon a recovery by him finally in the above litigation, that he will make to said vendees a warranty title to the proportion of lands herein conveyed by special warranty," etc.

After these conveyances the suit pending in the district court of Camp county was prosecuted on a cross-bill, with Kelly and others as the real plaintiffs, against Short as the real defendant. Kelly and his co-complainants abandoned the original form of the action and based their claim for relief upon an oral agreement which they claim was entered into between Short, Kelly, and Simpson, by which Short undertook to purchase from the receiver all rights to the property, for their benefit as well as his own. Upon a trial of that issue before the court a judgment was rendered in favor of Short, and this ended that litigation. It applied, however, only to the lands situated in Camp county, and did not include those in controversy.

On the 28th day of October, 1895, the Simpson lands in Upshur county, and which did include the lands here involved, were sold under an execution issued on the Torrains judgment. They were purchased by R. T. Torrains, and by him afterwards, on the 12th day of February, 1896, sold and conveyed to Thos. Kelly, who later conveyed them to Wm. Kelly. At the time of this transfer the suit in Camp county was pending as well as one involving the same issues in the federal court at Jefferson.

On May 13, 1897, an execution was issued out of the district court of Dallas county on the judgment theretofore recovered by the National Park Bank of New York against Simpson, and levied on the Upshur county lands. A sheriff's sale was afterwards made, and the lands purchased by F. M. Hayes, as receiver of the Ninth National Bank of Dallas. On June 8, 1897, Hayes filed suit in the United States Circuit Court of the Northern District of Texas at Dallas, in which he charged that the transactions and conveyances by which Kelly claimed to have obtained the land through Kennett Cayce were fraudulent and void because they were the result of a conspiracy entered into with Jas. B. Simpson to place the property beyond the reach of Simpson's creditors. It was also alleged that Kelly's purchase of the land in Upshur county from R. T. Torrans was made in furtherance of a like conspiracy with Jas. B. Simpson and for the latter's benefit. Upon those grounds the bill prayed for the cancellation of all those deeds. Answers were filed by Kelly and Morris and Crow. Subsequently A. P. Morey purchased from Hayes, the receiver, all of the interest which the bank owned by virtue of the sheriff's deed conveying to it the lands in Upshur county. Morey filed his bill, repeating in substance the previous averments of the receiver, and asked for the same relief. While this suit was pending, and on the 23d day of February, 1898, Kelly executed the following deed to Sheppard & Jones: "Know all men by these presents that I, Wm. Kelly, of the county of Dallas and state of Texas, for and in consideration of the sum of five thousand dollars to me in hand paid by Sheppard & Jones, a law firm composed of Jno. L. Sheppard and J. F. Jones, in legal services, have granted, sold and conveyed, and by these presents do grant, sell and convey unto the said Sheppard & Jones, a firm composed of Jno. L. Sheppard and J. F. Jones, of the county of Camp, state of Texas, all that certain tract of land containing one thousand acres, undivided, and a part of the following described tract of land, to wit: Lying and being situated in the counties of Camp and Upshur," etc. Then follows the usual habendum clause with the general warranty. On February 4, 1898, Kelly executed a deed to W. T. Armistead, by which, in consideration of legal services, he sold and conveyed "all that certain tract of land containing 200 acres, undivided, and a part of the following tract of land," etc. Then follows a description of the lands situated in Upshur county. This deed contained the usual general warranty.

In March, 1902, a judgment was rendered in the suit of F. M. Hayes, Receiver, v. Jas. B. Simpson et al., in the federal court at Dallas, which finally disposed of that litigation. It is conceded that Morey, who purchased from Hayes, the receiver, was the representative of Short, and that Short was the actual complainant in the suit. The court rendered rather a lengthy decree, reciting many of the facts shown by the evidence. He concluded that the transactions upon which Kelly based his defense, and which had been assailed in the bill, were void, and were subject to the charges of fraud which the complainants had made. But he also concluded that inasmuch as Short, who was the real party complaining and to be benefited by the decree sought, had previously himself been connected with collusive efforts to aid Simpson in concealing his property, and had come into court with "unclean hands," he was not entitled to recover; and upon that ground the court adjudged that all of the costs in the case which had been incurred prior to the sale by the receiver to Morey should be against the defendants, and all of the costs which had been incurred after that time against the complainant, and dismissed the complainant's bill, leaving the parties just where they were before the litigation commenced. This judgment terminated all of the litigation in which Short and Kelly and the appellants Morris and Crow were involved.

On the 30th day of April, 1904, Kelly made a deed to Short, in which he quitclaimed and conveyed all interest he owned in any of the lands involved in the various suits, including the land in controversy. The consideration recited was $600 in cash paid by Short. By this transaction Short obtained conveyances from all those who had purchased at the sales under the various executions issued and levied upon the lands belonging to Simpson.

The case was tried in the court below without a jury, and a judgment rendered awarding one half of the land to Short and the other half to Morris and Crow. From that judgment all parties have appealed; each side complaining of the judgment rendered awarding one-half of the land to the other.

To summarize: The evidences of title upon which the appellee Short relies are the following: Jas. B. Simpson as the common source; Torrans' judgment recovered January 14, 1892, and the abstract filed in Upshur county February 28, 1892; the execution and sale thereunder, and the sheriff's deed to R. T. Torrans May 6, 1895; deed from Torrans to Thos. Kelly February 12, 1896; deed from Thos. Kelly to Wm. Kelly May 18, 1897; and deed from Wm. Kelly to Short in 1904. Short also relied on the following transfers: Judgment in favor of the National Park Bank of New York against Simpson January 16, 1893; execution and sheriff's sale thereunder July 6, 1897, and sheriff's deed of same date to F. M. Hayes, receiver, of the Ninth National Bank of Dallas; deed from Hayes as receiver to A. P. Morey June 27, 1898; and the agreement that Morey was holding for Short. While these transfers and muniments do not embrace all the evidence offered by Short, they are all that may be considered material to be here considered.

Morris and Crow rely upon the following chain of title in addition to some of those above mentioned: Deed from Kelly to them May 23, 1894; deed from Kelly to Sheppard & Jones February 14, 1896; and the subsequent acquisition of this claim of Sheppard & Jones from their heirs, which appears to be regular. Under the evidence and findings of the court it must be conceded that at the time the deed from Kelly to Morris and Crow was executed Kelly had no valid title to any portion of the land in controversy. He was then basing his claim of ownership solely upon the validity of the title acquired by virtue of his judgment and sale thereunder against Cayce. On February 12, 1896, nearly two years after Kelly had executed his deed to Morris and Crow, he acquired the Torrains title. Torrains was the first creditor who fixed a lien on the Upshur county lands. This was done by filing an abstract of his judgment in Upshur county on February 25, 1892. The levy and sale thereafter made carried with it a good title to the purchaser, R. T. Torrains. When Kelly afterwards acquired this title from Torrains it passed with his deed to Short in 1904, unless it previously vested by estoppel on account of his deed and implied warranty to Morris and Crow, or his deed to Sheppard & Jones in 1898. Appellants Morris and Crow claim title through both of these sources, while Short claims that both are equally ineffective for that purpose.

The first question that presents itself is: Did the implied warranty contained in the deed from Wm. Kelly to Morris and Crow in 1894 operate to vest in them the title afterwards acquired by Kelly previous to his transfer to Short? The court below held that it did, but also concluded that it vested only a one-half of Kelly's interest in the land. Upon that issue the court found and concluded as follows: "For the purpose of carrying out said agreement (the written agreement between Short, Kelly, and Simpson to make a common defense to the Camp county suit), Wm. Kelly engaged the services of the defendants, M. L. Morris and W. M. Crow, practicing lawyers of Dallas, Tex., under the firm name of Morris & Crow, agreeing to pay them for their services in case the said lands were recovered against the receiver claiming said lands for the creditors of Jas. B. Simpson's one-half of the land, which would fall to the share of Wm. Kelly under the terms of said written agreement in case the title through Kennet Cayce, or otherwise, was successfully established in said litigation; the only contract being a deed of Kelly's to Morris and Crow for 1,000 acres, undivided, of said land, dated May 23, 1894, which the court construed to be a contract for a contingent fee of one-half the land recovered for Kelly. That on the 23d day of May, 1894, Wm. Kelly executed to M. L. Morris and W. M. Crow his said deed, so construed by me to be such contract conveying an undivided interest of 1,000 acres in said lands described in said deed from J. B. Simpson to Kennet Cayce for a consideration, as stated in said deed, of $5,000 paid in legal service. And the court concludes that said deed was really executed as a contract for a contingent fee as aforesaid and upon the condition that the said Morris and Crow would be successful in the recovery of said lands for the said Wm. Kelly and his associates, and that the said deed to Morris and Crow was to take effect unless the title claimed by said Kelly under Kennet Cayce or T. L. Torrains was established as the result of such litigation, and the Torrains title acquired by Kelly by the aid of Morris and Crow, his attorneys, inures to their benefit under their said prior deed from Kelly. The court concludes as a matter of law that Morris and Crow having acquired their title from Wm. Kelly by a deed in effect a general warranty deed conveying an after-acquired title, and having thereby contracted with Wm. Kelly to receive for their services one-half of any lands recovered by the said Wm. Kelly, and that the said Wm. Kelly having afterwards acquired the title of R. T. Torrains to the land in controversy in this action by his purchase with the defendant Morris' assistance and at his suggestion and advice as his attorney, defendants' rights attached and vested the title in them to one-half said lands, and, said Wm. Kelly having conveyed said lands to the plaintiff herein by quitclaim deed, the one-half interest not passed to defendants passes to plaintiff, thereby enabling the plaintiff to recover to this extent. Therefore Morris and Crow are entitled under their deed from Kelly, construed as a contract for a contingent fee for one-half the land recovered, to one-half of said lands as against this plaintiff."

Morris and Crow assail that part of the judgment which awarded half of the land in controversy to Short, and Short by cross-assignments attacks that portion which awards a half interest to Morris and Crow. It is manifest from the evidence that Morris and Crow must rely for their right to recover any part of the land upon the strength of their deed from Wm. Kelly executed in 1894 and the subsequent acquisition of the title by Kelly when he purchased the Torrains title in 1896 or 1897. It conclusively appears that, when Torrains recovered his judgment against Jas. B. Simpson and filed an abstract of that judgment in the office of the county clerk of Upshur county, he thereby acquired a lien prior to all other claims upon the lands in controversy which were then the property of Simpson. Hence the sale thereafter made under an execution from that judgment passed to the purchaser, R. T. Torrains, a good title, and this was afterwards passed to Wm. Kelly. We find here the only direct and valid chain of transfers which affected the title to the Upshur county lands at that time. The deed from Wm. Kelly to Short, made in 1904, had the effect to invest Short with that title, unless it had previously vested in Morris and Crow by virtue of the implied warranty contained in their deed of 1894.

[1] Short objects to that deed upon the ground that it is void for uncertainty in the description of the property sought to be conveyed. The language of the description is as follows: "One thousand acres of land undivided and a part of a tract of land containing 7,630 and $\frac{9}{10}$ acres, situated in the counties of Camp and Upshur, Texas, on the headright surveys of E. B. Davis, Matthew Cartwright, Vincent Hamilton, Dexter Watson, and Wm. Berryhill; said entire tract fully described in a deed of Kennett Cayce by sheriff to Wm. Kelly, of date January the 2nd, 1894, and recorded in Book K, on page 97, Records of Deeds of Camp County, Texas, to which deed and record reference is here made for a full description of said land." Descriptions equally as vague and very similar to the above have been held sufficient in a number of cases decided by the courts of this state. Dohoney v. Womack, 1 Tex. Civ. App. 354, 19 S. W. 883, 20 S. W. 950; Slack v. Dawes, 3 Tex. Civ. App. 520, 22 S. W. 1053; Peterson v. McCauley, 25 S. W. 828; Byrn v. Kleas, 15 Tex. Civ. App. 205, 39 S. W. 933; Fontaine v. Bohn, 40 S. W. 637; Hinzle v. Robinson, 21 Tex. Civ. App. 9, 50 S. W. 635. The legal effect of the terms employed in the deed above referred to was to convey an interest equal to 1,000 acres in whatever portion of the lands might belong to Wm. Kelly. Fontaine v. Bohn and Hinzle v. Robinson, supra. The trial court sustained the validity of the deed, but construed it as a contract for a half interest in whatever land might thereafter be allotted to Wm. Kelly. He appears to have considered, in connection with the deed, a contract made before the execution of this deed, between Simpson, Kelly, and Short.

[2] He finds as a fact that no other contract except that evidenced by this deed was made between Kelly and Morris & Crow, and this finding is amply supported by the record. His construction of the deed was a conclusion of law rather than a finding of fact, and for that reason is not binding upon this court in the absence of a specific attack assailing the sufficiency of the evidence to support such finding.

[3] The general rule is that, except when attacked for fraud, accident, or mistake, a deed must be construed according to its terms. Galveston, etc., Ry. Co. v. Pfeuffer, 56 Tex. 66; Caffey v. Caffey, 12 Tex. Civ. App. 616, 35 S. W. 738; I. & G. N. Ry. Co. v. Dawson, 62 Tex. 261; Railway Co. v. Jones, 82 Tex. 160, 17 S. W. 534; 9th Ency. of Ev. 437. The deed here involved is not one which properly falls within any of the exceptions to that rule.

[4] A deed absolute upon its face cannot be construed as a contract for a contingent interest, unless there is some evidence of a contract different from that imported by the terms of the instrument. If we must depend upon the deed in question as the only evidence of the contract between Kelly and Morris and Crow, we have no grounds for holding that it conveys an estate different from that which its terms clearly imply. If that be correct, then the deed of Kelly to Morris and Crow must be construed as an absolute conveyance of the fee to 1,000 acres of land, a part of that which was described and referred to; and it had the legal effect of vesting that interest in the grantees immediately upon its delivery, provided Kelly at that time owned what he thus attempted to convey.

[5] Under the findings of the trial judge, which are supported by the undisputed evidence, it must be admitted that when this deed to Morris and Crow was executed in May, 1894, Kelly in fact had no title to the lands involved in this suit, nor to any other land described in the deed to which reference is there made. His rights at that time depended solely upon the validity of Simpson's attempted transfer to Cayce, a fictitious grantee, and the subsequent acquisition by Kelly of whatever interest this fictitious individual may have held in the property. Kelly never in fact acquired any property in the lands involved in this suit, until he purchased from Torrains in 1896, nearly two years after this conveyance to Morris and Crow. At the time he acquired the Torrains title, he and Short were still litigating over their conflicting claims. The right of Morris and Crow, therefore, must now depend upon whether the after-acquired title which Kelly obtained in 1896, when he purchased from Torrains, vested in them by virtue of the implied warranty contained in their prior deed. It will be observed that the instrument contained no express warranty, nor did it contain any language indicating a purpose to limit the warranty which the statute says shall be implied from the use of certain terms. Article 633 of the Revised Civil Statutes of 1895 is as follows: "From the use of the word 'grant' or 'convey,' in any conveyance by which an estate of inheritance or fee simple is to be passed, the following covenants, and none other, on the part of the grantor for himself and his heirs to the grantee, his heirs and assigns, are implied, unless restrained by express terms contained in such conveyance: (1) That previous to the time of the execution of such conveyance the grantor has not conveyed the same estate, or any right, title or interest therein, to any person other than the grantee. (2) That such estate is at the time of the execution of such conveyance free from incumbrances. Such covenants may be sued upon in the same manner as if they had been expressly inserted in the conveyance."

[6] A paramount outstanding title is an "incumbrance" within the meaning of a covenant against incumbrances. Boos v. This- pen, 140 S. W. 1180; Lindsay v. Freeman, 83 Tex. 259, 18 S. W. 727; Garrett v. McClain, 18 Tex. Civ. App. 245, 44 S. W. 47; Warden v. Sabins et al., 36 Kan. 165, 12 Pac. 520; 3 Wash. on Real Prop. (3d Ed.) 393. Where the grantor has at the time of his conveyance no title in the property, the effect of his warranty when the title is thereafter acquired is to immediately transfer the same to his grantee. Baldwin v. Root, 90 Tex. 550, 40 S. W. 3.

[7] Nor is it material, in order that a warranty may have this effect, that a valuable consideration should have been paid by the grantee. Robinson v. Douthit, 64 Tex. 101. If we give this effect to Kelly's deed, then it follows that when he acquired the title from Torrains in 1897 it passed immediately to Morris and Crow, Kelly's grantees in the prior deed. That being true, there was nothing left for him to thereafter convey to Short. The deed from Kelly to Morris and Crow was recorded in Upshur county prior to Kelly's deed to Short in 1904.

[8] The appellee Short contends that Morris and Crow are now estopped from asserting title to this property, because of the answer filed by them in the suit of Hayes, Receiver, v. Kelly et al., in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Texas. No particular portion of the answer is indicated in the argument, but we assume that the following is referred to: "Defendants say that on or about May 23, 1894, Wm. Kelly conveyed to M. L. Morris and W. M. Crow 1,000 acres, undivided, of said land, as compensation for their services in representing him as attorneys in the pending litigation in reference to same, and to take effect as a valid deed in the event the said Wm. Kelly was successful in recovering said land." It was after the filing of this answer that Short purchased from Kelly. Conceding that the statement made in the answer referred to was sufficient to constitute the basis of an equitable estoppel had Short relied thereon, still, in order for it to be made available in this instance, other facts must appear. It must be shown that Short relied upon the facts stated in the pleading referred to and was thereby induced to change his position with reference to the property in controversy so that it would not injure him if compelled to yield to a different claim set up by Morris and Crow. Scoby v. Sweatt, 28 Tex. 713; Mayer v. Ramsey, 46 Tex. 371; Bynum v. Preston, 69 Tex. 292, 6 S. W. 430, 5 Am. St. Rep. 49; Page v. Arnim, 29 Tex. 69; Lewis v. Brown, 39 Tex. Civ. App. 139, 87 S. W. 704. The record contains no evidence that Short relied upon the statements contained in this answer, or was induced thereby to make the purchase; neither is there any evidence that Short paid anything of value to Kelly for the quitclaim deed which he thereafter procured. Our construction of the deed from Kelly to Morris & Crow is that it conveyed 1,000 acres in whatever lands Kelly owned in the tracts described, to be selected by the grantees. There is nothing in the deed which indicated that it was intended to apply to any less quantity. We have concluded therefore that the court erred in holding that Morris and Crow were only entitled to recover a one-half interest in the property in controversy, and in awarding that half to the appellee Short. According to his construction and findings of fact, the deed from Kelly to Morris and Crow was valid. If he was correct in that conclusion, and we think he was, it follows that the instrument should be given its full force and effect.

The judgment will therefore be reformed and rendered, awarding all of the land in controversy to the appellants Morris and Crow, and taxing all costs, both of this court and the court below, against the appellee Short.

On Motion for Rehearing.

[9] The appellee insists in this motion for a rehearing that Morris and Crow show no legal right to the land in controversy, because the evidence shows that their deed was to take effect only in the event that Kelly succeeded in establishing the validity of his title through the proceedings against Cayce. We may concede that this is correct as a legal proposition, but the record does not support that construction of the evidence. Morris testified that no such understanding as that relied on existed. Even if there was evidence to the contrary, it merely presented a case of conflict in which the court below manifestly accepted the testimony of Morris as true, for the judgment in favor of Morris and Crow for any part of the land necessarily involved a finding that their deed was not subject to those conditions. If the deed upon which Morris and Crow relied was incumbered with the conditions and agreements asserted by the appellee, they were not entitled to any portion of the land. A finding in their favor by the trial court for an undivided one-half interest is necessarily a finding against the appellee as to the existence of all or any of the facts upon which he now bases his argument. We not only think the facts disclosed by the record warranted that conclusion, but that it is sustained by the great preponderance of the evidence adduced upon the trial.

The motion for rehearing is therefore overruled.

TARVIN v. TEXAS & P. RY. CO.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Texarkana.
Nov. 25, 1912. Rehearing Denied
Dec. 5, 1912.)

CARRIERS (§ 402*)—INJURY TO PASSENGERS—BAGGAGE.

Where trunks belonging to passengers were loaded into a baggage car containing a corpse and absorbed a stench therefrom which caused persons at the place where they were unloaded to become suspicious, and caused them to be unlawfully searched for a dead body, the carrier was not liable for the humiliation suffered therefrom by the owners of the trunks; such injury not being the proximate result of the carrier's act, nor a result which could have been reasonably anticipated by the carrier.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 1535; Dec. Dig. § 402.*]

Appeal from District Court, Taylor County; Thomas L. Blanton, Judge.

Action by J. Tarvin against the Texas & Pacific Railway Company. From a judgment dismissing plaintiff's petition, he appeals. Affirmed.

T. A. Bledsoe and Dallas Scarborough, both of Abilene, for appellant. J. M. Wagstaff, of Abilene, for appellee.

WILLSON, C. J. In his petition appellant alleged that on July 1, 1911, he and his wife were passengers on one of appellee's trains, destined to Trent, in Taylor county, and that they delivered to appellee, and it undertook to convey as a part of their baggage and deliver to them at Trent, two trunks. Appellant then alleged as follows: "The defendant, the Texas & Pacific Railway Company, negligently and carelessly and in disregard to the rights of this plaintiff and to this plaintiff's rights placed said baggage and trunks in a car with a human corpse, that was so far advanced or in a state of decomposition, or in close proximity with some other matter that had far advanced in a state of decomposition that gave out obnoxious odors, and that said trunks were contaminated and infected with the obnoxious odors to such an extent that trunks themselves smelled as though they contained a human corpse or other matter far advanced in a state of decomposition, and that when said trunks were unloaded at their destination, to wit, Trent, in Taylor county, Tex., that said trunks gave off a very obnoxious odor that smelled like a human corpse far advanced in a state of decomposition, and that by reason of the fact that said trunks were unloaded in the obnoxious condition above described, that the people at the station at Trent, who had assembled at the station when the train came, smelled said stench and obnoxious odor and believed that it contained a corpse of a human body far advanced in a state of decomposition, and that the conduct of the railway company in infecting said trunk with said obnoxious odor was the direct cause of said people believing that said trunk contained a corpse of a human body far advanced in a state of decomposition, and that the people acting upon said obnoxious odor notified the proper authorities of said condition, and that the said officials, believing that said trunks contained the corpse of a human body far advanced in a state of decomposition, authorized and instructed the proper officers to search and examine said trunk to find out whether or not the trunks contained the corpse of a human body. In truth and in fact there was nothing in said trunks that gave off any kind of an obnoxious odor, but that everything in said trunks was in proper form and was clean and sanitary, and there was no stench in said trunks, but that the stench smelled was on the outside of said trunks and was put there by the defendant, the Texas & Pacific Railway Company, and that the actions and conduct of defendant, the Texas & Pacific Railway Company, in unloading said trunks in said condition, were the direct and proximate cause of said trunks being searched, and that the said odor on said trunks created by the conduct and negligence of the defendant, the Texas & Pacific Railway Company, was the direct and proximate cause of the officers searching said trunks and the people in general becoming apprised of the condition of said trunks, and that the fact that said trunks were unloaded at Trent with said stench that the same and the obnoxious odor thereon, all of which facts were known to the neighbors and friends and to himself and wife and to the people of Trent, and the conditions were very humiliating and mortifying to the feelings of the plaintiff and his wife. And the said conduct of the Texas & Pacific Railway Company was the direct and proximate cause of said humiliation and mortification to the feelings of this plaintiff and his wife, and that said mortification and humiliation suffered by the plaintiff and his wife damaged this plaintiff and his wife in the sum of $1,995, for which he here sues. Wherefore, premises considered, plaintiff prays that defendant be cited in the terms of the law to answer this petition, and that upon final hearing hereof he have his judgment of and from the defendant, the Texas & Pacific Railway Company, in the sum of $1,995 and for costs of suit and for other and further relief to which he may be entitled to both in law and equity." The court below, being of the opinion the petition did not state a cause of action, sustained a general demurrer to it, and, on the refusal of appellant to amend, dismissed his suit.

It will be noted that the damages claimed were not on account of injury to the trunks or to the person of either appellant or his wife, but solely on account of humiliation they suffered because people at the station suspected that the trunks concealed a dead body and caused same, without authority of law, for that reason (C. C. P. art. 344), to be searched. We think the court below correctly held that the act of appellee complained of was not a proximate cause of the humiliation suffered by appellant and his wife. In Railway Co. v. Bigham, 90 Tex. 225, 38 S. W. 163, the Supreme Court "announced the doctrine that, in order to constitute negligence, the act or omission must be the proximate cause of an injury, which, in the light of attending circumstances, ought to have been foreseen as a natural and probable consequence of such act or omission." Railway Co. v. Hayter, 93 Tex. 240, 54 S. W. 944, 47 L. R. A. 325, 77 Am. St. Rep. 856. In the Bigham Case the court said: "It ought not to be deemed negligent to do or to fail to do an act which it was not anticipated and should not have been anticipated that it would result in injury to any one. To require this is to demand of human nature a degree of care incompatible with the prosecution of the ordinary avocations of life. It would seem that it is neither a legal nor a moral obligation to guard against that which cannot be foreseen." It is clear, we think, that it reasonably cannot be said that appellee should have anticipated that as a result of the trunks absorbing stench from the corpse people at the station where they were unloaded from the car would suspect they contained the corpse of a human being and have same searched in violation of law.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The judgment is affirmed.

GULF, T. & W. RY. CO. v. STARK.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Texarkana. Nov. 20, 1912. Rehearing Denied Dec. 5, 1912.)

1. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 66*)—ORDER—ACCEPTANCE.

An order drawn by a creditor on his debtor, directing payment to a third person, is not binding on the drawee until presented to and accepted by it; the question of priority as an obligation over other claims against the drawer depending entirely on prior acceptance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bills and Notes, Cent. Dig. § 107; Dec. Dig. § 66.*]

2. SET-OFF AND COUNTERCLAIM (§ 20*)—RIGHT TO SET-OFF—CONTRACT.

Defendant having employed the G. Company to do certain construction work which it procured to be done by F., it was discovered that defendant had overpaid the company $425.04, whereupon it was agreed that F. had been overpaid that much, and that defendant should furnish F. additional work so as to enable him to repay such overpayment. This having been done defendant claimed it was entitled to set off such overpayment against the amount due F. for such additional work as against his assignees. Held that, in the absence of any assignment of the construction company's claim against F. for overpayment, his liability to defendant therefor depended exclusively on an agreement on his part that it might be charged against him, and, in the absence of such agreement, defendant was not entitled to set off such amount against F.'s assignees.

Appeal from Jack County Court; W. E. Fitzgerald, Judge.

Action by Sil Stark against the Gulf, Texas & Western Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Ben B. Cain, of Dallas, Spenser & McClure, of Jacksboro, for appellant. Sil Stark and E. W. Nicholson, both of Jacksboro, for appellee.

HODGES, J. The appellee, Sil Stark, sued the appellant in the county court of Jack county to recover the sum of $950 which he claimed was due from the appellant to one T. W. Fletcher, and which Fletcher had assigned to the appellee. The items of the account as set out in the petition consisted of charges for work and labor performed for the appellant by Fletcher in building dams and reservoirs and in moving dirt in some way connected with the construction of its railroad. Appellant answered by a general denial, and specially pleaded payment of sums amounting to as much as that sued for. It also pleaded settlement on September 1, 1909, and the payment of $311.26 in full of services rendered thereafter. It denied the correctness of several of the items detailed in plaintiff's petition, and the prices charged for the services there specified. It was further pleaded that a number of claims had been paid by appellant at the instance and request of Fletcher prior to the date of the assignment of this account. Among the claims which appellant specially pleaded as having been paid at the instance and request of Fletcher was one for $142.30 to A. J. Birdsong on an order from Fletcher. To this answer the appellee filed a supplemental petition, denying payment and settlement, and alleging other matters not necessary to here state in detail. Appellant filed a supplemental answer, in which, among other things, it was alleged that prior to September 1, 1909, the Griggsby Construction Company had contracted to erect a grade along its line of railway; that in settlement with the construction company for a portion of this work it had by mistake overpaid that company in the sum of $425.04; that this was due to an error in an estimate of the amount of work which had been done by Fletcher, who was then working for the Griggsby Construction Company. It further alleged that thereafter, when the mistake was discovered, it was understood by all parties that Fletcher had been paid $425.04 more than he was entitled to, and that Fletcher agreed with appellant's chief engineer that, in order to enable Fletcher to repay the same to the Griggsby Construction Company, the appellant would give him work to do in the construction of a dam and reservoir at Jermyn, and such other work as the company should need, until the $425.04 had been repaid as agreed on; that Fletcher, with the full knowledge of all that was done, and with the honest intention of repaying to the Griggsby Construction Company and to this defendant company what they had overpaid him, agreed to do the work on that reservoir and such other work as appellant might employ him to perform, and to allow appellant credit thereon for the $425.04. A trial before a jury resulted in a verdict for the appellee for $585.61. A number of assigned errors are presented, but we will only discuss those which we think are subject to some of the objections urged.

In the fifth paragraph of the main charge the court gave the jury the following instruction: "There is one item of payment by defendant company over which there is a question as to precedence or priority; and that is the $142.30 payment to A. J. Birdsong. Now, if you find that at the time the A. J. Birdsong account was presented to the company for payment that said defendant at said time accepted said order or claim, and that this was prior to the notice of the plaintiff's assignment, then plaintiff could not recover for same; on the other hand, if you find that the defendant had notice of the assignment by T. W. Fletcher to plaintiff before said defendant accepted or agreed to pay said account of A. J. Birdsong, then you will find for plaintiff on said item." The evidence shows that two days prior to the assignment by Fletcher to appellee of his claim against the appellant Fletcher had given to Birdsong the following order:

Oct 28.

To Bal. a/c..... $142.30.

Pay A. J. Birdsong the above account.

To Gulf, Texas and Western Ry. Co., Jacksboro, Texas.

O. K. his
T. W. X Fletcher.
mark

[1] If this order is to be treated as merely a draft upon the appellant, drawn by Fletcher in favor of Birdsong, it was not binding upon the appellant until it had been presented to and accepted by it. House v. Kountze, 17 Tex. Civ. App. 402, 43 S. W. 561. Its priority as an obligation over that of the appellee's claim would depend upon its previous acceptance, unless appellee had consented that it might be first satisfied out of what appellant owed Fletcher. There was positive testimony tending to show that ap-pellee had consented that this claim should have preference over his, and had authorized its payment by Witt, the chief engineer of the appellant, whose duty it was to settle such claims. It is unnecessary to refer to this evidence in detail. The charge complained of ignored that defense, and in that respect misdirected the jury to the appellant's prejudice. The sixth paragraph of the court's main charge was calculated to mislead the jury, and we suggest that upon another trial it be omitted entirely, or so modified as to avoid the objections urged.

[2] The seventh paragraph of the court's main charge is as follows: "As to the item of $425 being the alleged overpayment on mlie 112, you are charged that whether or not this claim is a just claim in the first instance you have no concern and will not so consider; but all the facts about which you are to determine is whether or not T. W. Fletcher agreed to pay this claim out of the amount of money coming to him under his contract with defendant, and, unless you find by a preponderance of the evidence herein that said T. W. Fletcher did agree to pay said claim out of this work, you will find for plaintiff on this item." According to appellant's pleading, the right to this credit arose under circumstances practically the same as those set out in its pleading last above referred to. It is clear, we think, from the statement contained in the appellant's last supplemental answer that Fletcher could only be held responsible for the repayment of the $425.04 to the appellant upon an agreement to that effect. If he had been overpaid by the Griggsby Construction Company, he was under the duty of reimbursing that company, and not the appellant, in the absence of some special undertaking to do so. Had the appellant pleaded an assignment of that claim to it by the Griggsby Construction Company, then it might have claimed the right to charge it to Fletcher in their general settlement without his consent; but, in the absence of such an assignment, Fletcher's liability to appellant for that claim would depend exclusively upon an agreement upon his part that it might be charged against him. We should not feel inclined to disturb the judgment because of that charge alone.

The court in another portion of his charge selected particular items of the account in dispute and charged with reference to them in such a manner as to give them undue prominence. Upon another trial that should be avoided.

Because of the errors discussed, the judgment of the court is reversed and the cause remanded.

CARRIERS (§ 123*)—INJURY TO FREIGHT—LOSS—PROXIMATE CAUSE.

Where defendant carrier improperly added a charge for icing to the expense bill of a car of cabbage, shipped by plaintiffs to G. for sale, but this error was not the cause of the consignee's refusal to accept the car and pay a draft attached to bill of lading, which caused a delay resulting in loss from the deterioration of the cabbage, defendant was not liable for such loss because of the addition of the icing charge.

Appeal from Travis County Court; R. E. White, Judge.

Action by W. Quebedeaux and others against T. J. Freeman, as receiver, etc. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed and rendered.

Fisher & Fisher, of Austin, and Wilson & Dabney, of Houston, for appellant.

JENKINS, J. Appellees brought this suit to recover damages to a car load of cabbage, shipped from Austin, Tex., to St. Louis. The alleged cause of action was that said cabbage were shipped without being iced by appellant, and that when they reached St. Louis an expense bill was rendered to the consignee, including $55 for icing, and that by reason thereof the consignee refused to pay said charge and accept the cabbage, on account of which there was a delay of some eight days before the cabbage were delivered, in consequence of which it was greatly damaged. The case was tried before the court without a jury, and the court rendered judgment for appellees for $236.42.

Appellees shipped said cabbage "to shipper's order," with instructions to deliver them to L. Garvy & Co., wholesale produce dealers in St. Louis, and at the same time drew on said Garvy & Co. against said cabbage at the rate of $1.25 per hundred. Garvy & Co. refused to pay the draft and expense bill, by reason of which the railroad company refused to deliver the cabbage. Appellees drew this draft on the supposition that they had an agreement with Garvy & Co. to pay that amount for the cabbage and sell them for the joint account of said Garvy & Co. and appellees upon the division of the amount realized for said cabbage, over and above said $1.25 per hundred and the freight. Appellees' theory was based upon the following telegram: "Austin, January 6th, 1909. L. Garvy & Co. St. Louis, Mo. How is the cabbage market? Car of bulk cabbage ready on Saturday. Would you advance $1.25, handled joint account. [Signed] W. Quebedeaux & Son." To which they received the following reply on the same day: "New cabbage from $40 to $45 a ton here; advise shipping. [Signed] L. Garvy Produce Company." On January 18th, appellees received the following telegram: "Car cabbage here; freight and ice charges $163. Cannot pay draft. Cabbage worth $40 ton here. Release bill of lading and will sell the best advantage. [Signed] L. Garvy & Co." To which appellees on the same day replied as follows: "Understand from your telegram you will advance $1.24. Take care of our draft; if any loss draw on us." To this Garvy & Co. on same day replied: "Wired you cabbage worth $40 to $45. Didn't buy; will not protect draft." On the same day Garvy & Co. wrote appellees that they did not buy the cabbage and that they would not pay the draft; in reply to which, on January 15th, appellees wrote Garvy & Co. as follows: "We have your favor 13th, and note contents. We knew you did not buy the car of cabbage, and while you did not say so in so many words that you would advance $1.25, your telegram led us to think you would do so, and your letter confirms the impression that you intended to do so until you were advised that there was an icing charge. There should not be an icing charge, so we wired you to pay the draft and draw back on us for $50, and now will ask you to attach expense bill if you have not already drawn, and if so, we will pay the draft, etc." On the same day appellees wrote Garvy & Co. another letter, as follows: "Both your letter and wire indicated that you would advance $1.25 per hundred pounds on car of cabbage, and the only excuse you offer is that you did not think there would be any icing charges, and there should not have been. We feel that we have been badly treated in the matter, and whatever loss we may sustain we will place in the hands of our attorney, with instructions to make claim on the railroad company and yourselves for it." Garvy & Co. were not made parties to this suit.

On January 18th, appellees sent the following telegram to Hauelsen Bros., wholesale produce dealers at St. Louis: "This will be authority agent Iron Mountain deliver car without bill of lading." In the meantime the railroad company had admitted that the charge for icing was error. Hauelsen Bros. disposed of the cabbage at from $20 to $30 per ton.

L. Garvy, of the firm of Garvy & Co., testified by deposition as follows: "I did not buy the cabbage involved in this suit in the first place. I had some correspondence with Quebedeaux & Co., and they shipped this car and notified me, and when it came here I was surprised because I did not buy it. I said I would handle it for their account, because cabbage was in damaged condition. Immediately upon being notified, I examined the car and found the cabbage in a damaged condition, and therefore I sent telegram to

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes.

Quebedeaux & Co. under date of January 15, 1909, which read as follows: 'Didn't buy cabbage, won't pay draft. Release bill of lading; handle for your account only.' My firm did not accept cabbage upon arrival in St. Louis; declined because I did not buy it. The reason I declined the car was not because expense bill called for icing charges, which made the total bill $163.20 instead of $108, as I did not get the expense bill until after the car had been examined and found to be defective."

There is no evidence in the record to contradict this statement of Garvy that he did not refuse the shipment on account of the erroneous icing charge. Under the undisputed evidence, appellees' cause of action is not sustained, for which reason the judgment of the trial court is reversed, and judgment here rendered in favor of appellant.

Reversed and rendered.

1. DEATH (§ 52*)—DAMAGES—PLEADING—SUFFICIENCY.

An allegation of the petition, in an action for the wrongful death of plaintiff's father, that the deceased would have continued to render pecuniary aid to plaintiff was not objectionable as alleging damages which were remote, argumentative, and speculative.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Death, Cent. Dig. § 69; Dec. Dig. § 52.*]

2. DEATH (§ 52*)—DAMAGES—PLEADING—SUFFICIENCY.

Where the petition, in an action for the wrongful death of plaintiff's father, in addition to alleging that the decedent earned a certain amount per month, of which plaintiff received a large part, also alleged that plaintiff was damaged in a certain total sum by the decedent's death, an objection to the former allegation as too uncertain was properly overruled.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Death, Cent. Dig. § 69; Dec. Dig. § 52.*]

3. DEATH (§ 31*)—RIGHT OF ACTION.

Where plaintiff's father rendered pecuniary assistance to plaintiff's family in aid of plaintiff, and not as a mere gift to some member of the family, and there was a reasonable probability that such aid would have continued, plaintiff may recover damages for the wrongful death of his father, which causes a discontinuance of such aid.

4. DEATH (§ 103*)—ACTION FOR DAMAGES—JURY QUESTION.

In an action for the wrongful death of plaintiff's father, which caused a cessation of pecuniary aid rendered to plaintiff's family by his father, the question whether the aid was primarily for plaintiff's assistance, or as a gift to members of his family, was for the jury.

Appeal from District Court, Comal County; F. J. Maier, Special Judge.

Action by Manuel Morales against Thomas J. Freeman, Receiver. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Fisher & Fisher, of Austin, and Wilson & Dabney, of Houston, for appellant. T. C. Johnson and Will G. Barber, both of San Marcos, for appellee.

KEY, C. J. On the 13th day of July, 1910, Rafael Morales was killed by a car on the International & Great Northern Railroad, operated by T. J. Freeman as receiver, and Manuel Morales, his son, and only person entitled to sue, brought this action against Freeman for damages, and obtained a verdict and judgment for $1,000, to reverse which Freeman prosecutes this appeal.

The first, ninth, and tenth assignments of error complain because the trial court overruled certain special exceptions to the plaintiff's petition.

[1] One of the exceptions objected to so much of the petition as sought to allege that the deceased, Rafael Morales, would have continued to render pecuniary aid to the plaintiff, and that the aid and assistance alleged was remote, argumentative, and speculative. Tested by the rule announced and applied in S. A. & A. P. Ry. Co. v. Long, 87 Tex. 152, 27 S. W. 113, 24 L. R. A. 637, 47 Am. St. Rep. 87, we hold that the petition is not obnoxious to the objection urged.

[2] One of the exceptions was addressed to so much of the petition as sought to allege that Rafael Morales earned not less than $40 per month, of which plaintiff received the benefit of a large amount; the objection being that the allegation referred to was too vague and uncertain. If that was the only allegation in the petition tending to show liability, the objection urged might be tenable; but there were other allegations, one of which was that as a result of the death of Rafael Morales the plaintiff was damaged in the sum of $15,000. We hold that no error was committed in overruling the objection referred to.

[3] Another exception complained of a certain paragraph of the petition, which reads as follows: "That this plaintiff, at the date of such death, was a married man with a wife and two small children; that said Rafael Morales made his home with plaintiff's family, and devoted his earnings largely to the support and maintenance of plaintiff and his said family." The action of the court in overruling that exception and in admitting certain testimony hereinafter referred to is made the subject of the first and second assignments of error, which are submitted together, and under which assignments appellant submits but two propositions, which are, in effect, first, that the statute authorizing the recovery of damages for injuries resulting in death limit such right to the surviving husband, wife, children, and parents of the person killed, and that such right cannot be extended to any persons other than those specified in the statute; and, second, that where the person suing is not receiving actual pecuniary aid from the deceased, or has no reasonable expectation of receiving such aid, such person has no right of action. The correctness of these propositions may be conceded; but it does not follow from such concession that the plaintiff's petition failed to state a cause of action, or that the court committed reversible error in not striking out the particular allegation referred to and quoted above. It will be noted that the paragraph of the petition excepted to alleged that the deceased devoted his earnings largely to the support and maintenance of the plaintiff and his family, and not exclusively to the support of his family, as the defendant's exception seems to imply. If appellant had any right to have any part of the pleading referred to stricken out, it was only the last four words "and his said family." But we do not hold that appellant had such right, and agree with counsel for appellee that pecuniary aid may be rendered to one who has a family dependent upon him, and for whose support and maintenance he is legally bound, by furnishing part or all of such support, and thereby relieving him from so doing. The true test is whether or not the intention of the donor was to furnish pecuniary aid to the relative suing, or to make a gift to some member of his family. If such aid was rendered with the former intention, and there was reasonable probability that it would have continued in the future, the person suing can maintain the action; but if such aid was furnished and intended as a gift, not to the plaintiff, but to some member of his family, then the action cannot be maintained. Hence we hold that no error was committed in overruling the exception to the plaintiff's petition as set out above, and this ruling virtually disposes of the objection interposed to the testimony hereafter referred to.

[4] Over appellant's objection, the plaintiff's counsel was permitted to ask him if his father rendered him any assistance in the support of his family, and he answered: "What he [deceased] had over, he would always give to me." And replying to another question propounded by his counsel, he said: "He gave it to me to buy clothing for the children." And responding to a question asking about how much his father contributed on a weekly average to the family support, he answered, "He would give me $4 and keep $2 when he made $6 a week." For the reasons already stated, we hold that this testimony was admissible, and that it was the province of the jury to determine whether the deceased intended the donations referred to primarily as aid and assistance to the plaintiff, or as gifts to members of his family.

[5] Several objections were urged against the court's charge, and rulings refusing requested instructions. The objections referred to are not regarded as tenable, and the points presented are not of such importance as to require specific discussion in this opinion. Only two objections are urged against the verdict, and one is presented under an assignment complaining of the action of the court in refusing to instruct a verdict for defendant, and the other charges that the verdict of the jury is excessive, outrageous, and unconscionable, "because the evidence indisputably disclosed that the plaintiff was an adult, nearly 40 years of age, to whom deceased owed no legal duty of maintenance or support; and there was no evidence that during the life of deceased he had actually contributed pecuniary aid to the plaintiff—the preponderant weight of evidence, if not the undisputed and uncontroverted evidence, disclosing that whatever pecuniary aid was contributed by deceased was not to plaintiff, but to his grandchildren." That assignment is submitted as a proposition, and it is not followed up by any other proposition. We overrule the assignment, because it is not supported by the record, which shows that there was evidence tending to prove that the deceased had contributed some pecuniary aid to the plaintiff.

Whether or not the verdict is excessive, because it allowed the plaintiff more than the deceased would probably have contributed as pecuniary aid to the plaintiff, if he had not been killed, is a question that is not presented for decision, and upon which we express no opinion. We merely hold that, in so far as it is complained of in this court, the verdict of the jury is supported by testimony.

No reversible error has been pointed out, and the judgment is affirmed.

Affirmed.

SWIFT & CO. v. ALLEN et al.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Texarkana.
Nov. 27, 1912. Rehearing Denied
Dec. 12, 1912.)

TORTS (§ 10*)—INTERFERENCE WITH EMPLOYMENT OR OCCUPATION—RIGHT OF ACTION.

Plaintiff, an express messenger, in violation of the company's rule prohibiting employes from soliciting or handling commodities of any kind forwarded by express on their personal account, engaged in the egg business at a profit. The manager of defendant company, engaged in the same business, after urging plaintiff to agree to a price for eggs, and without knowledge of the express company's rule or malice toward plaintiff, informed the express company, and in consideration of the business it gave the company requested that plaintiff discontinue such business, but in a talk with plaintiff said that he would not object to fair competition at a fixed place of business, and at no time interfered with plaintiff's customers. The express company, as a result of the letter, required plaintiff to discontinue his personal activity, but permitted him to be a silent partner in a firm in the same business, from which he had a profit, but finally discharged him. Plaintiff, as messenger, had access to papers enabling him to learn who defendant's customers were, so that he might become an unfair competitor. Held, that while every one has a right to the advantages of his industry and enterprise, and to be free from malicious or wanton interference, he cannot be protected against competition, and that plaintiff had no action for an interference with his occupation in the way of fair competition, as to which defendant's rights as to the express company were equal to those of the plaintiff.

Appeal from District Court, Bowie County; P. A. Turner, Judge.

Action by Jas. R. Allen and others for an injunction against Swift & Co. and the Pacific Express Company. Judgment for plaintiff against Swift & Co. and judgment for Pacific Express Company, and Swift & Co. appeals. Reversed, and judgment rendered for Swift & Co.

The suit was brought by the appellee jointly against Swift & Co. and the Pacific Express Company for damages claimed to have been occasioned to him by reason of an alleged wanton and malicious intermeddling and interference with his business, and causing his discharge as an employé of the express company. Appellee was in the employ of the express company as a messenger in December, 1908, and for about eight years prior thereto. His duties were to handle express on the train between Texarkana and Whitesboro, Tex. His employment by the express company as messenger was by the month only, at a fixed salary. While and during the time appellee was employed as messenger of the express company he established for himself and conducted in person a profitable business of buying and selling eggs and turkeys to supply the hotels, restaurants, and merchants of Texarkana. He handled from 2,000 to 4,000 dozen eggs a month. The eggs and turkeys were purchased by appellee from the merchants and dealers at the different stations along the route of his express service, and they would ship to him by express to Texarkana, paying the regular charges of the company. The express company had in force the following rule, known to appellee: "Employés whose services are engaged exclusively by this company are absolutely prohibited from soliciting or handling for their personal account commodities of any kind forwarded by express on commission or speculation." The agent at Texarkana and the route agent of the express company, it seems, knew that appellee was engaged in the business contrary to the rules, but never said anything to him in reference thereto. Swift & Co. was engaged in handling and supplying the trade in Texarkana with different kinds of meat and cold storage eggs and fowls, and was a patron of the express company. Stating it in the language of the appellee: "About December 1, 1908, Mullin, manager and solicitor of business for Swift & Co. at Texarkana, mentioned my business to me. He was just talking in regard to the egg business and about them being a little scarce along about then, getting near Christmas, and he asked me at what price I would sell him, and I told him 28 cents a dozen. He said that was not enough; that I ought to get 30 cents; and I told him the rest of them were selling at 28 cents and I could afford to sell for that. Well, he wanted me to raise the price to 30 cents to all except Bussey Bros., who were good patrons, and he would continue to furnish them at 28 cents. I told him as long as other parties were selling at 28 cents I could not make any agreement to go higher on it. I think that is all that occurred at that time until after Mr. Mullin had taken up the matter with the company, and requested them to have me discontinue." On December 21, 1908, the following letter was written and delivered to the express company: "T. N. Edgell, Supt. Pac. Exp. Co., Dallas, Tex.—Dear Sir: We respectfully call your attention to the fact that one of your employés, Mr. J. R. Allen, is shipping in eggs to this point and entering into competition with us. Inasmuch as we give you the preference on all business and consequently do considerable volume with you, we would ask that you cause the above-named party to discontinue his activity along this line that will come in competition with us. We are taking this matter up with you direct in preference to taking same up with our railroad department, as we feel satisfied that you will give the matter attention at once. Thanking you in advance for an early reply, we are, Yours respectfully, Swift & Company, per C. W. Mullin, Manager." The record admits the fact that Swift & Co. did nothing more than write this letter of complaint. The superintendent at once inclosed the letter to the appellee. The appellee, upon receiving this correspondence, went to the manager of Swift & Co., and told him of the correspondence, and asked him if he would not withdraw the complaint. According to the testimony of appellee, the manager replied that he could not, as I was competing with them, and that he understood I was selling eggs at a price for a profit that they could not afford to handle eggs at, as I have no regular place of business here he could not afford to withdraw his complaint. He said if I would engage exclusively in the business and go in competition with them in the right kind of a way, and get me a house and compete with them openly, that he had no objection, but that he would not withdraw his complaint. This was somewhere between the 1st and 10th of January, 1909." The ap-pellee then wrote a letter to the superintendent, and in reply received the following letter: "This is to acknowledge receipt of your letter of January 10, and I am inclosing an excerpt from monthly circular No. 95, paragraph No. 8, page 648, also a copy of the recommendation of the Interstate Commerce Commission to the U. S. Senate. While the name of messengers are not used, this prohibits the agents from doing what you are doing, and there is no reason why the agents should be forbidden to do so, and not the messengers. I trust that you will see the wisdom of this, and discontinue the egg traffic or resign your position as messenger and go into the egg business exclusively. They do not go well together, and in many instances I have found that it results in a loss of business to the company, which I am here to prevent." Upon receipt of this letter appellee then wrote the superintendent, asking him if he had any objections to his continuing the business, provided he ceased to be actively engaged in the business. The superintendent then wrote the route agent as follows: "There is no objection whatever in having Mr. Allen interested in the commission firm, but he must not be an active partner while in the employ of this company." This reply was shown to appellee, and he then engaged thereafter in the same business with C. W. Williamson, under the name of C. W. Williamson & Co., and he ceased to be an active partner in carrying on that business while he was a messenger. The business was thus carried on till January, 1910. Appellee was discharged from the service of the express company about the 4th or 5th of January, 1910. It appears that appellee made from $40 to $60 a month out of the business before he went into partnership with Williamson. After the partnership, it appears from the record that appellee cleared $40 only. Appellee claims the loss from partnership to have been because he could not actively himself handle and solicit the business. By his petition appellee predicates liability for the loss upon the following grounds: (1) That the Pacific Express Company and Swift & Co. did "maliciously and wickedly conspire together for the express purpose of preventing the plaintiff from buying and selling to his said customers eggs and poultry, and in consequence of such malicious and wicked conspiracy between the said defendants plaintiff was prevented from engaging in said business and the same was ruined"; (2) "that Swift & Co. for the purpose of stifling competition, and in conspiracy against trade, did maliciously demand of the Pacific Express Company that said company cause the plaintiff to cease his business as a dealer and shipper and supplier of the trade as aforesaid, and did demand that said company discharge plaintiff from its service if he continued to engage in the legitimate business aforesaid, and that the said Pacific Express Company, at the instigation and unlawful interference on the part of Swift & Co., did demand of plaintiff that he either discontinue his business or it would discharge him from its service;" and (3) "that the said defendant, Swift & Co., maliciously induced the defendant Pacific Express Company by threats of withdrawing its patronage from it to break off this plaintiff's business and to finally discharge the plaintiff from its service, to the end that it might, contrary to the laws of the state of Texas, have a monopoly of the egg business in Texas and be able to fix and control the price thereof to its, Swift & Co.'s, great benefit." The trial was to a jury, and the jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff against Swift & Co. The court gave a peremptory instruction in favor of the express company.

Glass, Estes, King & Burford, of Texarkana, for appellant. Smelser & Vaughan, of Texarkana, for appellees.

LEVY, J. (after stating the facts as above). By the first assignment of error the appellant, Swift & Co., predicates error upon the refusal of the court to peremptorily instruct a verdict in its favor. A verdict was directed in favor of the express company and the court in his charge excluded any claim for damages against Swift & Co. other than for the alleged ruin of appellee's egg and poultry business. In the absence of any complaint, as here, of the court's ruling applicable to such peremptory instructions, and there being a jury finding and judgment thereon, we must assume acquiescence in such rulings and the conclusiveness of the same as to this appeal. Any question as to liability at all of the express company, and any question of liability of Swift & Co. for alleged wrongfully procuring or causing the appellee's discharge from service as a messenger, would therefore be entirely eliminated from the appeal. Consequently the question remaining here is as to whether or not the court should have also directed a verdict in favor of Swift & Co. under the alleged complaint that it had effected and caused the ruin of appellee's egg and poultry business by wanton and malicious interference with it. There is no dispute in the facts, and it is not asserted by the parties that there is any conflict of evidence, unless it be that bearing on the question of damages.

The material facts appearing from the evidence, so far as essential to be stated for the purposes of the question under review, are that appellee Allen, while under employment as a messenger of the Pacific Express Company, was personally engaged in buying up turkeys and eggs from dealers along his route, and having them shipped to him by express to Texarkana, and there selling them to customers. Swift & Co. were also engaged in the poultry and egg business in Texarkana, and were patrons of the express company. On December 21, 1908, the manager for Swift & Co. at Texarkana wrote a letter to the superintendent of the express company calling attention to the fact that Allen, its messenger, was shipping in eggs to Texarkana, and entering into competition with it, and to the further fact that it was a patron of the express company, and asked that the express company "cause the above-named party to discontinue his activity along this line that will come in competition with us." The express company referred the letter to Allen, with the result that Allen was required by the express company, in order to continue in its employ as messenger, to discontinue personally handling or actively carrying on the commission business while performing the duties of a messenger. But the express company consented that he might continue interested in the business as a silent partner of a firm, which was done thereafter under the name of Williamson & Co. The express company had a rule, known to appellee, but it does not appear Swift & Co. knew it, which reads: "Employees whose services are engaged exclusively by this company are absolutely prohibited from soliciting or handling for their personal account commodities of any kind forwarded by express on commission or speculation." Swift & Co. did not do or say anything more to the express company, as the record admits, in reference to appellee's business, or the appellee himself, than to write the letter of December 21, 1908. Prior to writing the letter the manager for Swift & Co. had a conversation with Allen to the effect of insisting that appellee should sell eggs at 30 cents, instead of 28 cents, per dozen. After the letter of December 21st was referred to Allen, he called on the manager of Swift & Co. to withdraw the complaint in the letter, and the manager replied to the effect that he would not withdraw the complaint to the express company, unless appellee would agree to engage exclusively in the egg and poultry business. It is upon this letter of December 21st to the express company, coupled with the two conversations of Mullin with him, that appellee relies to sustain a cause of action for wanton and malicious interference with his commission business. It may be said from the first conversation of Mullin with appellee, happening prior to the letter to the express company, that it appears clearly enough that the object or motive on Mullin's part was to have appellee agree to raise the selling price of eggs to what Mullin claimed was the only price he could afford to sell them at. But the purpose to injure appellee in his business as such is not evident from either the first or second conversation. In the second conversation it is clear that the only purpose Mullin had was to have appellee either follow the service of messenger, or go exclusively into the commission business. It can be assumed, as proven, that the letter written by Mullin to the express company caused the express company to enforce its rule heretofore mentioned against Allen, and that by its enforcement Allen lost an advantage to him in his business of solely conducting it without partnership, along with his messenger service, that he would have been able to attain or enjoy but for the letter of complaint, unless sooner terminated by the express company by enforcement of its rule on its own motion. As it is not shown nor contended in the case that either the express company or Swift & Co. induced any of the customers or parties selling to appellee to break their contracts with him, or not to deal with him, neither the case nor the principle applied in the case of Raymond v. Yarrington, 96 Tex. 443, 73 S. W. 800, 62 L. R. A. 962, 97 Am. St. Rep. 914, would rule the question here. See 2 Page on Contracts, p. 2046; Angle v. Railway Co., 151 U. S. 1, 14 Sup. Ct. 240, 38 L. Ed. 53. And, as there is no pretense in the facts that there were direct acts of interference or molestation in the conduct of appellee's business, as in the case of Dunshee v. Standard Oil Co. 152 Iowa, 618, 132 N. W. 371, 36 L. R. A. (N. S.) 263, cited by appellee and relied on by him, the principle there applied could not have force and application to the facts here. It is a significant fact here that the existence of the appellee's asserted right to continue unmolested in his dual capacity as messenger of a public service corporation and commission merchant was not a matter of contract with the express company. On the contrary, it was a violation of the promulgated and known rule of the express company. The defeat of the right, if so, to continue the business and the agency together for benefit to appellee, could not therefore be related to any contract right with the express company and Allen so to do, so far as the pursuit of the commission business was concerned. It is the aim of the law to protect every person against the wrongful act of every other person, and the law has provided an action for injuries done by disturbing a person in the enjoyment of any right or privilege he has. The principle has thus been laid down in Walker v. Cronin, 107 Mass. 555: "Every one has a right to enjoy the fruits and advantages of his own enterprise, industry, skill, and credit. He has no right to be protected against competition; but he has a right to be free from malicious and wanton interference, disturbance or annoyance. If disturbance or loss come as a result of competition or the exercise of rights by others, it is damnum absque injuria unless some superior right by contract or otherwise is interfered with. But, if it comes from the merely wanton or malicious acts of others without the justification of competition or the service of any interest or lawful purpose, it then stands upon a different footing." See, also, 2 Cooley on Torts, p. 536; 1 Cyc. 650. Following this principle, in order to constitute the letter of December 21st an actionable wrong, there must be a violation of some definite legal right of the appellee. Allen, as a messenger in a public service corporation, was in a position to examine all the waybills, and to learn who the customers of Swift & Co. were and the amount of express it was doing in Texarkana; and being in the same business himself, and armed with this information obtained or obtainable by virtue of his employment as messenger, he could become an unfair competitor. The policy requiring public service corporations to treat all patrons alike and accord equal advantages to all shippers without discrimination would not sanction, we think, the idea that the express company properly could authorize or permit its employes to obtain such information and trade advantages for their own personal benefit by virtue of their employment as would enable them to use such information to their personal advantage as against patrons of the express company in the same line of business. In this view, then, appellee's right to use his employment in the public service corporation in connection with or as a means to assist him in carrying on his business to his advantage was not a right so superior to the appellant's right to complain and protest as to such methods as to be free from molestation by the appellant or the express company itself. If the appellant in the facts had the right in the interest of its business, as it did, to complain to the public service corporation that its employe was using his employment as he was to further his private business in competition with appellant, then such letter of complaint written by appellant to the express company would bring the act of appellant in making such complaint under the shelter of the principle of trade competition, and would not be a ground for action. Appellant in writing the letter of complaint was serving, it must be said from the facts, a purpose connected with its own business and founded on that purpose; and, being a complaint moving from a disposition only to protect its business, it could not be said that the act of appellant was done wantonly and without interest or occasion to do same. The letter contained presentation of reasons, not in themselves unlawful, why he should not continue as messenger and still be in a competitive business with a patron of the express company. The force of the letter, as seen, reached only to the purpose to have the express company "cause the above-named party to discontinue his activity along this line that will come in competition with us." As under the facts the object sought, and also the means used by appellant in complaining to the express company, was no broader than justified, the appellant was entitled to a verdict in its favor. The assignment therefore should be sustained, and the judgment here rendered which should have been rendered below, that the appellee have and recover nothing of Swift & Co., and that appellant recover all costs of appeal and of the court below.

The judgment not appealed from will remain undisturbed.

S. W. SLAYDEN & CO. v. PALMO.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Austin. April 17, 1912. On Motion for Rehearing, Oct. 23, 1912. Rehearing Denied Dec. 4, 1912.)

On Rehearing.

1. EVIDENCE (§§ 213, 241*)—WITNESSES (§ 379*)—ADMISSIONS.

In an action on contract, evidence that defendant's agent said that he would advise defendant to settle was admissible to disprove an averment in the answer that plaintiff had abandoned his contract, but not to impeach the testimony of the agent or to show an offer to compromise.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 745-751, 753, 887-892; Dec. Dig. §§ 213, 241.* Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 1209, 1220-1222, 1247-1256; Dec. Dig. § 379.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1050*)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—EVIDENCE.

Where testimony substantially the same as some complained of was not objected to, a case will not be reversed even if the testimony complained of was not admissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1068, 1069, 4153-4157, 4166; Dec. Dig. § 1050.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1006*)—EVIDENCE—SUCCESSIVE VERDICTS.

Where the jury has given the plaintiff a verdict three times, although the evidence in support thereof is meager, the verdict will be permitted to stand; but the mere fact that there have been three verdicts for plaintiff should not prevent this court from reviewing the evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3951-3954; Dec. Dig. § 1006.*]

Appeal from District Court, McLennan County; Marshall Surratt, Judge.

Action by Mi Palmo against S. W. Slayden & Co. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. E. Yantis, of San Antonio, and Clark & Clark, of Waco, for appellant. O. L. Stribling and Downs & Webb, all of Waco, for appellee.

KEY, C. J. This case has been before this court several times, and the nature of the suit and the rulings heretofore made can be ascertained by examining 90 S. W. 908, 100 Tex. 13, 92 S. W. 796, and 53 Tex. Civ. App. 227, 117 S. W. 1054. Upon the last appeal this court held that the contract purporting to have been made by S. W. Slayden & Co., and for a breach of which appellee is seeking to recover damages, was not within the scope of the partnership business of that company, and was not binding upon S. W. Slayden, against whom recovery was had, unless it could be shown that after it was made S. W. Slayden had ratified the same. The case was reversed and that issue left open for trial; and at another hearing the jury decided it in favor of Palmo and against S. W. Slayden, and the latter has appealed.

While a number of other questions have been presented in appellant's brief and received consideration at our hands, we are of opinion that none of the assignments point out reversible error, except the nineteenth and twentieth, and those which challenge the verdict as being contrary to the great weight and preponderance of the evidence. The bill of exception copied in appellant's brief under the nineteenth assignment of error shows that, in overruling an objection which appellants had made to a question propounded to the plaintiff while testifying in his own behalf, the trial judge used the following language in the presence of the jury: "The court is of the opinion that all the facts and circumstances surrounding this contract can be proven, and surrounding the making of the contract sued upon, and also the making of the contract with Rowland. There was such a trade relation existing between Palmo and Slayden or Slayden and Palmo as renders it necessary, in order for the court and jury to understand and determine this case according to its true merits, to understand all those facts, and they will be taken by the jury and considered by them in arriving at what were the true facts in regard to it, and the court will not limit at all the evidence to what is stated simply in those contracts. All these surrounding circumstances, the facts and circumstances leading up to it, and the purposes of the party or parties, and with what view the Rowland contract was made and was attempted to be carried through, I think can be shown. It is one of the issues in this case, and that very purpose is one of the issues in this case. If it was one way the effect of it would be different than it was if it was another, and it is for the jury to determine, and without the facts they cannot determine which way it was."

The bill shows that appellant's counsel excepted to that portion of the judge's remarks in which he stated in the presence of the jury, that there was "a trade relation existing between the plaintiff and the defendant," and that exception constitutes the basis of the nineteenth assignment of error; and, in view of the long line of decisions by our Supreme Court, we feel constrained to sustain appellant's contention, and hold that the statement referred to constitutes reversible error. We have a statute which prohibits a trial judge from commenting upon the weight of testimony in charging the jury; and, on account of that statute, our Supreme Court has held that it is reversible error for a trial judge to in any manner state or intimate to the jury his opinion as to how any controverted issue should be decided, or the weight that should be given to any testimony bearing upon such issue. In the case at bar this court had held that appellee had no case, unless he could show that appellant had ratified or adopted the contract sued on, and that he was endeavoring to do at the last trial; and no doubt appellant's counsel were then contending in that court, as they are now contending in this court, that the plaintiff had failed to make such proof, and therefore, in view of the line of decisions referred to, we hold that it was error for the trial court to make the statement complained of in reference to a trade relation existing between Palmo and Slayden.

By the twentieth assignment appellant complains of the ruling of the trial court in permitting Judge Richard I. Munroe, while testifying for appellee, to state that one Lastinger had told him that he would advise appellant to accept the witness' offer to settle the matter in controversy in the manner suggested by the witness. Conceding that Lastinger was appellant's agent in many other respects, the evidence fails to disclose that he had any authority to ratify the contract here sued on, or to accept the proposition submitted to him by the witness, and therefore the court erred in permitting Judge Munroe to state what he said he would advise appellant to do. The result was that, over the defendant's objection, the plaintiff got before the jury evidence to the effect that the defendant's agent Lastinger had recognized the fact that the plaintiff's claim was meritorious, and had advised the defendant to accept a proposition submitted by the plaintiff's counsel for a settlement. Ratification results alone from what has been done or said by the person sought to be held liable, and not from what has been done or said by an agent of such person, unless, by the terms of his agency, such agent has authority to ratify, which was not shown in this case. Hence we hold that the evidence referred to was not admissible, and that it was harmful to appellant is quite obvious. In fact, it formed the basis for an appeal and argument to the jury which may account for a verdict which otherwise appears to be contrary to the great weight of the evidence.

It is insisted on behalf of appellant that the verdict in appellee's favor is not supported by the testimony, and that this court should reverse and render judgment for appellant. The evidence tending to show ratification is meager and unsatisfactory, but we have reached the conclusion that the case should be reversed and remanded for ah-other trial in the court below, and it is so ordered.

Reversed and remanded.

On Motion for Rehearing.

This case was reversed at the last term of this court, and appellee's motion for rehearing was brought over to this term; and, after careful consideration, we have reached the conclusion that the former judgment of this court is wrong, and that the case should be affirmed. As shown by our former opinion, the case was reversed upon two questions of law, which were: First, error of the trial judge in stating in the presence of the jury, while ruling upon the admissibility of certain testimony, that there was a trade relation existing between the plaintiff and the defendant; and, second, in overruling objections to testimony given by Judge Munroe to the effect that appellant's agent Lastinger had told him that he would advise appellant to accept Judge Munroe's offer to settle the matter in controversy in the manner suggested. Undisputed testimony coming from witnesses on both sides shows that at the time of the transaction in question business relations had existed between appellee and appellant for a long time, and therefore the remarks made by the judge and complained of by appellant were not calculated to prejudice the latter and the making of such remarks did not constitute reversible error.

[1] As to the testimony of Judge Munroe, appellant alleged in his answer that appellee abandoned the contract, and it may be that the testimony was admissible for the purpose of disproving that averment. According to the bill of exception, the only objection made in the court below to the testimony was that of immateriality, for the reason that the expression of an opinion by an agent cannot be used for the purpose of impeachment, if offered as contradictory testimony. Lastinger testified that he had no recollection of making the statement testified to by Judge Munroe, but he did not deny that he had made such statement, and it does not appear from the record that the testimony was offered for the purpose of impeachment. If Lastinger was appellant's agent and had plenary powers including authority to act for appellant in the particular matter, the testimony was admissible because it tended to show an admission by an authorized agent, unless obnoxious to the objection that it tended to prove an offer or willingness to compromise, which objection was not made. We cannot hold that the testimony was immaterial, and that seems to be the only objection that was urged against it.

[2] Furthermore, testimony substantially the same as that complained of was given by appellee, Palmo, and was not objected to by appellant, and for that reason the case should not be reversed, even if Judge Munroe's testimony was not admissible. Appellee testified: "I went to Mr. Lastinger with reference to this contract, and Judge Munroe said, 'Why don't you kinder get this matter straight, Mr. Lastinger?' Mr. Lastinger spoke and said, 'Well, it ought to be settled.' Judge, he said, 'Well, why don't you settle it?' 'Well,' he said, 'I don't know. I am going to write to Mr. Slayden and make him settle it.'" We perceive no difference in substance between the testimony of Judge Munroe that was objected to and the testimony given by appellee that was not objected to, and, as Lastinger did not deny making the statement, we hold that the case should not be reversed on account of the admission of Judge Munroe's testimony.

[3] We have also reconsidered the testimony bearing upon the merits of the case, and while that tending to support the verdict is not entirely satisfactory, as reflected by the statement of facts, we cannot hold that there is no testimony to support the verdict. In order to find for the plaintiff, the court's charge required the jury to find that appellant had ratified the contract sued upon. There was some testimony, and especially that given by the plaintiff while on the stand as a witness, tending to show that the defendant Slayden in person had ratified and adopted the contract. There was also testimony tending to show that W. H. Lastinger was Slayden's agent with plenary powers, and that acting as such agent he had ratified and adopted the contract for Slayden. This is the third time that the jury has rendered a verdict in favor of appellee, and therefore, although the testimony in support of the verdict seems meager and unsatisfactory, nevertheless, being the third verdict to the same effect, and the trial judge having refused to set it aside, we think it should be permitted to stand, and thereby terminate the litigation.

For the reasons stated, and in deference to the finding of the jury, we hold that the verdict is supported by testimony; but before leaving this subject we deem it proper to say that we cannot agree with the apparent contention of appellee's counsel that, because this is the third verdict in appellee's favor, it should not be reviewed by this court, no matter what testimony may or may not have been presented to the jury. In support of that contention, counsel for appellee attribute to the Supreme Court a statement in the syllabus in Duggan v. Cole, 2 Tex. 396, which reads: "A second verdict will not be set aside as being contrary to and unsupported by the evidence after a motion for a new trial upon that ground has been refused in the court below, notwithstanding this court cannot perceive upon what evidence the jury found their verdict." The first opinion in that case was written by Mr. Justice Lipscomb, and he stated that if the witnesses did not directly contradict each other they swore to facts from which very opposite conclusions might justly have been drawn, and for that reason the Supreme Court could neither say the verdict was without testimony or that it was contrary to evidence. The opinion on the motion for rehearing was written by Mr. Justice Wheeler, and in reference to the verdict he said: "I confess my inability very clearly to see upon what evidence the jury did arrive at the exact result which constitutes their verdict. But I cannot undertake to say that they found without or against evidence. I can only say that, to my mind, the evidence is unsatisfactory. Since, however, it has been sufficient to satisfy two juries, and especially since the judge who presided at the trial, with means of forming a correct judgment very superior to those which we possess, was satisfied with the verdict, I cannot undertake to disturb it."

Hence it appears from a reading of the opinions that the Supreme Court did not go to the extent indicated by the syllabus in that case, nor did the court use the language attributed to Judge Wheeler by counsel for appellee in their motion for rehearing. We presume counsel accepted the syllabus as correct, and felt justified in attributing its language to Judge Wheeler; but in that respect they were mistaken.

For the reasons above stated, the judgment rendered by this court at its last term, reversing the case, is set aside, and the judgment of the court below is affirmed.

Rehearing granted, and judgment affirmed.

FIRST BANK OF SPRINGTOWN v. HILL

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Texarkana. Dec. 2, 1912. Rehearing Denied Dec. 12, 1912.)

1. WITNESSES (§ 379*)—IMPEACHMENT.

Where, in an action by a wife to recover a note constituting her separate property, the issue was whether she had consented to the transfer of the note, actually delivered to defendant by her husband, and the husband testified to facts showing her consent to the transfer, evidence of his confession that he had wrongfully disposed of the note was admissible to impeach his testimony.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 1209, 1220-1222, 1247-1256; Dec. Dig. § 379.*]

2. WITNESSES (§ 193*)—COMPETENCY—HUSBAND AND WIFE.

Under Rev. St. 1895, art 2301, providing that the husband or wife of a party to a suit, or who is interested in the issue, shall not be competent to testify as to confidential communications, communications between husband and wife in the presence of third persons are not generally confidential.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 740, 741; Dec. Dig. § 193.*]

3. WITNESSES (§ 190*)—COMPETENCY—HUSBAND AND WIFE.

A conversation between husband and wife concerning her property rights and his admission to a wrongful transfer of her separate personality are not privileged, within Rev. St.

1895, art. 2301, making confidential communications between husband and wife privileged, and the wife suing for the property may testify to such conversations.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. § 737; Dec. Dig. § 190.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1048*)—HARMLESS ERROR—ERRONEOUS RULINGS ON EVIDENCE.

The error, if any, in overruling an objection to a question, is not prejudicial where no affirmative fact was elicited.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4140-4145, 4151, 4158-4160; Dec. Dig. § 1048.*]

5. WITNESSES (§ 346*)—IMPEACHMENT.

Where, in a suit by a wife to recover a note constituting her separate property, the issue was whether she had consented to the transfer actually made by her husband, or whether he had wrongfully transferred it, and he testified to her consent to the transfer, proof that he attempted to have a material witness for the wife evade process was admissible to impeach the husband's credibility by showing his interest in the case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. § 1133; Dec. Dig. § 346.*]

6. PARTNERSHIP (§ 219*)—PARTNERSHIP TRANSACTION—JUDGMENT AGAINST PARTNERS.

Where the petition, in an action against a firm, was sufficient to support a judgment against each partner personally, as well as against the firm, a partner against whom a personal judgment was rendered could not complain because no such judgment was rendered against the copartners.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. §§ 429-445; Dec. Dig. § 219.*]

7. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 750*)—ASSIGNMENTS OF ERROR—QUESTIONS PRESENTED.

An assignment of error that a petition does not authorize a judgment does not raise the question of the sufficiency of service of process.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3074-3083; Dec. Dig. § 750.*]

8. JUDGMENT (§ 253*)—CONFORMITY TO PLEADINGS—PRAYER FOR RELIEF.

Where a petition demanded the return of a note, or its value, and alleged the value of the note at a specified sum and claimed damages in such sum, a money judgment could not exceed the amount stated in the petition.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. §§ 443, 444; Dec. Dig. § 253.*]

Appeal from District Court, Parker County; J. W. Patterson, Judge.

Action by Mrs. M. C. Hill against the First Bank of Springtown. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reformed and affirmed.

Stennis & Wilson and McCall & McCall, all of Weatherford, for appellant. Hood & Shadle, of Weatherford, for appellee.

HODGES, J. The appellee, Mrs. M. C. Hill, instituted this suit against the First Bank of Springtown, a partnership composed of J. F. Ward, its president, J. D. Doughty, E. F. Ward, G. S. Frazier, G. B. Moody, Jim McDonald, Walter Doughty, and Henry Ward, for the possession of a promissory note or its value. The note is described as one executed by J. R. Pugh and wife to J. K. P. Hill for the sum of $1,000, with interest at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum from date, payable annually, and 10 per cent. attorney's fees if collected by process of law. It is dated January 1, 1909, and due two years after date, and is secured by a deed of trust on real estate. It is admitted that the note is entitled to a credit of $100 for interest paid for the first year after its execution. The petition alleges that the note was the separate property of the plaintiff; that on the ——— day of October, 1910, it was transferred and assigned to the appellant bank by her then husband, John Birdwell, without her knowledge or consent. From a judgment in her favor for the recovery of the note and for $1,178.06, its value in case it is not produced and delivered in accordance with the decree of the court within 20 days thereafter, the defendants below have prosecuted this appeal.

[1] The facts show that appellee was formerly the widow of J. K. P. Hill, deceased. On September 5, 1910, she was married to John Birdwell, who was then only about 24 years of age, 20 years younger than the appellee. In connection with this disparity in their ages there was some testimony tending to show that Birdwell married the appellee in order to get possession of her property; she being at the time worth about $40,000. A part of the property which she owned consisted of the $1,000 note described in the petition. Birdwell and his wife lived together only a few weeks, and then permanently separated. According to the testimony offered by the appellee, during the time they were living together, Birdwell surreptitiously secured possession of the note and without her knowledge or consent transferred it to the appellant, and then deserted her. The note when offered in evidence upon the trial had upon it a written assignment bearing the signature by mark of Mrs. Birdwell. There was also attached the signature of John Birdwell, the husband, and of two other persons purporting to be witnesses. Birdwell testified that after he and his wife were married the subject of paying off some of his personal debts was discussed between them; that in order to enable him to pay those debts she agreed that he might transfer to the appellant bank the note in controversy, and delivered it to him for that purpose; that, when he presented the note to Ward, the president of the bank, the latter informed him that Mrs. Birdwell would have to indorse it; that Ward wrote the assignment on the back of the note and instructed witness to have his wife sign the instrument in the manner described. Birdwell says that he told Ward that his wife could not write; that Ward thereupon instructed him how he could affix her signature by mark, and directed him to have two witnesses attest that fact. He further testified that upon his return home he informed his wife of what Ward had told him, and the next morning she, in the presence of two witnesses and Birdwell's mother, affixed her mark to the signature as shown in the note, and that the two witnesses signed for the purpose of attesting the genuineness of that signature. As to the fact that Mrs. Birdwell had affixed her mark under the circumstances detailed by John Birdwell, the latter was corroborated by the two subscribing witnesses and by his mother, who claims to have been present at the time; the transaction having occurred at her house. Ward, the president of the bank, testified that when Birdwell presented the note to him he knew that it was the separate property of Mrs. Birdwell, and for that reason informed Birdwell that his wife would have to sign the transfer. Mrs. Hill, the appellee, denied all of those transactions, stating that she had never signed the transfer of the note by her mark or otherwise; that she never consented for it to be assigned, and did not know that it had been assigned till after her separation from Birdwell. There was a sharp conflict between her testimony and that of Birdwell, his mother, and the subscribing witnesses to the transfer.

It is insisted by the appellant that the court erred in permitting the plaintiff to testify as to what was said in an interview with her husband after their separation and after the note had been transferred to the appellant bank. The language objected to is as follows: "I replied, 'No, sir; the way you have treated me, stole my note, I can never live with you.' He did not deny it. He never made any reply; just dropped his head." Again, she says that Birdwell told her: "I feel too mean to live this morning. Linda, have mercy on me and give me a few days to see if I cannot get the note back." According to the testimony of Mrs. Hill, after her separation from Birdwell, she went to visit her sister, Mrs. De Spain, who lived in that vicinity. While she was there Birdwell sought and obtained an interview with her for the purpose of persuading her to again live with him. It was during that interview, and after he had been charged by her with having stolen her note, that the language referred to was used. Birdwell denies that any such conversation ever took place. This testimony was probably admitted for the purpose of impeaching John Birdwell, who swore that his former wife had signed the written transfer of the note and had consented to its assignment to the appellant. It could have no other relevancy. Practically the only issue in the trial of this case in the court below was whether or not the appellee had consented to the assignment and had executed the written transfer. The testimony shows conclusively that the note was her separate property and that Ward knew this fact at the time he took it. Birdwell having testified, as he did, positively that his wife had signed the written transfer at the time and under the circumstances detailed by him, any legitimate means of impeaching him upon that issue was permissible. The particular objection most strenuously urged by the appellant against the admission of this testimony is that the appellee was permitted to disclose confidential communications between her and Birdwell, who was at the time her husband; and it is upon that ground that we are asked to reverse the ruling of the court and reverse the judgment. There is more than one reason for overruling that objection. Most of the conversation set out in the bills of exception occurred in the presence of a third party, Miss Bertha De Spain, who is shown to have been present at the time and who testified to substantially the same facts without objection.

[2, 3] Article 2301 of the Revised Civil Statutes is as follows: "The husband or wife of a party to a suit or proceeding, or who is interested in the issue to be tried, shall not be incompetent to testify therein except as to confidential communications between such husband and wife." In order that communications between husband and wife shall be held privileged under this statute, they must be such as should be regarded as confidential. Mitchell v. Mitchell, 80 Tex. 116, 15 S. W. 705; Eddy v. Bosley, 34 Tex. Civ. App. 116, 78 S. W. 565. Conversations which take place in the presence of third parties are not usually or generally to be considered confidential within the meaning of the law. 10 Ency. Ev. 193, and cases cited; 4 Wigmore on Evidence, § 2336, and notes. Whether or not the third person was present is a question for the court in passing upon the admissibility of the proffered testimony. 10 Ency. Ev. 196. From an examination of the statements objected to it appears that the only expression used by Mrs. Hill upon that occasion and detailed in her testimony, which was not made in the presence of Miss De Spain, was, "Linda, have mercy on me and give me a few days to see if I cannot get the note back." This seems to have been but a continuation of the conversation previously begun in the presence of Miss De Spain. The testimony of both the appellee and Miss De Spain shows a meeting between the husband and wife after separation, in which it appears that the wife repelled his advances and refused to receive him again as her husband. The testimony of appellee upon this issue as set out in the record is as follows: "After John Birdwell left me he came to the house of my brother-in-law, Mr. De Spain, where I was, and when he first came in he asked me to let him come back to live with me, and I replied: 'No, sir; the way you have treated me, stole my note, I can never live with you.' He did not deny it. He never made any reply; just dropped his head. Immediately thereafter I asked him, 'Johnnie, don't you feel mean after stealing my note?' and he answered, 'I feel too mean to live this morning.' Immediately thereafter John Birdwell went into the hall and sat down on a bed. I did not stay there but just a few minutes. I went there just because John Birdwell asked me to go there and sit down with him. There he said, 'Linda, have mercy on me and give me a few days to see if I cannot get the note back.' I then got up and left the room and went into the room where my sister was sick in bed, and did not go back to John Birdwell; and from that time forward I have not spoken to him." It appears from this testimony that Birdwell's wife charged him with having wrongfully appropriated and disposed of her separate property, and that he admitted it and begged for mercy. Such a conversation concerning the wife's property rights should not, we think, be regarded as communications coming within the rule which makes them privileged under the statute. In a controversy like this, to so apply the rule would assist the husband in consummating the perpetration of a fraud against the property rights of the wife. Eddy v. Bosley, supra; Edwards v. Dismukes, 53 Tex. 611; 10 Ency. Ev. pp. 171-193. If the appellee is correct in her statement of what took place between her and John Birdwell upon that occasion, it amounted to a confession by him that he had wrongfully and unlawfully disposed of her property. Such an admission was wholly inconsistent with his testimony upon the trial that his wife had consented to the transfer. That confession was not only material for the purpose of contradicting Birdwell and of impeaching his credibility as a witness in this suit, but also tended to show a transaction which made the husband the wife's debtor. Some of the authorities referred to by the appellant are opinions rendered in criminal cases where the admissibility of the testimony was governed by article 774 of the Code of Criminal Procedure of this state. Such authorities are not applicable to this case.

[4] Objection is also made to the ruling of the court in requiring John Birdwell on cross-examination to answer as to whether or not he had such conversation with his wife as that detailed by her and Miss De Spain. In addition to the reasons which we have just discussed, it may also be said that no error was here committed because the witness Birdwell denied that any such conversation ever took place; hence no affirmative fact was elicited from him that could have injured the appellant in any respect.

[5] The eleventh assignment of error is as follows: "The court erred in admitting the testimony of plaintiff's witness Conrad Blackwell to testify in substance that, before the court met six months ago, John Birdwell came to him and asked him if he could not go visiting and stay awhile, and that he asked witness if he could not keep away from the officers if they came down to subpoena him until after court met, in this, that said testimony was immaterial and an attempt to impeach a witness on an immaterial point." It appears that Birdwell had been asked if he had not approached Blackwell for the purposes indicated by Blackwell's testimony as shown in this assignment. Blackwell had testified that some time during that fall, after Birdwell and the appellee were married, and while they were living with Birdwell's mother, Birdwell came to him in the field and exhibited the note in question, and at the time stated that he had just had it fixed; that he came from the direction where Abe Birdwell (one of the subscribing witnesses) lived, and it was about 3 o'clock in the evening; that Birdwell then left him, saying that he was going to Springtown. This evidence tended to contradict Birdwell and three other witnesses as to the assignment having been executed and witnessed at the home of Birdwell's mother. Blackwell might naturally be looked upon by Birdwell as a hostile witness, and an effort to have this witness evade the process for bringing him into court to testify in this case would indicate more than ordinary interest on the part of Birdwell. As tending to show this interest, the testimony was properly admitted. 2 Ency. Ev. 406; 1 Greenleaf on Ev. §§ 450, 450a; 2 Wigmore on Ev. § 960. That is one of the methods of impeaching the credibility of a witness.

[6] It is also claimed that the court erred in rendering judgment against John F. Ward, president of the bank, individually, because such a judgment was not warranted by the pleadings. While in this respect the original petition is not as specific as it might have been, yet we think that in substance it is sufficient to support a judgment against each of the partners personally as well as against the firm. The fact that Ward is the only one of those partners against whom such a personal judgment was rendered is a matter of which he cannot complain.

[7] The question of the sufficiency of the service is not raised by this assignment. The complaint is that the pleadings did not authorize the judgment. We are not required to look any farther than the pleadings in passing upon this assignment.

[8] Complaint is also made that the amount of the judgment exceeds the amount sued for and bears a larger rate of interest than the court should have permitted. The plaintiff in her original petition alleged that the value of the note was $1,125, which was the principal and accrued interest at the time suit was filed. It is also alleged that she had been damaged in that sum by the wrongful transfer of the note; the petition concluding with a prayer for damages to that extent. The jury, under an instruction from the court, found that the note was of the value of $1,178.06, and a judgment was entered against the appellant for that sum. While this amount might have been recovered under proper pleadings, it was unauthorized by those upon which the case was tried. We think therefore that the judgment should be reformed so as to allow a recovery only for the amount sued for with interest thereon at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum from the date of the rendition of that judgment in the trial court.

As reformed the judgment is affirmed, and the costs of this appeal are adjudged against the appellee.

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 100*)—DECISIONS REVIEWABLE—REFUSAL TO DISSOLVE INJUNCTION.

Jurisdiction to review an order denying a motion to dissolve or modify a temporary injunction is not given by Rev. Civ. St. 1911, art. 4644, authorizing appeal from an order granting, refusing, or dissolving a temporary injunction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 670-680; Dec. Dig. § 100.*]

Appeal from District Court, Reeves County; S. J. Isaacs, Judge.

Action by H. T. Collier and others against W. C. Welborn and others. From an order refusing to dissolve a temporary injunction, defendant Welborn appeals. Dismissed.

Hefner & Cooke, of Pecos, for appellant.
Hudson & Canon, of Pecos, for appellees.

HARPER, C. J. This appeal is by W. C. Welborn from an order of the district court of Reeves county, dated 22d day of June, 1912, overruling his motion to dissolve a temporary writ of injunction which had been granted on 1st day of June, 1912. The trial court's order is as follows: "H. T. Collier et al. v. J. F. Harbour et al. No. 1010. On this the 22d day of June, A. D. 1912, came on to be heard the above-entitled cause on the motion of defendant, W. C. Welborn, to dissolve or modify the injunction heretofore granted in this case on June 1, 1912, and the plaintiff appeared in person and by attorney and announced ready, and the defendant, W. C. Welborn, appeared in person and by attorney, and announced ready. * * * Then came on to be heard the answer and motion of defendant, praying for a dissolution or modification of said injunction. Whereupon the court held that it was incumbent upon the defendant to introduce evidence to sustain his motion to dissolve, and the court requested defendant to offer evidence showing cause why said injunction should be modified; and the defendant Welborn refusing to offer evidence either to sustain his motion to dissolve or to modify said injunction, and stood upon the bill and answer, and the court, having considered same, is of the opinion that said motion and prayer should be overruled and said injunction continued in force. It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed by the court that said motion and prayer by the defendant, W. C. Welborn, to modify or dissolve the temporary injunction issued in this cause be, and the same is hereby, overruled, to which order and judgment of the court the defendant then and there in open court excepted and gave notice of appeal to the Court of Civil Appeals for the Eighth Supreme Judicial District, at El Paso."

Article 4644 of the Revised Civil Statutes 1911 reads: "Any party or parties to any civil suit wherein a temporary injunction may be granted, refused or dissolved, under any of the provisions of this title, in term time or in vacation, may appeal from the order or judgment granting, refusing or dissolving such injunction, to the Court of Civil Appeals having jurisdiction of the case; but such appeal shall not have the effect to suspend the enforcement of the order appealed from, unless it shall be so ordered by the court or judge who enters the order; provided, the transcript in such case shall be filed with the clerk of the Court of Civil Appeals not later than fifteen days after the entry of record of such order or judgment granting, refusing or dissolving such injunction." As the order appealed from was not an order granting, nor refusing, nor dissolving the temporary injunction previously issued, this court has no jurisdiction to determine the appeal, which is therefore dismissed. Baumberger v. Allen, 101 Tex. 353, 107 S. W. 526. See, also, C. B. Live Stock Co. v. Parrish, 127 S. W. 855.

Appeal dismissed.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Whitley County. Action by James Lawson against the Burke Hollow Coal Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded for new trial.

J. B. Snyder, B. B. Snyder, C. S. Wilson, and Geo. P. Johnson, all of Williamsburg, for appellant. R. L. Pope, of Williamsburg, and R. S. Rose, of Middlesboro, for appellee.

HOBSON, C. J. James Lawson brought this suit against the Burke Hollow Coal Company charging that it had without his consent entered upon his land and mined 602 tons of his coal, and after this had taken from the pillars between the rooms 212 tons more of his coal, leaving his land and coal in such a condition that the passage to the remainder of his coal was closed up, and at least 500 tons more had been lost to him. The defendant by its answer denied mining 602 tons of his coal, or any coal in excess of 400 tons, or that it took out from the pillars 212 tons or any coal, or closed up the passage so that any of his coal could not be mined. It pleaded that a settlement had been made with him for the coal that it took in this way, that it had accidentally gotten over the line on his land and he had accidentally gotten over the line on its land, and these claims had been offset by agreement one against the other. On a trial of the case there was a verdict and judgment against the defendant for $200. It appeals.

[1] To show that the defendant had taken from his land the quantity of coal alleged in the petition, the plaintiff introduced Lewis Francis, a civil engineer, who testified that he had run the line between the plaintiff's and the defendant's property on the top of the ground, and introduced in evidence a plot showing his survey. He had laid down on this plot the rooms which had been mined by the coal company and testified to the contents of these rooms. He testified, in substance, that he had laid these down from a mine map, which he said the mine foreman gave him, and, being asked who made the map, said that the name of L. A. Osborne was on it, that Osborne is a civil engineer, and that the map looked like his work. There was no proof by any one as to the accuracy of the map, and this was practically all the evidence introduced on the trial to show the amount of coal that had been taken. The evidence is not sufficient to sustain the judgment.

[2, 3] In Sandy River Cannel Coal Co. v. Whitehouse Cannel Coal Co., 125 Ky. 278, 101 S. W. 319, 30 Ky. Law Rep. 1308, Id., 125 Ky. 278, 102 S. W. 320, 31 Ky. Law Rep. 374, we laid down the rule that, where coal is wrongfully mined from another's land but in good faith and as the result of an honest mistake, the measure of damages is the value of the coal taken as it lay in the mine, or the usual reasonable royalty paid for the right of mining. The instructions of the court to the jury did not define the measure of damages sufficiently under the rule adopted in that opinion. The "royalty" is the price paid for coal as it lies in the earth. This is what it sells for. The "fair market price" is the usual standard for measuring the value of an article. It is worth what it may be reasonably sold for. If the owner gets this, he is usually made whole; and he cannot ask more where coal has been taken innocently under an honest mistake as to the location of the line. Lawson was only getting a royalty on the coal taken out from his land by his authority, and all he has lost is the royalty on the coal taken by the defendant or that was lost to him by its wrong.

[4] The plaintiff's petition contains no description of his land except the statement that it adjoins the property where the defendant is operating its coal plant. There was no demurrer to the petition or motion to make it more specific, and this defect in the petition was cured by the evidence which located the land from which the coal was said to have been taken. But on the return of the case to the circuit court, that the issue between the parties may be more clearly presented, the plaintiff will be required to describe the land in his petition if the defendant asks that this be done.

The amended answer which the defendant tendered on the trial is not made part of the record by bill of exceptions or by an order of court, and cannot be considered.

Under the evidence the verdict is for a much larger sum than should be recovered under the measure of damages we have indicated.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

THOMSON'S GUARDIAN et al. v. THOMSON et al.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Dec. 20, 1912.)

GUARDIAN AND WARD (§ 102*)—SALE OF LAND—GUARDIAN AD LITEM—REPORT.

Where adversary proceedings were brought to sell land in which a number of infants had a remainder, and the guardian ad litem, who was appointed for three of them, but who did not at that time represent the others, filed his report in which, by mistake, the names only of those for whom he was not appointed, appeared, the infants for whom he acted were sufficiently represented, and the order of sale should not be set aside on that ground.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Guardian and Ward, Cent. Dig. §§ 375, 376; Dec. Dig. § 102.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Fayette County.

Proceeding by Ellis Thomson and others against Edith Thomson and others to sell land. From a judgment overruling the motion of the guardian ad litem of Edith Thomson to set aside an order of sale, he appeals. Affirmed.

E. L. Hutchinson, of Lexington, for appellant. Field McLeod and Wallace & Harris, all of Versailles, for appellee Howard. Geo. C. Webb and Saml. M. Wilson, both of Lexington, for appellees W. L. Thomson and wife.

NUNN, J. It appears that Ellis Thomson, the wife of her coappellee, W. L. Thomson, owned a life estate in about 78 acres of land near Lexington in Fayette county, and that her eight children owned the remainder interest. An action was instituted in 1905, under section 491 of the Civil Code, for the sale of the land and the reinvestment of the proceeds. The testimony showed that Mrs. Thomson had an affliction which made it necessary for her to remove to another climate, and she had selected California; that real estate located in the vicinity where the 78 acres were had reached its highest market value; that the property, if rented, would decrease in value; and that if the land should be sold the proceeds could be invested in land in the foreign state and the increase in value would be beneficial to all the children. Summonses were served on all the children over 14 years of age by delivering a copy thereof to them, and was served upon Edith, Frederick C., and Lee Thomson, who were under 14 years of age, by delivering a copy thereof to E. L. Hutchinson, who had been appointed guardian ad litem for them. Hutchinson filed a report on September 11, 1905, stating that he had carefully examined the papers in the case and the authorities, and that he was unable to present any defense on behalf of the infants. He inserted in that report, however, the names of three of Mrs. Thomson's children for whom he had not been appointed guardian ad litem and omitted the names of those for whom he had been appointed. On September 12, 1905, Mrs. Thomson's husband made an affidavit for the appointment of a guardian ad litem for the infants who were over 14 years of age, and on September 14, 1905, E. L. Hutchinson was appointed as such. On September 18, 1905, he filed his report as guardian ad litem for these children, but did not mention the names of the three infants for whom he was first appointed guardian ad litem. The land was sold for the purpose of reinvestment, and appellee C. A. Howard purchased it for about $112 an acre. He filed many exceptions to the report of sale and moved the court to set it aside; but the court overruled the motion, confirmed the sale, a deed was made to the purchaser, and it appears that he paid for the land, and the proceeds were reinvested. On October 12, 1912, E. L. Hutchinson, after giving notice, moved the court to set aside the order of sale, claiming that it was erroneous because the three infant children under 14 years of age, for whom he was appointed guardian ad litem, had not been represented as required by law, as he, in making his report for the three infants under 14 years of age, had inserted therein the names of the three infants over 14 years of age and omitted the names of three under 14 years of age. The lower court overruled the motion, and the guardian ad litem has appealed.

We are of the opinion that the lower court did not err in the matter. It appears from a reading of the record that the names of the three older children were inserted by mistake. At the time he filed this report, Hutchinson was not guardian ad litem for the three older children, but was only such for the three under 14 years of age. He was not appointed guardian ad litem for the three older children until September 14, 1905, and he filed his report for them on the 18th of that month. Further, the guardian ad litem testified on the hearing of the motion to the facts above stated, and that the names of the three infants under 14 years of age were omitted and the names of the other three children inserted by oversight of himself or the stenographer who drafted his report. As stated, these facts are made to appear from the record itself, and we are of the opinion that the lower court did not err in overruling the motion, and that Howard has a clear title to the land. This is the only question presented and decided upon this appeal.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

For these reasons, the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

CUMBERLAND TELEPHONE & TELEGRAPH CO. v. CITY OF CALHOUN et al.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Dec. 17, 1912.)

1. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 30*)—LICENSE TAXES—FRANCHISE.

Where a telephone company, having a franchise for a telephone exchange and to occupy the streets of the municipality, pays a property tax to the city, the municipality cannot levy a license tax or tax on the privilege of conducting its business.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Telegraphs and Telephones, Cent. Dig. § 19; Dec. Dig. § 30.*]

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 691*)—USE OF STREETS—TRESPASSER.

A public service corporation which uses or occupies the streets or public ways of a city without having obtained the right to do so under the Constitution is merely a trespasser, and cannot invoke in its favor any of the laws for the protection of corporations that have observed the law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1492-1508; Dec. Dig. § 691.*]

3. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 30*) — FRANCHISES—LICENSES—"FRANCHISE."

A resolution of the board of trustees of a town to let a telephone company put up telephone poles on certain streets, though acted upon by the company, is not the grant of a franchise within Const. § 164, providing that no municipality shall grant any franchise for a term exceeding 20 years, and that, before granting such franchise, it shall first advertise for bids therefor, but is a mere license, which may be withdrawn at any time, and hence a license or occupation tax may be imposed on the company by the municipality.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Telegraphs and Telephones, Cent. Dig. § 19; Dec. Dig. § 30.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 3, pp. 2929-2942; vol. 8, p. 7663.]

4. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 30*)—OPERATION—LICENSE TAXES.

As Const. §§ 163, 164, do not require a franchise for the maintenance of a telephone exchange, a license tax imposed on a telephone company which had no franchise, being based upon its maintenance of an exchange, cannot be defeated on the ground that it was occupying the streets without authority; the tax not being upon the use of such highways.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Telegraphs and Telephones, Cent. Dig. § 19; Dec. Dig. § 30.*]

5. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 10*)—LICENSE TAXES—RIGHT TO USE STREET.

Where the state board of valuation and assessment, under Ky. St. § 4077, providing that every telephone company shall, in addition to other taxes, annually pay a tax on its franchise to the state, and a local tax thereon to the county, incorporated city, town, or taxing district where its franchise may be exercised, levied a franchise tax upon a telephone corporation which had no municipal franchise, the receipt of the municipality of its portion of such taxes does not estop it from imposing a license tax; the imposition of such tax in no way giving the telephone company a right to use the municipality's streets.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Telegraphs and Telephones, Cent. Dig. § 6; Dec. Dig. § 10.*]

6. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 122*)—CONFISCATORY TAX—BURDEN OF PROOF.

The burden of showing that a municipal occupation or license tax is unreasonable, oppressive, and confiscatory is upon the party attacking the tax, and, in the absence of evidence, cannot be held invalid on those grounds.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 281-289; Dec. Dig. § 122.*]

7. LICENSES (§ 7*)—ORDINANCES—VALIDITY.

A municipal ordinance imposing a license tax on a telephone company is not invalid because not stating the purposes for which such tax is levied.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Licenses, Cent. Dig. §§ 7-15; Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, McLean County.

Action by the Cumberland Telephone & Telegraph Company against the City of Calhoun and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. W. Boston and Wm. B. Noe, both of Calhoun, for appellant. G. H. Cary, of Calhoun, and L. P. Tanner, of Owensboro, for appellees.

CARROLL, J. This suit was instituted by the appellant against the city of Calhoun and the police judge thereof for the purpose of testing the validity of an ordinance that imposed a license tax of $100 upon appellant for the privilege of operating an exchange in the city, and with the purpose of having the ordinance declared invalid.

Calhoun is a city of the fifth class, and the ordinance attacked imposed upon "each telephone exchange" a license fee of $100. The validity of the ordinance is assailed upon the ground that a telephone company, which pays both an ad valorem and a franchise tax to the city of Calhoun, as it is averred the telephone company did to the city of Calhoun, cannot be required to pay a business or occupation tax such as the ordinance provided for. The ordinance is also assailed upon the ground that the license tax imposed is unreasonable, oppressive, and confiscatory.

No evidence was taken in the case, but it appears from the petition, which was dismissed by the lower court: That the appellant is a corporation, organized under the laws of Kentucky, and engaged in the operation of telephone lines and telephone exchanges in the city of Calhoun and elsewhere in the state. That in July, 1894, the board of trustees of the town of Calhoun, it being then a town of the sixth class, adopted the following resolution: "On motion it was ordered to let the Cumberland Telephone Company put up telephone poles on the West side of Ferry street to Second street; thence along Second street to Poplar street; thence along Poplar street to the river, without any damage to trees or property; said poles to be thirty feet above ground or over." That, under the authority granted by this resolution, the telephone company soon after proceeded to erect lines and poles and to establish a telephone exchange in Calhoun, and has continued to the present time to conduct an exchange in the city and occupy many streets of the city other than those mentioned in the resolution with its poles and wires. It further appears that in 1906, 1907, 1908, 1909, and 1910 a franchise tax was imposed upon appellant by the state board of valuation and assessment, which board apportioned to the city of Calhoun its proportionate part of the franchise tax for each of these years, and the same was paid by the appellant to the city. It is further shown that it has paid for a number of years annually to the city an ad valorem or property tax upon its property situated therein.

[1] If the appellant had, in fact, a franchise authorizing it to operate and conduct a telephone exchange in the city of Calhoun, and to occupy the streets, and it also paid an ad valorem or property tax to the city, it was not within the power of the council to charge it, as the ordinance does, with an occupation tax or a tax for the privilege of conducting its business in the city. This was expressly decided in Cumberland Telephone & Telegraph Co. v. Hopkins, 121 Ky. 850, 90 S. W. 594, 28 Ky. Law Rep. 846, where the court, in holding invalid a license tax attempted to be imposed by ordinance upon the Cumberland Telephone & Telegraph Company for the privilege of operating an exchange and conducting its business in the city of Eminence, after it had purchased, in the manner provided in the Constitution, a franchise to do business in the city, said: "After having sold the telephone company the privilege of putting up and operating its line and conducting its business in the town, the municipality cannot afterwards, without the consent of the telephone company, impose an additional charge for the identical privilege. This franchise sold by the city to appellant telephone company was the creature of the city. It was not only to occupy its streets, the consideration being compensation for the right of way, but it was for operating its exchange in the city and receiving tolls thereat upon its business. * * * The ordinance selling the franchise by its terms went further than to grant the right to occupy the city streets and alleys. It expressly dealt with and sold for a consideration the privilege of doing the identical business in the city that it is doing." Again, in Adams Express Co. v. Boldrick, 141 Ky. 118, 132 S. W. 175, in considering a similar question, we said: "To put it in another way, the general council, under this statute, has authority to impose either a license tax or a franchise tax upon all corporations or persons engaged in business in the city, for the privilege of doing business there, but it cannot exact, for the privilege of doing business, both a franchise tax and a license tax at the same time or for the same period."

[2] But the principle announced in these cases does not sustain appellant in its effort to defeat the license tax, because it never obtained, in the manner pointed out in the Constitution, a franchise from the city authorizing it to erect lines or poles or establish an exchange in the city. Section 164 of the Constitution provides that: "No county, city, town, taxing district or other municipality shall be authorized or permitted to grant any franchise or privilege, or make any contract in reference thereto, for a term exceeding twenty years. Before granting such franchise or privilege for a term of years, such municipality shall first, after due advertisement, receive bids therefor publicly, and award the same to the highest and best bidder; but it shall have the right to reject any or all bids. This section shall not apply to a trunk railway." And a city is not authorized or permitted to grant to any public service corporation the privilege to use or occupy the streets or public ways of the city except as provided in the section. Putting aside for the moment the consideration of the privilege conferred by the resolution, to which we will later advert, when a public service corporation uses or occupies the streets or public ways of a city without having first obtained the right to do so under section 164 of the Constitution, and in the manner prescribed by the Legislature, if legislation has been enacted to carry into effect the section, it is nothing more than a trespasser, and cannot invoke in its favor any of the laws enacted for the protection or benefit of corporations that have observed the law, or shield itself from the consequences that may be visited upon the head of a wrongdoer. *Woodall v. Telephone Co., 128 Ky. 209, 107 S. W. 787, 32 Ky. Law Rep. 1068.

[3] Coming now to consider the rights acquired by appellant under the resolution adopted by the council in 1894, and under authority of which the appellant company has been conducting its business, the argument is made in its behalf that this resolution in effect affords it the same protection that would have been afforded by the purchase of a franchise in the manner pointed out in the Constitution. But, for the reasons before stated, this position cannot be sustained. The resolution does not in any manner or form take the place of a constitutional franchise. At most, it was only a license by the council to do business in the city, and merely protected the corporation against summary ouster.

Substantially this question was before us in East Tenn. Telephone Co. v. Board of Councilmen of City of Frankfort, 141 Ky. 588, 133 S. W. 564. In that case the East Tennessee Telephone Company had a license to do business in the city of Frankfort, granted by the council in the form of a resolution very much like the resolution adopted by the council in this case, and under the license conferred by this resolution the telephone company had been operating in the city for many years. The city in 1909 adopted an ordinance the effect of which was to impose a heavy penalty upon the telephone company each day that it carried on business in the city without obtaining in the regular manner a franchise. Suit was brought by the telephone company to enjoin the prosecution of a number of warrants issued for the violation of this ordinance, and in considering the status of the company we said: "It is insisted for the telephone company that the rights given it by the resolution, after being accepted and acted upon, cannot be impaired by any subsequent action of the council, and that the franchise or privilege, being without limitation as to time, is perpetual. It will be observed that the resolution of April 11, 1881, does not purport to grant a franchise. It only grants permission to the telephone company to use the streets. A permission is no more than a license, and, as a rule, a license may be withdrawn by the party who grants it. * * * The council has not as yet revoked their permission, and, until it is revoked, the grantee is rightfully in possession, and cannot be fined for doing business without buying a franchise." The court further held that the council should have given the telephone company 90 days in which to obtain a franchise or remove its property from the streets, and that in the meantime it could not be fined for daily violations of the ordinance. But the principle announced in that case does not afford the appellant any protection against the payment of the license tax imposed by the ordinance. The city council of Calhoun is not attempting to impose a penalty upon the appellant for using the streets without a franchise, as was attempted to be done in the Frankfort Case. It has only imposed a license tax upon the appellant for the privilege of conducting its "exchange" in the city, and provided penalties if it continues to operate its exchange without the payment of the license fee. The city might have given the appellant a reasonable time in which to remove its property from the city or obtain a franchise, but, in place of adopting this course, it has treated the appellant as a mere licensee and levied a license tax upon its exchange, and this it had the right to do.

[4] We do not hold that the city council could license in this manner the telephone company to occupy the streets or public ways of the city with its poles or wires; nor do we hold that the council could impose a license tax upon the company for using the streets and public ways, as this would be in effect a recognition of its legal right to use the streets and public ways of the city under the resolution. There is, however, quite a difference between operating an exchange in the city and using the streets and public ways of the city. It is the use of the streets and public ways for which a franchise must be obtained, and not for the mere operation of a telephone exchange. It is not necessary to obtain a franchise, under section 164 of the Constitution, merely to conduct a telephone exchange, but, if the streets or public ways of the city are used in connection with the exchange, then a franchise is necessary, to acquire the right to use the streets and public ways.

As said in Bland v. Cumberland Telephone & Telegraph Co., 109 S. W. 1180, 33 Ky. Law Rep. 309: "It should be borne well in mind just what the franchise is that is the subject of sale as required by the Constitution. It is not, as sometimes seems to be thought, the right to operate a telephone exchange in a city. That right is not one to be granted or denied by the municipality any more than it could grant or refuse a franchise to conduct a dry goods store within the city. The franchise under discussion is the permission to do something which the city has the right of control over; that is, the occupancy of some part of the public streets." Section 163 of the Constitution provides in part: "No telephone company within a city or town shall be permitted or authorized * * * to erect its poles, posts, or other apparatus along, over, under or across the streets, alleys or public grounds of the city or town without the consent of the proper legislative bodies or boards of such city or town being first obtained." And to obtain this right a franchise must be secured as provided in section 164. As said in Rural Home Telephone Co. v. Ky. & Ind. Telephone Co., 128 Ky. 209, 107 S. W. 787, 32 Ky. Law Rep. 1068: "These sections of the Constitution must be read together, as the right to occupy the streets and public ways conferred by section 163 can only be granted in the manner provided in section 164." If the city had attempted to levy a license tax upon the company for the purpose of using the streets and ways of the city with its poles and wires, it might well have claimed exemption from the tax on the ground that the city had no authority to levy such a tax upon a corporation that had not secured, in the manner provided by law, the right to occupy the streets and ways. But, as the city is seeking to charge the license fee only upon the business of operating an exchange, the fact that the company has not secured a franchise to occupy the streets and ways does not deny the city the right to exercise the power conferred upon it by law to tax trades, occupations, and businesses.

[5] Another contention of counsel for the telephone company is that as the state board of valuation and assessment has levied upon its property in this state each year a franchise tax, and has apportioned each year a proper part of this franchise tax to the city of Calhoun, which has accepted it, this estops the city from imposing a license tax in addition to this franchise tax. Section 4077 of the Kentucky Statutes reads in part: "Every telephone company * * * shall, in addition to the other taxes imposed upon it by law, annually pay a tax on its franchise to the state, and a local tax thereon to the county, incorporated city, town or taxing district where its franchise may be exercised. * * *" Under this and other sections of the same article of the Kentucky Statutes, the state board of valuation and assessment assesses each year the value of the franchise of telephone companies and other public service corporations, and on the assessment so made these corporations pay a tax to the counties, cities, and towns in which they operate in proportion to the value of the franchise in each taxing district or municipality. But the state board of valuation and assessment cannot, and does not, confer upon any of these corporations the right to do business in any part of the state, or in any town or city therein. It merely assesses the property of the corporation that it finds in the state. The right to do business is obtained from other sources, and under provisions of the Constitution and statutes entirely disconnected from the one creating the state board of valuation and assessment, which is merely an assessing authority. It is therefore very clear that the telephone company, by the imposition of this tax by the state board of valuation and assessment, obtained no right whatever to conduct its business in the city of Calhoun, or to use or occupy the streets of the city, or operate therein an exchange.

[6] It is further insisted that the license tax imposed is unreasonable, oppressive, and confiscatory. This contention was asserted in an amended petition, all the allegations of which were controverted by an answer, and the case was then submitted upon the pleadings and exhibits alone; no evidence being offered by either party, and judgment rendered dismissing the petition. With the record in this condition we cannot say that the tax imposed is unreasonable, oppressive, or confiscatory. When a license tax is assailed upon this ground, the burden of proof is upon the party attacking the ordinance, and he must show by satisfactory evidence the truth of his charge. Bradford v. Jones, 142 Ky. 820, 135 S. W. 290; Wells v. Town of Mt. Olivet, 126 Ky. 131, 102 S. W. 1182, 31 Ky. Law Rep. 576, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1080.

[7] It is also urged that the ordinance is invalid, in that it does not state the purpose or purposes for which the license tax prescribed in the ordinance was levied. This argument is answered adversely to the contention of counsel for appellant by the opinions of this court in Shugars v. Hamilton, 122 Ky. 606, 92 S. W. 564, 29 Ky. Law Rep. 127; Brown-Foreman v. Commonwealth, 125 Ky. 402, 101 S. W. 321, 30 Ky. Law Rep. 793; City of Mt. Sterling v. King, 126 Ky. 526, 104 S. W. 322, 31 Ky. Law Rep. 919.

The judgment is affirmed.

KILLEBREW et al. v. MURRAY.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Dec. 20, 1912.)

1. PLEADING (§ 412*)—WAIVER OF OBJECTION.

Error in first setting up matter in reply, instead of alleging it in the petition, is waived, where defendant did not demur or move to strike the reply, but traversed it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 1387-1394; Dec. Dig. § 412.*]

2. MINES AND MINERALS (§ 68*)—MINING LEASE—CONSTRUCTION—TIME FOR OPERATION.

Plaintiff leased to defendants the phosphate mining rights in 155 acres of land, valued at $23,000, by a lease which recited a consideration of $1 and "the covenants hereinafter contained on the part of" lessees, and further provided that the lease was for a term of 10 years from date, and so long thereafter as phosphate might be found in what should be considered by the lessees as paying quantities, and when they concluded that it was not found in paying quantities they should notify lessor, which notice should terminate the lease, "which, however, shall continue until such notice," and that lessees agree to pay 25 cents a ton as royalty for the phosphate when mined, and to pay a minimum of $5 a year, whether the lands are mined or not, such payment to be considered as an advance on the royalty and be deducted therefrom, and that lessees should have the right to determine how much of the land should be mined each year, provided that the $5 was paid. Held, that the lease did not permit the lessees to continue it for the 10-year period merely by paying $5 annually, without beginning any operations thereon, but required them to begin mining operations within a reasonable time.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Cent. Dig. §§ 188-191; Dec. Dig. § 68.*]

3. MINES AND MINERALS (§ 62*)—LEASE—EXECUTORY CONTRACT.

The lease was not an executed contract, but was executory.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Cent. Dig. §§ 173, 175-180; Dec. Dig. § 62.*]

4. CONTRACTS (§ 10*)—MUTUALITY.

The contract was unenforceable as lacking in mutuality, being a unilateral executory contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. §§ 21-40; Dec. Dig. § 10.*]

5. MINES AND MINERALS (§ 68*)—MINING LEASES—TIME OF OPERATION.

The lessees' failure to begin work under a gas or oil lease would operate as an abandonment thereof in a shorter time than in case of a phosphate lease, because of the greater danger of loss in the former case by reason of the migratory character of the minerals.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Cent. Dig. §§ 188-191; Dec. Dig. § 68.*]

6. MINES AND MINERALS (§ 63*)—LEASES—TERMINATION.

A phosphate mining lease, which authorized the lessee to terminate it at any time by written notice, will be construed as also making it terminable at the will of the lessor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Cent. Dig. § 172; Dec. Dig. § 63.*]

7. MINES AND MINERALS (§ 58*)—MINING LEASE—FRAUD—EVIDENCE.

Evidence held to show that a phosphate mining lease was procured by fraud on the part of the lessees.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Cent. Dig. §§ 168, 169; Dec. Dig. § 58.*]

8. MINES AND MINERALS (§ 68*)—LEASES—TIME OF OPERATION.

In the absence of a provision in a phosphate mining lease fixing the time for beginning operations, it will be presumed that operations were to begin within a reasonable time.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Cent. Dig. §§ 188-191; Dec. Dig. § 68.*]

9. MINES AND MINERALS (§ 68*)—LEASES—BEGINNING OF OPERATIONS.

Where a phosphate mining lease did not fix any time for beginning operations, but the lessees inferentially fixed a year or 18 months as the time for beginning work, such period must be considered a reasonable time.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Cent. Dig. §§ 188-191; Dec. Dig. § 68.*]

10. MINES AND MINERALS (§ 68*)—LEASES—ABANDONMENT.

Where the lessees fixed a year or 18 months as a reasonable time within which to begin work under a phosphate mining lease, the lessor could properly treat the failure to begin operations within 3½ years as an abandonment of the lease.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Cent. Dig. §§ 188-191; Dec. Dig. § 68.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Woodford County.

Action by Margaret H. Murray against George W. Killebrew and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Richard Godson, of Midway, Bruce & Bullitt, of Louisville, W. O. Davis, of Versailles, and Helm Bruce, of Louisville, for appellants. D. L. Thornton, Field McLeod, and Wallace & Harriass, all of Versailles, for appellees.

SETTLE, J. This is an appeal from a judgment of the Woodford circuit court declaring invalid and canceling a certain lease held by appellants upon the land of appellee. Such parts of the lease as are pertinent to the questions involved are here copied: "This phosphate lease made this the second day of September, 1908, by and between Mrs. Margaret Murray (unmarried), party of the first part, and George W. Killebrew of Mt. Pleasant, Tennessee, party of the second part, witnesseth as follows: The party of the first part for and in consideration of one dollar ($1.00), and of the covenants hereinafter contained on the party of the second part, has leased unto the party of the second part, for the sole and only purpose of mining and excavating for phosphate and phosphate-bearing rock, all that certain tract of land situate in Woodford county, in the state of Kentucky, containing one hundred and fifty-five (155) acres, more or less, described as follows. * * * To have and to hold said premises above described unto the party of the second part for and during the term of ten years from the date hereof, and so long thereafter as phosphate or phosphate-bearing rock may be found in what shall be considered by the party of the second part as paying quantities. When the party of the second part shall conclude that phosphate or phosphate rock is not found on said premises in paying quantities, he shall notify the party of the first part thereof in writing, and such notice shall terminate this lease, which, however, shall continue until such notice. The party of the second part hereby covenants and agrees, in consideration of this lease, to pay unto the party of the first part 25 cents per ton of 2,240 pounds as a royalty for the phosphate when mined and removed, and agrees to pay a minimum of $5.00 per annum, whether the lands are mined or not, such payments to be considered an advance on the royalty and to be deducted from the royalty on the first phosphate mined thereafter. The party of the second part shall have the right to determine when and how much of said land shall be mined during each year during the continuance of this lease, provided always that said minimum sum of $5.00 per annum shall be paid each year during the continuance thereof, which amounts, as aforesaid, shall be considered as advancements and shall be deducted from the royalty on the phosphate thereafter mined. * * *

The lease was signed by appellee alone, and her attack upon it was based on the grounds: (1) That it was without consideration, and so lacking in mutuality as to render it per se invalid. (2) That it was procured by fraud. (3) That if appellants ever had any intention of carrying out the lease it had been abandoned by them; and that their continuing to claim under the lease was not in good faith, but for the purpose of finding a purchaser of the lease to whom they could sell it at a profit.

[1] It is insisted for appellants that the ground of attack last mentioned should have been ignored by the circuit court, as it was set up by appellee's reply, when it should have been relied on in the petition, or by an amended petition. This contention is without force, in view of the fact that appellants did not demur to that part of the reply, or move to strike it out, but by rejoinder traversed its affirmative allegations. This was a waiver of appellee's error and an election on appellants' part to treat that part of the reply as an amended petition; and, as the circuit court so held, its ruling thereon was not error. Ruffner v. Ridley, 81 Ky. 165.

It must be taken for granted that the purpose of appellee in granting the lease was to obtain an income or profit in royalties from appellants' mining of her land, in the purchase of which she had expended $23,000. It even appears from the admissions of some of the appellants that they represented to her before the lease was executed that the mining of the phosphate on her land would pay her in royalties $500 per acre. It could not have been contemplated by her that she would receive no part of this royalty for 10 years after the execution of the lease. On the contrary, she was assured by appellants before its execution that they would begin the work of getting out the phosphate within a year or 18 months, yet, though more than 3 years intervened between the date of the lease and the institution of this action, nothing was done by them.

[2] It is, however, appellants' contention that such nonaction was allowed by the contract, and that it may, indeed, continue for 10 years, if appellee be paid by them the $5 per annum which the lease provides shall be received by her, whether the lands are mined or not. Is this the meaning of the contract, and, if so, is the contract a valid one?

It was alleged in the petition and proved by appellee that the consideration of $1, recited in the lease, was never paid; nor is its payment acknowledged in the writing. The only matter relied upon by appellants as showing a consideration is the sum of $5, which they agreed to pay appellee annually, whether the land was mined or not, and she only accepted one such payment, which was made one year from the date of the contract; others, though tendered, being refused because of appellants' failure to begin work under the lease.

It is not to be presumed that appellee would have incumbered her farm with the lease for these annual payments of $5, in view of its insignificance as a return upon her investment of $23,000 in the farm. It is manifest, therefore, that the real consideration or inducement for the granting of the lease was the mining of the phosphate upon the land, which she supposed, and was led by appellants to believe, they would commence within a reasonable time; and this conclusion is sustained by the fact that the annual payments of $5 were to be regarded as mere advancements upon the royalty that appellee would receive from the mining of the land, to be credited to appellants upon the royalty first thereafter due appellee.

[3] We do not concur in the conclusion of appellants' counsel that the contract in question is an executed contract. In our opinion it must be classed as an executory contract merely. Under it nothing had been done; everything required by its terms of appellants was to be thereafter done. All that it required of appellee was that she should furnish the land, and this was done when the lease was executed. On the other hand, what it required of the appellants—payment of the consideration, mining of the land for phosphates, accounting to the appellee for the royalties—was to be thereafter done in fulfillment of the contract. The insignificant $5 per year it obligates appellants to pay appellee, whether the land is mined or not, is not, of itself, sufficient to place the lease in that class of contracts known as executed contracts.

[4] But whether it be denominated an executed or an executory contract, it is manifestly lacking in mutuality. It obligates the lessor, in unequivocal language, to continue the lease for 10 years, all the while holding the leased premises in readiness for the lessee's mining operations, but gives her no right to terminate the lease, to compel the lessee to begin mining the land, or to continue the work, if abandoned, after being commenced. On the other hand, the lease does not bind the lessees to do anything. It permits them to begin the work of mining phosphate on the leased premises at any time within 10 years that may be selected by them, to quit when they choose, or not to begin at all, and also the right to terminate the lease at any time upon their mere ipse dixit that the land does not contain phosphate in "paying quantities"; it being left to them alone to decide whether it is in quantity sufficient to make the mining thereof profitable to them.

Reduced to its last analysis, this lease is but a unilateral executory contract, such as is, in Berry v. Frisbie, etc., 120 Ky. 337, 86 S. W. 558, 27 Ky. Law Rep. 724, declared void, and in Young v. McIlhenney, 116 S. W. 728, held to be unenforceable. In Berry v. Frisbie, etc., supra, the lease, while in some respects dissimilar to that in the case under consideration, was, in others, closely akin to it. For instance, it contained the provision: "Should minerals, coals, ores, oils, gases, etc., be found on the leased land in quantities which in the judgment of the said Frisbie and his associates or assignees will pay to work," etc. While in the lease here involved a similar provision is thus expressed: "When the party of the second part [lessee] shall conclude that phosphate or phosphate-bearing rock is not found on said premises in paying quantities," etc. It is manifest that each of these provisions put it in the power of the lessees to begin or discontinue mining operations upon the leased premises as they might elect. The meaning and effect of the provision quoted from the lease in the case of Berry v. Frisbie, etc., is explained in the opinion in that case as follows: "But if his lessees were not bound in fact to sink a well or wells upon the land to test its mineral properties, yet could keep appellant and all others from doing so, it would be in the power of the lessees to prevent its development indefinitely or forever. In that way the lessor would get nothing from his lease; would get nothing from even the chance of finding minerals there. In this view of the contract, it does not bind the lessees, either to sink a well upon the land, or to work the wells, if sunk, and if minerals should be found in paying quantities. They could in that way, though satisfied that the land did contain oil and gas, and though it be a fact that it did, get from it these properties, without paying anything, by draining them off through wells tapping the same pools or veins on the adjacent lands; or they could plug the holes and indefinitely postpone working the wells. Such contracts lack the mutuality essential to their validity. A unilateral executory contract is, in law, a nudum pactum, and is unenforceable. Where it is left to one of the parties to an agreement to choose whether he will proceed or abandon it, neither can specifically enforce it in equity. Litz v. Goosling, 93 Ky. 185 [19 S. W. 527, 14 Ky. Law Rep. 91, 21 L. R. A. 127]; Federal Oil Co. v. Western Oil Co. [C. C.] 112 Fed. 373; Marble Co. v. Ripley, 10 Wall. 339 [19 L. Ed. 955]. Nor is the recited consideration of $1 sufficient to uphold an action for the specific enforcement of a contract otherwise unsupported by consideration. As was said in Federal Oil Co. v. Western Oil Co., supra: 'The consideration would be so trifling, compared with the value of the leasehold interest, as to shock the moral sense.'"

In Young v. McIlhenney, supra, the lessee also had, under the contract, the sole right of development, and, as in the instant case, of indefinitely delaying or refusing to begin the work, yet retaining the option of protecting such right by small annual payments. After declaring that there was nothing in the lease binding the lessee to do anything, that the right to bore for oil or gas was purely optional with the lessee, that the lessor, though bound by the contract, could not compel the lessee to commence operations or continue them, the opinion quoted as applicable to the case the following excerpt from Litz v. Goosling, etc., 93 Ky. 185, 19 S. W. 527, 14 Ky. Law Rep. 91, 21 L. R. A. 127: "Reciprocity of obligation is however, essential to the validity of a contract; and it is a general rule that, in order to be binding upon or enforceable by one party, it must be so as to both. This is the very essence of it." And also the following from Donahue on Petroleum, etc., 155: "Where the lessee has a right to surrender the lease at any time, and be released from all liabilities under the lease, the lease is void for want of mutuality. * * * Where an oil or gas lease fails to bind the lessee to prosecute the work diligently, and the consideration for the lease is part of the oil or gas produced, the lease is void for want of mutuality. * * * A part of the oil produced as a consideration for the lease, and so much per well for gas, and, in case no wells are sunk, the lease to be null and void, unless the lessee paid a certain sum in advance for each quarter, the lease is but an option, and does not bind the lessee to pay any sum, and may be avoided by either party."

In Tennessee Oil, etc., Co. v. Brown, 131 Fed. 696, 65 C. C. A. 524, the action was one to obtain the cancellation of a lease as to coal and timber, as well as oil and gas; the lease containing a provision to the effect that the lessee should have the right to abandon the lease and mining at any time, and remove all his buildings and fixtures from the lands. Judge Lurton, in the opinion rendered, after apparently holding that the lease was an executory contract, said: "But, independently of any other ground, the chief provision of this lease authorizing the lessee to abandon whenever he should see fit makes it a lease at the will of the lessee. An estate terminable at the will of one of the parties is determinable at the will of the other, though it purports to be terminable at the will of only one."

[5] The fact that the cases of Berry v. Frisbie, etc., and Young v. McIlhenney involve leases with respect to oil and gas, which are "migratory," does not make the doctrine announced in those cases inapplicable to a lease as to coal or phosphate, although it may be, and doubtless is true, that the failure of the lessee to proceed with the work of development would be held to operate as an abandonment of an oil or gas lease in a shorter time than if such failure were to result in the case of a coal or phosphate lease, because of the greater danger of loss by delay.

[6] No reason is apparent for declaring that this lease should be held to be different from any other lease which is determinable at the will of one party, and therefore determinable, in law, at the will of either party. We are of opinion that it authorizes the lessee at any time, by written notice, to terminate the lease; and, this being true, the general rule laid down in Berry v. Frisbie, etc., and Young v. McIlhenney, supra, and also by the authorities upon the law of landlord and tenant, makes it terminable at the will of the lessor. 1 Washburn on Property, 371; Taylor's Landlord and Tenant, § 14; 18 American & English Encyclopedia of Law, 182.

Indeed, regarding the language and meaning of the lease as a whole, its obvious purpose was to bring about the development and sale of the minerals underlying the lessor's lands, which purpose the conduct of the lessee has prevented from being carried out, in view of which and the fact that there is no provision of the lease under which the lessor can require the lessee to pay, or do, or perform, its want of mutuality authorized its cancellation, as the circuit court adjudged.

[7] We think it also apparent from the evidence that the lease was procured by fraud on the part of the appellants and their agent, Garrett. Such fraud is shown by positive and direct evidence introduced in behalf of appellee, which was only evasively controverted by that of appellants. In order to induce appellee to execute the lease, it was, in substance, represented to her by the appellant Stark, who is admittedly interested with the appellant Killebrew in the lease, and by Garrett, the immediate representative of Killebrew, that the mining of the phosphate on her land, as they proposed to conduct operations if she would execute the lease, would pay her at the rate of $500 per acre "on all the rock territory or rock area where it could be mined." Stark also represented to appellee that she would receive the customary royalty paid in Tennessee for such phosphate as was mined on her land, which he claimed was 15 to 25 cents per ton. but that more of such leases were obtained at 15 cents than at 25 cents; and he and Garrett further represented to her that mining for the phosphate on her land would be commenced within a year or, at most, 18 months following the execution of the lease. According to her evidence, appellee believed these representations, and was induced by them to execute the lease, when without them she would not have done so. She seems to have especially relied upon what Stark said to her, as he was related to her by marriage and fully possessed her confidence. He, however, concealed from her the fact that he was to be interested with Killebrew in the lease, and informed her that he wished to see her enter into the lease only because Killebrew would take a similar lease on his land if he could secure the lease on hers.

It appears from the weight of the evidence that the above representations were untrue; for the prevailing price or royalty paid at that time in Tennessee to the lessor on brown phosphate rock, such as underlies appellee's land, was $1 to $1.10 per ton, which was known to Stark, as he had been to Tennessee and there ascertained the customary royalty.

The falsity of the further representations made, both by Stark and Garrett, is also patent, as the mining of appellee's land was not commenced within a year or 18 months of the execution of the lease, or at all; and neither $500 per acre, nor any other amount, in royalties, has been realized by her from the mining of her land.

As previously stated, Stark and Garrett were evasive in testifying as to the representations they made appellee to procure the lease. This is particularly true of Stark's deposition; his answers to questions as to such representations being, in the main, that he did not remember the conversation, or did not recall saying what was attributed to him as such representations by the evidence in behalf of the appellee.

In view of the foregoing evidence as to the manner in which the lease was obtained from appellee, to say nothing of the gross inadequacy of the royalty it stipulates she shall receive, and the like inadequacy of the $5 per annum rental, by virtue of which appellants seek to hold the land without mining it, we are constrained to believe that its execution was unfairly, even fraudulently, procured.

We are also of opinion that appellee's third contention is sustained by the facts presented by the record; that is, that appellants had no intention of carrying out the provisions of the lease, and that their failure to do so was, in legal effect, an abandonment of it, which entitled appellee to its cancellation, as adjudged by the circuit court.

[8] As already observed, appellee's purpose in granting the lease was to obtain an income or profit, by way of royalties, from the mining of phosphate on her land by appellants; and, in view of their representations as to the abundance of the phosphate, and their purpose to begin the work of mining it within a year or 18 months, it cannot be doubted that she expected a handsome income in royalties, from year to year, beginning with their mining operations, and continuing throughout the entire term of the lease. It would be doing violence to her intelligence, and that of appellants as well, to say that she was induced to execute the lease and thereby incur her farm, which had cost her $23,000, because of appellants' undertaking to pay her the paltry sum of $5 per annum during the continuance of the lease; nor it is to be presumed that she would have executed the lease if she had known that appellants had no intention of beginning work within a reasonable time, or that it was not their intention to begin at all. On the contrary, in the absence of a provision in the lease fixing the time for them to begin the work of mining, the presumption should be indulged that it was to begin within a reasonable time; and what would be reasonable time is a question of fact to be determined by all the circumstances of the case.

[9] Here the lease is silent as to the time of appellants beginning operations, but the circumstances attending its execution unmistakably show that they were to begin within a year or 18 months; and, as this time was fixed by appellants themselves, it must be considered a reasonable time.

In Eastern Ky. Mineral & Timber Co. v. Swann-Day Lumber Co., 148 Ky. 82, 146 S. W. 438, we had under consideration an instrument of writing conveying the fee to a seven-eighths interest in the minerals and timber on a tract of land. Certain of its provisions read as follows: "The grantor reserves one-eighth interest in the mineral and timber of said land, outside of the seven-eighths conveyed, and is to share with grantees as above mentioned. That is to say, the grantor is to receive one-eighth of the net profits of all minerals and timber taken from said tract, so soon as mining operations commence; said grantor also reserving of the timber herein conveyed a sufficient quantity for mill, fuel and fencing for his own use on his farm. This deed is not to embrace, or intended to convey, anything but the minerals and timber as stated, and not to interfere with the farming interest of said territory, only so far as is necessary to work and mine minerals, and getting out timber."

In construing this writing we held it to be a lease, which, though silent as to the time of beginning operations thereunder, required the grantee to do so within a reasonable time, as the condition of the parties and the circumstances surrounding the execution of the paper made it necessary that this be done to protect the rights of the grantor and to effect the intention of the parties. Moreover, that the grantee having failed to begin the contemplated work within a reasonable time, such failure was properly treated by the grantor as an abandonment by the grantee of the leased premises, entitling him to take possession thereof.

An excellent statement of the doctrine elaborately discussed in the case, supra, is contained in a note to Chauvenet v. Person, 217 Pa. 464, 66 Atl. 855, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.)

417, wherein the editor, in a review of numerous cases on the subject, says: "Generally, all leases of land for the exploration and development of minerals are executed by the lessor in the hope and upon the condition, either express or implied, that the land shall be developed for minerals; and it would be unjust and unreasonable, and contravene the nature and spirit of the lease, to allow the lessee to continue to hold under it any considerable length of time without making any effort at all to develop it according to the express or implied purpose of the lease; and, in general, while equity abhors a forfeiture, yet, when such a forfeiture works equity, and is essential to public and private interests in the development of minerals in land, the landowner, as well as the public, will be protected from the laches of the lessee and the forfeiture of the lease allowed, where such forfeiture does not contravene plain and unambiguous stipulations in the lease."

To the same effect are the following additional authorities: Shenandoah Land & Coal Co. v. Hise, 92 Va. 238, 23 S. E. 303; Aye v. Philadelphia Co., 193 Pa. 451, 44 Atl. 555, 74 Am. St. Rep. 696; 2 Page on Contracts, § 1123; Adams v. Ore Knob Copper Co. (C. C.) 7 Fed. 634; 2 Snyder on Mines, § 1136.

The rule laid down in the foregoing authorities must control in the case at bar. Looking at the lease in question, the situation of the parties, and the circumstances attending its execution, it cannot be doubted that it, by fair implication, imposed upon the lessees the duty to begin mining operations within a reasonable time, in order that appellee might receive the real and an adequate consideration for granting the lease.

[10] A year or 18 months was fixed by appellants as a reasonable time, yet they failed to begin work within that time, or at all. After waiting 3½ years for appellants to begin operations, during which time they made no effort to do so, appellee rightfully treated their inaction as an abandonment by them of the contract; therefore she had the right to bring suit for its forfeiture or cancellation.

Being of the opinion that the judgment of the circuit court properly determined the rights of the parties, it is hereby affirmed. Whole court sitting.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Dec. 17, 1912.)

1. WILLS (§ 165*)—CONTEST—UNDUE INFLUENCE—EVIDENCE—CONVERSATION WITH THIRD PERSONS.

In a will contest on the ground of undue influence alleged to have been asserted by testator's wife, evidence of conversations between testator and his friend indicating undue influence by the wife is admissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 415-420; Dec. Dig. § 165.*]

2. WILLS (§ 164*)—CONTEST—UNDUE INFLUENCE—EVIDENCE.

In a will contest for alleged undue influence by testator's third wife, evidence that the bulk of testator's estate was accumulated during the life of his second wife, that he owed the most of his fortune to her good management, and that one of the contestants was a daughter by testator's second wife, and was practically disinherited by the will, was admissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 408-414; Dec. Dig. § 164.*]

3. WILLS (§ 164*)—CONTEST—UNDUE INFLUENCE—PROPERTY OF PROPONENT.

Where testator's will, leaving the bulk of his property to his third wife and her child, was attacked on the ground of her alleged undue influence, she could not complain of evidence that she had little or no property at the time she married testator.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Edmonson County.

Will contest by Minnie Madison and others against Eliza B. Rhea and another. Judgment for contestants and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Grider & Logan, of Brownsville, and Grider & Harlin, of Bowling Green, for appellants. Sims & Rodes, of Bowling Green, and Logan & Hazelip, of Frankfort, for appellees.

LASSING, J. This is a contest over the will of W. T. Rhea. The will was executed on July 1, 1909. The testator died in October, 1911. By the will in question he devised to Mrs. Tamer Heester, Mrs. Minnie Madison, and Mrs. Lena Hudson, daughters by former marriages, the sum of $100 each. After the payment of his debts and the payment of the special bequests to his daughters, he gave all his personal property to his wife, Eliza B. Rhea. His farm he gave to his wife for life, with remainder to his only son, W. Taylor Rhea, Jr. He further provided that in the event his wife, Eliza B. Rhea, did not survive him the farm should go to his infant son, W. Taylor Rhea, Jr., in fee simple, and that all his personal property, after the payment of his debts, should be equally divided among his four children. The contestants are the three daughters, who attacked the will on the ground of undue influence exercised over the testator by his wife, Eliza B. Rhea. The contestees are Eliza B. Rhea and the infant, W. Taylor Rhea, Jr. The jury found against the will. Judgment was entered accordingly, and the contestees appeal.

The testator was married three times. By his first wife he had two children, Mrs. Tamer Heester and Mrs. Minnie Madison. His first wife did not live very long. After the death of his first wife he married Jane Merideth, who lived for a number of years and bore him one daughter, the contestant Lena Hudson. The testator's second wife died in March, 1905. In the month of June following the testator married appellant Eliza B. Rhea. During the following year William Taylor Rhea was born. The will in question was executed about two years and three months before the testator's death. During the latter part of June, 1909, the testator was a jurymen, and in attendance on the circuit court at Brownsville. While there, he approached John A. Logan, an attorney, and requested him to write the will. Mr. Logan prepared the will in accordance with the testator's directions. On July 1, 1909, the testator came to the bank at Rocky Hill and requested L. U. Cornelius and W. W. Saunders to witness the will. The testator signed the will in their presence, and they in his presence, and in the presence of each other, attested it. The will was then turned over to Mr. Cornelius, the cashier of the bank. Mr. Cornelius placed it in an envelope, sealed it up, and put it in a vault of the bank, where it remained until after the testator's death.

On the trial the will was produced and its execution proven by Messrs. Cornelius and Saunders. After describing the manner of its execution, Mr. Cornelius says that the testator's mind at that time was perfectly clear, and he had never known it to be otherwise. Mr. Saunders, after testifying to the execution of the will and its attestation by him and Mr. Cornelius, stated, on cross-examination, that he had three conversations with the testator with reference to his property, one about a year before the will was made, one about six weeks before he died, and one the night he died. In the first conversation the testator stated that he wanted to lay up $100 a year for his wife and child, so if anything happened to him they would have that much advantage over the others. In the second conversation he stated that he was going to try to make money enough to pay the girls their part and let the boy have the farm. On the night he died he called the witness to his bed. He stated to witness that he had sold some cattle, and wanted the witness to look after them. He also said that his papers were in the bank, and he wanted witness to see that "Sis" (the name he usually applied to his wife) and his boy got their part. This witness was permitted, over the objection of appellants, to say that Jane, his second wife, had made all he had; that upon going home after her death he found $150 that she had saved, after buying the groceries, and which he did not know that she had. Witness also stated that Mrs. Rhea had told him that Mr. Rhea had burned up his former will. Witness also testified that Mr. Rhea had $1,000 on time deposit in the bank, and one day he asked the witness to place half of it to the credit of his wife. Witness also stated that for a short time after his third marriage testator did not attend church regularly. Later on he became a regular attendant, and seemed to enjoy religion more than he ever did.

J. S. East testified that the testator told him that he intended to put $1,500 in the bank, so his wife could pay off the other heirs. Testator also said that he wanted his boy to have the farm.

For the contestants the evidence is as follows:

Mrs. Hudson testified that she and her husband, at the time her father married the third time, had her father's farm rented for the rest of the year. About two months after the marriage she and her husband moved out of her father's home and moved into another place on the land. There was never any trouble between her and her father, and her father always treated her in a way that showed that he loved her. She says, however, that they moved out of her father's house because they became dissatisfied. The reason for the dissatisfaction was that things after the marriage did not go on as they had done before. She and her husband would do the cooking, and her father and stepmother took the meat away from them. Witness knew nothing of the will in question, and also stated, on examination, that her relations with her father and stepmother were always friendly. Her father would frequently visit her, and he and her stepmother would often come together. Witness also visited her father and stepmother.

Mrs. Madison testified that she lived near Smith's Grove and on a farm adjoining her father. There was never anything wrong between her and her father. On the contrary, he always acted in a way to indicate that he loved her. Witness frequently visited her father and stepmother, and they in turn visited her. Witness was permitted, over the objection of appellants, to say that she remembered hearing her father say that he had received about $800 from witness' mother, who was her father's second wife. Witness also testified that she was 31 years of age, and had three boys and one girl.

Nathan Merideth testified that testator's farm was worth about $12,000, and that his personal property was worth about $4,000. He said that the testator was a member of the Baptist Church, and attended regularly before his last marriage. After that time he stopped for a while. Witness had a talk with him, and later on Mr. Rhea became a regular attendant. This witness also stated that he considered Mr. Rhea, the testator, a man who could be easily influenced. He said that he had persuaded him to come back to church, and it had taken him a long time to do so.

Belle Parish, a negro woman, who did washing and ironing, testified that she sometimes worked for Mr. Rhea's last wife. On one occasion Mrs. Rhea told her that she thought he (Mr. Rhea) ought to leave the property to her and her child, as the other children had men to support them. Mrs. Rhea said that Mr. Rhea did not want to do that, and she said she thought he ought to leave the property to her and her child. Mrs. Rhea further said if he did not want her to have the property she would feel like going home. This conversation took place about three years before the witness testified.

John Whittle testified that on one occasion he had a conversation with testator, who said that he was going to put $100 a year in the bank to his wife's credit until he got $1,000, so that his wife might have it to raise the boy on, if anything should happen to him. He said he meant for all his children to share equally, but he wanted to give his wife and last child that much over the others. In answer to a question as to whether or not Mr. Rhea was a man who was easily influenced by his friends or those close to him, witness said: "I think Mr. Rhea was a mighty fine man, but if you come at him right you could handle Mr. Rhea most any way."

W. C. Caffee testified that he had three different conversations with the testator. He told him on each occasion that he wanted to make money enough to put $100 in the bank each year for his wife to raise the boy on. In answer to a question as to whether or not Mr. Rhea was a man who could be easily influenced by those who were close to him, witness said: "I have always thought that particular friends could influence him. I have heard him say he would not do things, and go ahead and do them. I have seen him get aggravated about church matters, and say he wouldn't do things, and then I have seen him turn around and do them." Witness also stated that there was a period of time after testator's marriage that he did not attend church as regularly as he did before. On cross-examination witness stated that testator said that he wanted his boy to have the land, and that the testator told him that his boy's name was William Taylor Rhea, Jr.

John Rhea testified that the testator told him that he never would have been worth anything if it had not been for Jane, his second wife. Witness also stated that he thought that a man that Mr. Rhea liked could persuade him to do most anything.

Witness also said, "I believe I could have persuaded him to have loaned me money." Witness also stated that he himself was easily influenced by his friends.

Porter Compton testified that the wire fence running from the chicken house to the spring on the testator's place was built two or three years before he testified. He also said that anybody that the testator thought a right smart of might influence him. Witness further stated that he guessed that he himself could be influenced by persons that he liked.

Mart Whittle testified as follows: "I went over there one day to buy some 'ingerns.' I did not raise them. I could buy them cheaper. We went to see each other often, good neighbors and good friends; and we were out there in the 'ingern' patch, and I leaned up against the fence to talk awhile, and he said: 'My wife had been fretting at me and fretting at me to get me to make a will.' And he said: 'I finally said to her, 'I will make it your way.'" And he said he did make it her way, and took it and said, 'Thar it is.' But he said: 'I am going to tear it up. I want my children to share equal.' I said: 'Yes, Taylor, I would tear it up. That is her will. And I would make one of my own, and I would put it in the bank and say nothing to her about it.' He said: 'My first children are as good as my last, and I want them to share equal.'"

Witness, in answer to the question, "Did he [testator] have an apple at that time?" said: "Well, yes. I said: 'Taylor, sometimes I go home and I have an apple in my pocket, and I have four children, and when I get home I take my knife and cut the apple in four pieces and give each one a piece. I want them all equal.' And he laughed and said, 'That is right.' I said to him that I had some children that didn't do as I would have them do. I had a boy that drinks—" (Objected to by attorney for defendant.) By the Court: "Is he telling a part of the conversation he had with Mr. Rhea? If so, it is competent." Witness was then told to go ahead. He said: "It is not necessary to tell what I said about my boy. There is no need to tell about that." On cross-examination witness said he could not tell when it was that he went over there to buy onions. On being asked if it was before Mr. Rhea married the last time, he said: "I just don't know. I don't recollect. I paid no attention." Further on he said it had not been four years. He fixed the occasion as the one on which Henry Hudson built the wire fence from the henhouse to the spring. This witness was subsequently recalled for the purpose of laying the ground for contradiction. He was asked if he had not told a man by the name of Ferguson that the conversation that he had with Mr. Rhea occurred six or seven years ago, and during the lifetime of the second wife. Witness said: "I might have told him before thinking.

If I did, it was unthoughted. I didn't pay much attention."

For the contestees Mrs. Eliza B. Rhea testified that she was married to W. T. Rhea in June, 1905. At that time she lived close to his farm at Rocky Hill. She called her husband "Papa," and he called her "Sis." After she moved to her husband's place, Mr. and Mrs. Hudson moved out of the house to another house on the place. Her relations with her husband's daughters were always friendly and cordial. They frequently exchanged visits. The first time Mr. Rhea spoke to her about making a will was in the month of June, 1909. He came home from Brownville, and told her that he had had his will written. He told her that he was going to leave the will in the bank. He went over in a day or two, and told her that he had left it at the bank after he had signed it. Her husband said that he had raised all the others until they were grown, and he wanted Willie to have the farm. She stated that the wire fence that Mart Whittle referred to was built during the lifetime of the testator's second wife. Mart Whittle was there one day and sat out in the yard, but not by the fence. She never had any conversation with the negro named Belle Parish in reference to her husband's property. After she married her husband he showed her a former will which he had made. He said: "I will burn it up. It is no good; and when I know how I will make another." She never told him to burn it up. On cross-examination witness stated that she was 47, and the record showed that her husband was 64, at the time of his death. Over the objection of defendants, she testified that the first time her husband called he told her his business. This was on Wednesday. She told him she would think it over and pray over it. He came for his answer on Sunday. She got word on Thursday that he wanted to come to see her, and he came the following Wednesday. They were married the following Thursday. All this evidence was objected to. Witness also, over the objection of appellants, stated that Mary Merideth had told her that Mr. Rhea would make a new will; that he had made a will to his last wife, and would make another. It was some time after their marriage before he showed her the will that he had made during the life of his second wife. She thinks that he read it to her. After she and her husband were married, he never missed but one church meeting, and she never tried to keep him away from church. When she married her husband, she had only a yearling and a hog and her clothes and bedclothes. Mary Merideth said he had made a will, and would make a will to the woman he married. When her husband made the will in controversy, he brought it home. It was not then signed. He told her what was in it. Then he read it to her. Her husband then took it to Rocky Hill, and told her that he had signed it up and left it at the bank. Her husband told her that he wanted to save $1,500 and put it in the bank, so as to pay off any debts he had, and have enough left to run the farm.

John A. Logan testified that he drew the will in question. The testator was on the jury at the time, and came to witness in Rocky Hill. Testator was anxious to have the matter fixed right, and told witness to be careful. Witness was a stranger to the family, and had never done any business for the testator before. He did not know the name of a single child. The testator told him how he wanted the will written, and he wrote it exactly as testator directed. At the time the will was written, the testator was in perfect health, his mind was good, and he talked intelligently. Mr. Rhea was not present at the time the will was written. On cross-examination witness stated that Mr. Rhea was very cautious, and particular that no one should know that he had made a will. He asked witness if it was necessary for the witnesses to read the will, and witness told him it was not. He told the witness to keep the matter private, and not let any one know about the terms of the will.

J. W. Stice testified that the testator told him he wanted his son to have the farm, because he had his name, and wanted the business run in his name, just as he had run it. Mrs. Caffee testified that the testator said to her that he wanted the farm for Willie. W. F. Murphy testified that one month before the testator died he had a conversation with him, and his little boy was present at the time. Testator told witness that the boy's name was W. T., Jr., and that after he was dead he wanted his business to go on in the same name. Al. Whittle, a neighbor, 80 years of age, testified that he had a talk with the testator, in which the testator said that he had willed his farm to his son, and he wanted to put $1,500 in the bank to his wife's credit, so she would have something to run on. Testator said that he wanted his wife to have the land during her life, and at her death he wanted it to go to the boy. He further said that Mrs. Rhea thought a heap of Mr. Rhea, and he thought a heap of her. Mr. Rhea was honest and just so far as he knew. Irvin Stice testified that he heard the testator tell his father that he wanted the boy to have the farm; that he did not know what might become of the boy. Daniel Keith testified that about a year and two months before the testator died the testator told him that he had willed his property to his wife and little boy; and W. R. Slaughter testified that he and testator were down at Brownsville in June, almost two years before he testified, and the testator said that he aimed for his wife and baby boy to have what he had.

A reversal is sought upon two grounds: First, because the verdict of the jury finding against the will is flagrantly against the evidence, and not sustained by sufficient evidence; and, second, because the court erred in permitting incompetent evidence to go to the jury.

We will consider these objections in their inverse order. The record shows that the court, in the conduct of the trial, permitted the evidence to take a range covering practically the married life of appellant with the testator. Indeed, some of the witnesses testified to facts and circumstances leading up to their marriage. None of this evidence, however, can properly be objected to.

[1] The ground upon which the contest was based was undue influence, and it was sought by the contestants to show that from a period prior to the date of appellant's marriage with testator she had conceived the idea of acquiring all of his property. With this end in view, they introduced evidence to the effect that appellant was advised, shortly before her marriage to testator, that whoever became his wife would get his property. It is in rare instances only that undue influence can be established by direct evidence. Its existence is shown usually by the grouping of certain facts and circumstances together; and this frequently necessitates the introduction of evidence covering practically the married life of the parties concerned. It involves the introduction of conversations with the wife and with the testator; and when such conversations have a bearing upon the question at issue, and tend in any wise to support or establish the claim that undue influence has been exercised, it is but proper that the jury should have the benefit of the entire conversation. When viewed in this light, it is apparent that the evidence complained of, as to the conversation between the testator and his friend, Mart Whittle, was competent.

[2] Nor was it improper for the court to permit the contestants to show that the bulk of the testator's estate was accumulated during the life of his second wife, and that he recognized that to her efforts and good management, more than anything else, he was indebted for the fortune which he had at the time he married appellant. He had reared a daughter by his second wife. By the will in contest he had practically disinherited her; and it was not improper for her to show that practically the entire estate of her father, in which she was denied the right to participate, was brought to him or saved through the efforts of her mother.

[3] Nor can appellant complain that appellees called upon her to show what property she had at the time she married their father. The relation of the parties and their circumstances in life may always be shown; but if it should be held that the court erred in requiring appellant to testify as to what property she had at the time she married the testator we are of opinion that it was not prejudicial. On the contrary, it would rather be in her favor; for, if it created any impression at all on the minds of the jury, it would be calculated to excite their sympathy, instead of their prejudice against her. We find no error in the admission or rejection of evidence of which appellant can complain.

[4] This brings us to the complaint that the verdict is not supported by sufficient evidence. It is conceded by counsel for appellant, in their brief, that the evidence of Mart Whittle and Belle Parish has a direct bearing upon the question of undue influence, and that because of this evidence the trial court necessarily had to submit the case to the jury. No complaint is made of the instructions as given, so that, unless it can be said that the verdict is flagrantly against the evidence, we would be unauthorized in setting it aside. It is shown by the testimony of many witnesses that the relation between the testator, appellant, and his three children by his former wives was entirely friendly. They lived in the same neighborhood. So far as the record shows, there never was the slightest jar or difference among them. He was undoubtedly very devoted to the child of his old age, who bore his name; and it is in evidence that he said to several of his friends that he wanted this boy to have the farm. He likewise said to several of his friends that he was laying aside money annually for the purpose of educating this boy and of making provision for him. Indeed, at one time he placed in the bank to the credit of his wife $500, and said, when doing so, that he wanted to enable appellant to take care of the boy.

While there is much evidence going to show that the will in contest was the free and voluntary act of the testator, there is also evidence to the effect that it was not the character of will which he desired to make. There is evidence from which it could reasonably be inferred that it was the result of a determination on the part of his wife (appellant) to deprive his children by his former marriages of any participation in his estate. When the circumstances under which the will was drawn are read in the light of the information that was conveyed to appellant just before she married the testator, it is not difficult to understand what she meant when she said to her servant, Belle Parish, some time after her child was born, that she thought he (referring to her husband) ought to leave the property to her and her child, and if he did not want her to have the property she would feel like going home. But if the meaning of this conversation with the servant could not be seen to have any direct bearing on the question of undue influence on the part of the wife in the draft of the will in contest, when it is read in connection with the testimony of Mart Whittle as to what the testator said to him, the force and effect of this statement on the part of appellant is clearly brought out. He says that the testator said to him, "My wife has been fretting at me and fretting at me to make a will," and that he finally yielded and told her that he would do so, and that, in obedience to that promise, he caused the will to be made as it was, took it home to her, and told her, "That it is," and that thereafter he caused it to be executed and left at the bank. It is a singular circumstance that, although the testator caused this will to be drawn by a lawyer who lived several miles from his home, he did not execute it until he had taken it home, exhibited it to his wife, and knew that she was satisfied with it. It is also a singular coincidence that the will, as drawn, disposed of his property in exactly the way in which his wife said to the servant, Belle Parish, that he should dispose of it.

It is argued that there is no direct evidence showing that appellant ever requested her husband to make a will of any character. It is true there is no direct evidence, but this testimony of the servant as to how appellant said it should be made, when read in connection with that of Mart Whittle that the testator told him how it came to be made, if true, is even more convincing; for it shows that appellant, while endeavoring to have a will drawn so as to give her and her son all of the property, was at the same time trying to proceed in such a way as to avoid deduction. If these witnesses are to be believed, their evidence shows that she determined to have the property willed to her and her son in the way and manner in which it was, and that she kept at her husband until he complied with her request. Whether she went so far as to advise him that if her wish was not complied with she would leave him, the evidence does not show. If the servant's evidence is true, there is no doubt that she would have pressed her claim to that extent, had it become necessary. All the testimony shows that he loved all of his children equally well, and wanted to treat them all alike. Under the circumstances we are not prepared to say that the jury was not warranted in finding that the paper in contest was the result of an undue influence, and was not the product of the free and unbiassed mind of the testator. No satisfactory explanation was offered by appellant for the unreasonable and unnatural act of the testator in attempting practically to disinherit the appellees. All of the evidence shows that he loved them. They lived near him; were constantly associated with him. Aside from the statement of the witnesses that he visited them and they visited him frequently, we have his expressed desire to treat them all alike in the distribution of his estate. Why, then, did he fail to do so? No satisfactory answer is given. The only explanation whatever offered is that to be found in the testimony of the servant, Belle Parish, coupled with that of the witness Mart Whittle; and the jury was warranted in accepting their statements as true. If so, the testator was undoubtedly unduly influenced by his wife to give to her and her son his property to the exclusion of his daughters, who were equally dear to him, and for whom he desired to make the same provision.

After a careful consideration of the record, we fail to find any meritorious ground upon which a reversal should be based. The judgment is therefore affirmed.

CITY OF CARLISLE v. CAMPBELL.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Dec. 17, 1912.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§§ 762, 763*)—DEFECTIVE STREETS—LIABILITY FOR INJURIES TO TRAVELERS.

A city must maintain its streets in a reasonably safe condition, and, where it knows that rock has been placed in a street by an abutting owner, it must see that it is properly guarded, and is liable to a traveler injured by driving on the unguarded rock, and it is no defense that the city had no knowledge that the owner failed to put lights on the rock.

2. TRIAL (§ 260*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REFUSAL OF INSTRUCTIONS COVERED BY THE CHARGE GIVEN.

It is not error to refuse instructions substantially covered by the charge given.

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 762*)—DEFECTIVE STREETS—LIABILITY FOR INJURIES TO TRAVELERS.

A city may not shift the statutory burden imposed on it to keep its streets reasonably safe for public travel by adopting an ordinance allowing property owners, under the direction of the mayor, to use portions of the streets when erecting improvements on abutting lots; but it is answerable to a traveler injured by the unsafe condition of the street by reason of an obstruction placed thereon by an abutting property owner, where it knowingly suffers the obstruction to remain without taking proper precaution for the safety of the traveling public.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Nicholas County.

Action by Newell Campbell against the City of Carlisle. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Holmes & Ross, of Carlisle, for appellant. Wm. Conley, of Carlisle, and Jno. P. McCartney, of Flemingsburg, for appellee.

HOBSON, C. J. A property owner in September, 1911, was making an improvement on his lot fronting Main street in Carlisle and for this purpose hauled and placed in the street a pile of rock 10 or 12 feet long, 4 or 5 feet wide, and from 1 to 2 feet high; the pile of rock being 4 or 5 feet from the curb, and there being about 25 feet of the street left unobstructed. The pile of rock had been there about two weeks when Newell Campbell, who lived in the country, while driving down the street about dusk in a buggy, drove over the rock and was thrown out of his buggy and hurt. He brought this suit against the city to recover for his injuries. The proof on the trial showed clearly that the city authorities knew of the rock pile in the street, or should have known of it in the exercise of ordinary care. There were no lights upon the pile of rock, the street lamps had not been turned on; but there were lights put up for private purposes along the street and not far from the rock pile. There is much in the evidence to show that Campbell might have seen the rock, but in fact he did not see it, and whether he was negligent was a question for the jury. There was considerable evidence tending to show that Campbell was under the influence of whisky and that this was the cause of the trouble. But all these matters were fairly submitted to the jury by the instructions of the court. They found a verdict for Campbell for $375. There was much in the evidence to show that he was not much hurt, but we cannot say under all the proof that the verdict is palpably against the evidence or so excessive as to warrant us in disturbing it.

[1] It may be that the property owner was negligent in putting the rock in the street as he did and failing to put a light upon it to warn persons of the danger at night; but his negligence does not exonerate the city from liability. The primary duty rests upon the city to maintain its streets in a reasonably safe condition. When it knew the rock was in the street, it was incumbent on it to see that it was properly guarded, and it is liable to a person injured by reason of the street being in a dangerous condition. It is no defense to the city that it did not know that the property owner had failed to put lights on the rock. When it knew that the rock was in the street and that it made the street unsafe for public travel when without lights at night, it was its duty to see that its street was kept safe. In Glasgow v. Gillenwaters, 113 Ky. 143, 67 S. W. 881, 23 Ky. Law Rep. 2375, we sustained a recovery against the city where a person had been injured by falling in the dark over a wire stretched in the street by a contractor. We do not see that this case can be distinguished from that. See, also, Midway v. Lloyd, 74 S. W. 197, 24 Ky. Law Rep. 2448; Carlisle v. Secrest, 75 S. W. 268, 25 Ky. Law Rep. 336; Paducah v. Simmons, 144 Ky. 641, 139 S. W. 851; Campbellsville v. Morgan, 150 Ky. 417, 150 S. W. 521. The case of Elam v. Mt. Sterling, 132 Ky. 657, 117 S. W. 250, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 512, is very different from this case. That was a suit for a horse taking fright at some rock; and it was held that there could be no recovery, as the rock was not of an unusual character and was out of the traveled way of the street. Here the rock was in the street, and when the buggy ran over it the man was thrown out.

[2] The instructions which the court gave were substantially the same as those asked by the defendant. We do not see that the jury could have understood them differently.

[3] The court properly sustained the demurrer to the second paragraph of the answer pleading that the city had enacted an ordinance allowing property owners under the direction of the mayor to use a portion of the street when erecting improvements on the lots abutting on the street, and that the rocks in question had been placed in the street by the property owner under the ordinance but without the direction of the mayor. The statute commits the streets to the care of the city, and imposes on it the burden of keeping them reasonably safe for public travel. This burden the city cannot by its ordinance shift from itself to a property holder. He may be liable to it, but it is answerable to the person injured, by reason of the unsafe condition of the street, where it knowingly suffers the obstruction to remain in the street without taking proper precaution for the safety of the traveling public.

Judgment affirmed.

SANDERS v. STANDARD WHEEL CO.
(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Dec. 17, 1912.)

1. ACCORD AND SATISFACTION (§ 11*)—WHAT CONSTITUTES.

To constitute an accord and satisfaction, it is necessary that the sum less than that demanded be offered in full satisfaction of the demand and be accompanied by such acts and declarations as amount to a condition that the money, if accepted, is accepted in satisfaction, so that the party to whom the money is offered is bound to understand therefrom that, if he takes it, he acts subject to the condition.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Accord and Satisfaction, Cent. Dig. §§ 75-83; Dec. Dig. § 11.*]

2. ACCORD AND SATISFACTION (§ 27*)—ACCEPTANCE OF SUM LESS THAN THAT DEMANDED—EVIDENCE.

Plaintiff sold a car load of spokes to defendant for $1,574.74 subject to defendant's inspection and acceptance. After examination, defendant sent plaintiff an invoice with a check for $1,280.99, the invoice containing a printed clause that the check was in full of the invoice and that the payee accepted it as such by indorsement of the check, and if satisfactory no acknowledgment was necessary. Plaintiff returned the check with a statement that it was not accepted, asked defendant to return the spokes, and sent a check to cover return freight. Defendant returned its original check, stating that the spokes could not be returned because some of them had been used; that if plaintiff would come to defendant's place of business defendant could convince him of the correctness of its inspection. Plaintiff, on receipt of that letter, cashed the check and sued for the balance. Held, that defendant's second letter was not calculated to apprise plaintiff of the fact that it was intended as payment in full, and that plaintiff's acceptance of the check did not constitute an accord and satisfaction, as a matter of law.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Madison County.

Action by Alva Sanders against the Standard Wheel Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

L. M. Morancy and W. S. Moberly, both of Richmond, and J. S. Fullerton, of Ashland, for appellant. Greenleaf & Herrington, of Richmond, for appellee.

LASSING, J. Alva Sanders of Ashland, Ky., entered into a contract with the Standard Wheel Company of Terre Haute, Ind., by the terms of which he agreed to sell and deliver to the company, for the sum of $1,574.74, a car load of club-turned spokes, delivery to be made at the company's place of business in Terre Haute, Ind., and subject to its inspection and acceptance. Shortly thereafter a car load of spokes was shipped to the company. Upon examination, the spokes, according to the contention of the company, did not, in all particulars, meet the requirements of the contract. After such examination and inspection, it sent to Sanders an invoice of same, accompanied by its check for $1,280.99. Upon the invoice there appeared the following printed matter: "Payment in full of the above invoices and payee accepts it as such by endorsement of check. If satisfactory, no acknowledgment necessary." Upon receipt of this invoice and check, Sanders, on March 1, 1911, wrote the company the following letter: "March 1, 1911. The Standard Wheel Company, Terre Haute, Ind.—Gentlemen: I am inclosing herewith your check for $1,280.99. The same will not be accepted by me. Please return my spokes to me or send me check for same according to my invoice price. I am inclosing my check to cover freight on spokes if same are returned to me. In returning spokes be sure you get them all loaded. Yours truly, Alva Sanders." On March 10th, the Standard Wheel Company wrote, in response, this letter: "March 10, 1911. Alva Sanders Spoke Factory, Ashland, Ky.—Gentlemen: Yours of March 1st was received while the writer was in New Orleans, hence no reply sooner. The inclosed check is in accordance with our inspection of the car of spokes you shipped us. If you will refer to our letter, it provides for our inspection. We do not buy spokes for ornaments, but to put in wheels and some of the spokes you shipped us are now in wheels, the material being fairly dry when we received it. It is, therefore impossible to return the spokes to you. However, if you come here, we can convince you and show you the percentage of D. & E. that we got out of this material when it came on the sorting bench. We therefore return our check as well as the one you sent us for freight. Very truly yours, Standard Wheel Co., President. M. Inclosures." Thereafter Alva Sanders cashed the check for $1,280.99 and brought suit against the Standard Wheel Company to recover the balance of the money claimed to be due him under their agreement. The defendant denied that it owed plaintiff anything whatever, and, in an amended answer, pleaded accord and satisfaction and, in support of said plea, filed the check and invoice referred to. To this answer and plea, plaintiff replied, traversing the affirmative matter therein and, in addition, alleged that there was no letter or statement accompanying the check advising him that it was in full settlement of his claim. With this reply was filed the letter sent by him to defendant, referred to and copied above. The defendant thereupon filed its rejoinder, and with it the letter last above referred to. To this rejoinder, plaintiff filed no responsive pleading. The defendant thereupon moved the court to take the allegations of the rejoinder as confessed. The court, upon consideration, sustained this motion and entered a judgment dismissing the plaintiff's suit, and from that order and judgment he prosecutes this appeal.

The sole question raised is as to the sufficiency of the plea of accord and satisfaction. Appellant, in his reply, after denying the affirmative matter of the answer as amended, in which the plea of accord and satisfaction was set up, alleged that the letter which accompanied the check, when it was returned to him by appellee, failed to advise that it was intended as a full and complete settlement of his claim. The rejoinder was, in effect, but a restatement of the matter set out in the answer as amended. We are of opinion that no surrejoinder was necessary to complete the issue, for the answer and reply perfected the issue on this plea.

The correctness of the court's ruling depends upon whether or not the exhibits, filed with the several pleadings, support the contention of appellee that the check for $1,280.99 was tendered to and finally accepted by appellant, in satisfaction of his claim. In 1 Cyc. p. 331, the author accurately states the essentials necessary to constitute an accord and satisfaction, as follows:

[1] "In order that the payment of a smaller sum than demanded shall operate as a satisfaction of the claim, it must be accepted as such. Where a person accepts a tender, but not in full of all demands, this acceptance will not conclude him from claiming more. The nature of the offer or tender by the debtor is an important consideration in determining whether there has been an acceptance and satisfaction. To constitute an accord and satisfaction it is necessary that the money should be offered in full satisfaction of the demand, and be accompanied by such acts and declarations as amount to a condition that the money, if accepted, is accepted in satisfaction; and it must be such that the party to whom it is offered is bound to understand therefrom that, if he takes it, he takes it subject to such conditions."

In Cunningham v. Standard Construction Co., 134 Ky. 198, 119 S. W. 765, this court had under consideration a question in many respects similar to that raised in the case at bar. The authorities are, in that opinion, reviewed at length, and, in their controlling principles, found to be in harmony with the text above quoted, the court saying: "No question is more thoroughly settled than that, where one owes a fixed and definite sum, the payment or tender of a sum less than the amount of the debt, even though accompanied with a statement that it is in full, though accepted by the creditor, does not operate to defeat him from collecting the balance of his debt, for the reason that there is no consideration for the surrender of the unpaid portion. There is nothing to support a consideration in such a case; but an entirely different rule obtains in that class of cases where the parties do not agree upon the amount of the indebtedness, and in such cases it has uniformly been held that, where a sum less than that claimed by the creditor is offered by the debtor in settlement or satisfaction of the claim, its acceptance and retention by the creditor discharges the obligation, and in such cases the creditor has been denied the right, after accepting the conditional offer, to collect the balance of his debt." After citing authorities from many states supporting this view, the opinion continues: "All of the authorities are in harmony with those which we have cited, and in each particular case where accord and satisfaction is relied upon as a defense, if it is made to appear that there is a dispute between the parties as to the amount due, and that a sum less than the amount in dispute is tendered by the debtor to the creditor in satisfaction of the claim, and accepted by the latter, the plea has been upheld. The right to name the terms upon which the tender shall be accepted rests alone with the debtor. He makes his own terms, and the creditor must either accept the tender burdened with the conditions thereto attached by the debtor or else reject it."

[2] Applying these principles to the case under consideration, we find that the invoice and check, by which it was accompanied, must be read and considered together, and, when so read, no one of ordinary intelligence could fail to understand that, if the check was accepted, it would necessarily be in full settlement and satisfaction of the claim. Appellant did not accept this proposition, but, as is evidenced by his letter, rejected it, and not only returned the check to appellee, but also inclosed in the letter his own check to cover the cost of reshipment of the spokes to him, and requested that appellee exercise care to see to it that all of the spokes were returned. He was evidently not satisfied with the invoice, and certainly unwilling to accept the amount tendered to him. After the lapse of a week or ten days, appellee, through its president, wrote this second letter, and with it returned the same check which had been tendered in its first letter to appellant. This letter does not say that the check must be received in settlement of the claim, if it is accepted, nor is there any reference in this letter to the invoice which accompanied the first letter. The right to inspect is asserted, and this right appellant had not denied. There are two significant statements. One is to the effect that the spokes could not be returned, for the reason that some of them had been used; and the second is an invitation to appellant to visit its plant to satisfy himself with the inspection and invoice, as made by appellee. Now, this letter is clearly open to two constructions. It is susceptible to the construction given it by appellee and his counsel. This construction, however, can only be given it when it is read in connection with the first letter, in which the invoice was inclosed. It is likewise susceptible to another construction, and that is that appellee was willing to negotiate with appellant further, with the view of adjusting their differences, and it was in this light that appellant understood it, or else he would not have cashed the check. That this letter is susceptible to this construction is easily shown, for, suppose appellant had accepted appellee's invitation and gone to its plant in Terre Haute, and, upon investigation, it was found that appellant was entitled to more money, would the plea of accord and satisfaction have been available, and would he have been estopped from collecting the balance found to be due him over and above what he had received? Certainly not. The tender of a sum less than the contract price, in settlement of a disputed claim, must be accompanied with a statement, not which may be understood by the creditor as intended to be in full settlement and satisfaction of the claim, but which must be so understood by him. That is, the statement must be so clear, full, and explicit that it is not susceptible of any other interpretation. To hold otherwise would put it in the power of a sharp, shrewd business man frequently to take advantage of the ignorant, uneducated, or unwary, and open the way, in the business and commercial world, to the perpetration of frauds rather than the honest settlement of disputes. In our opinion, the letter in the case at bar which accompanied the check upon its second return to appellant was not such as was calculated to apprise him of the fact that it was intended as a payment in full, or, at least, it was not such a letter as did not leave this question in doubt. The minds of the parties had not met. Where the facts surrounding a transaction show that the minds of the parties have not met, a tender and acceptance of a sum less than the full amount of the demand may not be regarded as an accord and satisfaction. Louisville, New Albany & Chicago Ry. Co. v. Helm & Bruce, 109 Ky. 388, 59 S. W. 323, 22 Ky. Law Rep. 964. The trial court erred, therefore, in holding, as a matter of law, that the cashing of appellee's check by appellant, under the circumstances disclosed in the exhibits, constituted a bar to the right of appellant to prosecute his claim for the balance due him under his contract.

For the reasons indicated, the judgment is reversed for further proceedings consistent herewith.

SAMUEL v. SAMUEL'S ADM'R.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Dec. 17, 1912.)

1. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 157*)—PART PAYMENT—APPLICATION OF CREDITS—CONSENT.

The holder of a note cannot apply on the note anything he owes the maker without his consent, so as to interrupt the running of the statute of limitations.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Mercer County.

Action by Agnes B. Samuel against H. E. Samuel's administrator. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

R. H. Gaither, of Harrodsburg, for appellant. J. F. Vanarsdall, of Harrodsburg, for appellee.

CARROLL, J. In July, 1911, H. E. Samuel died, and the following November a suit was filed in the Mercer circuit court for a settlement of his estate. In this suit the appellant filed six claims against his estate, amounting in the aggregate to $3,700. One of these claims was an open account for services rendered to him as clerk. The others were five notes, one for $1,419.68, dated February 6, 1894, and due one day after date, one for $200, dated May 3, 1895, due one day after date, one for $400, dated June 19, 1897, due one day after date, one for $200, dated March 30, 1897, due one day after date, and one for $392.21, dated February 1, 1905, due one day after date. The notes for $1,419.68 and $200 were contested by the administrator, upon the ground that they were barred by the 15-year statute of limitation. From the judgment of the lower court, sustaining this defense, this appeal is prosecuted.

As more than 15 years had elapsed between the maturity of the notes and the death of H. E. Samuel, the statute presented a complete bar, unless, as contended by counsel for appellant, the life of these two notes was extended by payments, which, it is claimed, appellant had the right to credit them by, before the expiration of 15 years from their maturity. No credit is indorsed on either of the notes; but it is insisted, on behalf of appellant, that the amount of a store account and a board bill due by appellant to H. E. Samuel should have been credited on these notes, and that it was agreed this should be done.

The evidence in the case consists of checks and other written exhibits, an agreed statement of fact, and the deposition of Miss Mary Bright. The appellant also gave her deposition; but objection was properly sustained to so much of it as related to conversations or transactions had with the deceased, and the remainder of it throws no light on the controversy.

It appears that in 1898 the deceased began business in Harrodsburg as a druggist, at which time the appellant, who was his daughter-in-law, came to live with him, and so continued until his death. During this time, and beginning in January, 1898, the appellant opened an account at the drug store of H. E. Samuel, and this account continued to February 1, 1905, when it amounted, including $50 for Miss Bright's board, to $496.52. On this date it appears that the account of $496.52 was deducted from a note for $1,388.70, due to Mrs. Samuel, and a new note executed for $892.21; this new note being one of the five heretofore mentioned. On March 4, 1905, a new account was opened, and this account, which was made up of various articles of merchandise, and included a charge of $100 for Miss Bright's board from March 20, 1905, to January 28, 1906, continued until June 27, 1911, when it amounted to $314.91.

Passing, for the present, the evidence of Miss Bright, it appears from the exhibits and agreed state of facts that appellant opened an account at the store of H. E. Samuel in January, 1898, and that this account continued to run until February 1, 1905, at which time it was settled in the manner before stated, and in March, 1905, a new account was opened by appellant, which continued to run until June 27, 1911, at which time it amounted to $314.91. From this statement it will be seen that virtually all the time from January, 1898, to June, 1911, appellant owed H. E. Samuel a store account, which included the board of Miss Bright, and that H. E. Samuel owed appellant during all this time the two notes in controversy in this case, dated 1894 and 1895, as well as the two notes dated in 1897, and, for about six years of this time, the note dated in 1905. No credit is indorsed on either of these notes, but it is the contention of appellant in her pleadings that it was agreed that the store account due by her and the board of Miss Bright should be credited on these notes at stated intervals; for example, in July and January of each year.

If this was done, of course the barred notes would be taken out of the statute. There is, however, no evidence tending to support this averment of the pleading, except the testimony of Miss Bright, whose board from November, 1904, to January, 1906, was due to H. E. Samuel, and Miss Bright's testimony, so far as pertinent, is as follows: "Q. When you came to live with her, were there any arrangements made about your board? A. Yes, sir. Q. Who paid that board? A. Mr. Henry Bright of Danville. Q. To whom was it paid? A. It was to go on Mrs. Samuel's notes. Q. What amount was paid? A. $10 a month for 14 months, $140. Q. When these arrangements were made for board, how did you know anything about it? A. My uncle told me so. Q. Were you present when the arrangements were made? A. Yes, sir; I was in the store. Q. When the checks would come in, they would be payable to Mrs. Samuel? A. Yes; and she would take them to the store and show them to him every month. Q. You heard Mr. Samuel tell her to let the board money go on the notes? A. Yes, sir. Q. And that is all you know about that? A. Yes, sir. Q. Did you know anything about these notes, except what she said? A. I knew he owed her money. Q. She told you that? A. Yes."

It appears from this evidence that the board Miss Bright paid was to go as a credit on the notes appellant held against H. E. Samuel, but she does not say on which of the five notes appellant at that time held it was to go as a credit. She only knew that she heard H. E. Samuel tell appellant to "let the board money go on the notes." She did not know anything about the notes, except what appellant told her; and it does not appear that appellant told her what notes she held, or anything about them, except that H. E. Samuel owed her money.

That the parties did not understand that Miss Bright's board was to be put as a credit on the notes executed in 1894 and 1895, or on any particular note, is shown by the fact that a part of her board was included in the settlement made on February 1, 1905, and went to reduce a note for $1,388.70 to $892.21. But treating this circumstance as of no importance in adjudging the case, the evidence of Miss Bright is not sufficient to save the notes in controversy from the statutory bar.

At the time Miss Bright's board was paid, no one of the notes was barred by limitation; and it may be conceded that under the general direction given by H. E. Samuel as to the manner in which he wanted Miss Bright's board applied the appellant had the right, at the time, or in a reasonable time thereafter, to apply the amount of the board as a credit on any of the notes, or to distribute it as a credit on all of them, and that if she had then made this application it would have cut off the antecedent time on all of the notes to which the payment was applied as a credit. Brown v. Osborne, 136 Ky. 456, 124 S. W. 405.

But appellant did not, at the time the board was paid, or at any time during the five years that H. E. Samuel lived thereafter, apply the board money as a credit on any of the notes; nor is there any evidence to show why she did not do this, or to excuse or explain her failure to make the application when the board was paid, or within a reasonable time. This being true, the case must be considered as if no special direction was given by H. E. Samuel as to the application of the board money, and so we will treat the board money merely as a part of the account that appellant owed H. E. Samuel, and deal with it as a part of that account.

Indeed, appellant, in her pleading, does not rely on any special direction as to the application of the board money, but treats it as a part of her general account. Looking at the matter from this standpoint, the question for decision is: Did appellant, after the two notes in controversy were barred by limitation, or before that time, or at any time, have the right, without the consent or direction of H. E. Samuel, to apply the amount she owed him on account as a credit on these notes as of the date when the account became due—say at the end of each six months beginning in 1905—and by applying the store account as a credit on the notes in 1905, 1906, 1907, 1908, 1909, and 1910 save them from their being barred by the statute? We think not.

[1] When the creditor owes a claim or demand to the debtor, he cannot, without the consent or direction of the debtor, apply what he owes as a credit on the note or demand he holds against the debtor; and if he makes the application without the direction or consent of the debtor it will not interrupt the running of the statute of limitation. The reason for this rule is that the debtor, who is, to the extent of his demand, a creditor, has the right to direct and control the disposition that shall be made of his debt, and to apply, or not apply, as he pleases, to the payment of demands that he owes; and this privilege cannot be taken out of his hands by the mere act of another person.

As said in Brown v. Osborne, 136 Ky. 456, 124 S. W. 405: "The mere putting of a credit on an open account or note, unless there is evidence showing that the amount represented by the credit was paid by the debtor on the note or account, will not be sufficient, in itself, to stop the statute from running. Hopkins v. Stout, 6 Bush, 375; Frazer v. Frazer, 13 Bush, 397. If the mere entry of a payment as a credit upon an open account or note would, of itself, have this effect, it would be an easy matter for the creditor, if he felt so disposed, to evade the plea of limitation and stop the statute from running against any account or note that was barred." To the same effect are Anderson v. Baxter, 4 Or. 105; Nash v. Woodward, 62 S. C. 418, 40 S. E. 895; Phillips v. Mahan, 52 Mo. 197; Kyger v. Ryley, 2 Neb. 20. As appellant could not do this before the notes were barred, of course she could not, after some of the notes were barred, apply, as a credit on these notes, the account she owed H. E. Samuel, and thereby restore them to life.

[2] If H. E. Samuel during his life, and after some of the notes had been barred, had directed her in a general way to credit his notes by the amount of her account, she could not have applied any part of the account on the barred notes, either in part payment of them, or as a payment that would arrest the running of the statute as to the balance of the notes. As she could not have done this if he were living, neither can she do it after his death.

There is some conflict in the cases as to the right of a creditor to apply undirected payments to barred notes; but we think the sound and correct rule is that where a debtor owes a creditor several notes, and he makes a payment without directing its application to either of the notes, the creditor may apply it to whichever one he pleases, except that he may not apply it in part payment of or as a credit on a note that is barred by limitation, and thereby restore life to the note. It will not be presumed that a debtor, in making a payment to a creditor who holds several notes against him, intended, in making the payment, that it should be applied to a nonenforceable note, or to impart life into notes that were then dead; nor will the creditor be permitted to so apply the payment, unless with the consent of the debtor. The presumption will be, if no direction is given by the debtor, that he intended the payment to be applied as a credit on subsisting, enforceable debts against him, and so if the creditor holds several subsisting, enforceable notes, none of which are barred by limitation, he will be at liberty to credit each of them by a part of the payment, unless directed otherwise to do by the debtor, and may thus prolong the life of all the notes; but the debtor has the exclusive right, in making a payment, to direct the particular debt he desires it applied to, and this direction the creditor must observe. Anderson v. Nystrom, 103 Minn. 168, 114 N. W. 742, 13 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1141, 123 Am. St. Rep. 320, 14 Ann. Cas. 54; Wilden

DEPOSIT & SAVINGS BANK v. WRIGHT.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Dec. 17, 1912.)

PLEDGES (§ 30*)—ENFORCEMENT OF MORTGAGE PLEDGED—DILIGENCE—WAIVER.

Where a bank assigned a note, secured by mortgage, to plaintiff as security for a loan, agreeing at the time to take up the note as soon as it could, such agreement constituted a waiver of diligence on plaintiff's part in enforcing a judgment on the security; plaintiff being entitled to recover against the bank on its oral promise at any time within the statute of limitations.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Warren County.

Action by D. W. Wright, trustee, against the Deposit & Savings Bank. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

John M. Galloway and Galloway & Milliken, all of Bowling Green, for appellant. W. B. Gaines, of Bowling Green, for appellee.

CLAY, C. On July 5, 1906, P. E. Stiff being indebted to the Deposit & Savings Bank of Bowling Green, Ky., on an overdraft, he and his wife, Clara E. Stiff, executed and delivered to the bank a promissory note for that amount, bearing interest at the rate of 6 per cent. from date, and due and payable one day after date. To secure the payment of this note, they executed and delivered to the bank a mortgage on a house and lot in Bowling Green belonging to Clara E. Stiff. During the panic in the fall of 1907, the bank was in need of cash, and asked D. W. Wright if he had any money which he would let the bank have. Wright, as trustee for a client of his, had on hand the sum of $234.88. He signified his willingness to let the bank have this sum provided the bank would secure him with good paper. Thereupon the bank produced the Stiff note. It appears that both Wright and the vice president of the bank, who was the bank's active officer, and attended to such matters for the bank, believed that P. E. Stiff was insolvent. The note was accepted by Wright in the belief and upon the assurance of the vice president that the note was good by reason of the mortgage securing it. Both Wright and the then vice president of the bank also testified that the vice president agreed on behalf of the bank that, if Wright would make the loan, the bank would take up the note as soon as it could. On September 29, 1910, Wright and the bank as parties plaintiff brought suit against the Stiffs, wherein they asked for a personal judgment against them and the enforcement of the mortgage lien. Clara Stiff pleaded that she was an infant at the time the mortgage was executed, and, upon this fact being conclusively shown, the action as to her was dismissed on April 11, 1911. Prior to that time, and on November 12, 1910, personal judgment had been rendered against P. E. Stiff. Execution was not issued on this judgment until December 11, 1911. On the same day that it was issued it was returned no property found. On December 11, 1911, D. W. Wright, trustee, brought this action to recover on the note in question. The bank pleaded want of diligence on the part of plaintiff, not only in bringing the suit, but in having execution issued on his personal judgment against P. E. Stiff. Plaintiff pleaded that he was excused from diligence in bringing the suit because of the bank's agreement to take up the note as soon as it could, and because of the other facts above set out. The chancellor rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff, and the bank appeals.

Whether or not want of diligence in bringing suit may be relied upon to defeat a recovery on a note in a case like this is a question which we deem it unnecessary to decide. There is practically no dispute as to the circumstances under which the note in question was assigned and the loan by the plaintiff to the bank was made. The bank was in need of funds. It applied to plaintiff for a loan. It agreed not only to give plaintiff the note in question as security for the loan, but at the same time agreed to take the note up as soon as it could. This separate undertaking on the part of the bank to take up the note as soon as it could was sufficient to dispense with and constituted a waiver of diligence in bringing suit and having execution issued on the judgment, even if diligence was required in order to hold the bank liable; and, suit having been brought before the oral promise of the bank was barred by the statute of limitations, we conclude that the chancellor properly adjudged a recovery in favor of the plaintiff.

Judgment affirmed.

3. BOUNDARIES (§ 43*) — JUDGMENT—AGREED ORDER—EFFECT.

An agreed order, in a suit involving title to land, that the chain of title to plaintiff's boundary, as set out in the petition, is deducible of record, that the chain of title to defendant's boundary, as shown by the deed filed, is deducible of record, and that the boundaries filed are the boundaries as shown by the surveyor's books and deeds, and that any deeds or records that may be required for a correct determination are considered filed, and may be supplied, merely avoids the introduction of evidence of claim of title on either side, but does not show which title is the older; and, though plaintiff's title from the commonwealth is superior, defendant and those under whom he claims may have acquired title by adverse possession, and judgment need not necessarily be entered for plaintiff.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Muhlenberg County.

Action by T. F. Dockins and another against J. W. Dukes. From a judgment of dismissal, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Milton Clark, of Greenville, and M. M. Logan and Ora E. Hazell, both of Frankfort, for appellants. Newton Belcher and Belcher & Sparks, all of Greenville, for appellee.

HOBSON, C. J. T. F. Dockins and L. F. Dockins brought this suit against J. W. Dukes, alleging in their petition that they were the owners and in actual possession of about 6 acres of land inclosed by a fence built by them, and bounded on one side by other land owned by them, on another side by the defendant's land, and on the third side by the lands of one George Foley. They alleged that Dukes had wrongfully built a fence around their six-acre tract of land, so as to include it in a boundary of land fenced up by him; that they had removed a portion of the fence, so as to give them access to their land; and that he was threatening to rebuild the fence. They prayed that he be enjoined from rebuilding the fence, or interfering in any way with them in the possession of the six acres of land. He filed an answer, in which he traversed the allegations of the petition and stated, in substance, that the land "was and is owned by said defendant." In their reply to the answer the plaintiffs denied that the fence removed by the plaintiffs was around the land which was or is owned by the defendant, or that when defendant built said fence he built it around the land owned by him. After the pleadings had been made up, the following agreed order was entered: "By agreement, it is ordered that the chain of title to the plaintiffs' boundary of land, as set out in the petition, is deducible of record from the commonwealth, and was patented to Henry W. Hughes; that the chain of title to the defendant's boundary, as shown by the deed filed herein, is deducible of record from the commonwealth, and was patented to Thos. Dennis. It is further agreed that the boundaries filed herein are the boundaries of the John Dennis and Jernigan tracts and the Schafer tract, as shown by the surveyor's books and the deeds, and that any other deeds or records that may be required for a correct determination of this action are hereby considered filed, and may be supplied upon request of the court." Proof was taken, and on final hearing the circuit court dismissed the plaintiffs' petition. They appeal.

[1] They filed in the circuit court a schedule, which directed the clerk to copy, among other things, the first four pages of T. F. Dockins' deposition, and the first page of J. W. Dukes' deposition. No other part of the proof heard by the circuit court was included in the schedule. Rule 27 (149 S. W. viii) of this court was adopted some years ago and is as follows: "Hereafter this court will conclusively presume, after submission, that records brought up to this court on schedule filed in the clerk's office of the inferior court, as prescribed by section 737 of the Code of Practice, is the complete record, and that all parties interested have consented to try the appeal on such record. Before submission the court will in its discretion, allow a transcript of other parts of the record to be filed when deemed necessary in furtherance of justice."

Section 737 of the Code, as well as the rule, contemplates the filing of a schedule ordering for the appeal as much of the record as is material to the appeal. Entire parts of the record must be ordered, and not fragments of the different parts of the record. Neither the rule nor the statute contemplates that a party may order one question and answer of a deposition, or one page of a pleading. The entire deposition, or the entire pleading, must be brought up if any part of it is brought up. The purpose of the rule is to avoid the cost of copying unnecessary parts of the record. But where a pleading, or the testimony of a witness, or any other paper, is copied the whole paper must be copied, and not a portion of it.

[2] In the absence of the evidence heard before the circuit court, we must presume that the circuit court held properly, as we cannot consider, for any purpose, the fragments of the two depositions contained in the transcript.

[3] But it is insisted for the plaintiffs that, under the pleadings and the agreed order, judgment should have been entered for them. We do not so understand the agreement. It is agreed that the chain of title to the plaintiffs' boundary of land, as set out in the petition, is deducible of record from the commonwealth, and that the chain of title to the defendant's boundary, as shown by the deed filed, is deducible of record from the commonwealth. This agreement seems to have been made simply to avoid the introduction of the evidence making out the chain of title on either side. The agreement does not show which title is the older; and, even though the plaintiffs' title from the commonwealth was superior, the defendant and those under whom he claims may have acquired title by adverse possession. The defendant's answer was certainly understood by the plaintiffs to assert title in him to the land in controversy. Even if his allegations were not full enough on this subject, the statements in the reply made up the issue. The agreed order was simply as to the chain of title on both sides, and settled no other question in the case.

Judgment affirmed.

MADDEN v. MEEHAN et al.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Dec. 13, 1912.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 195*)—RESERVATION OF GROUNDS—NECESSITY OF OBJECTION BELOW.

An objection to the filing of an amended answer cannot be raised on appeal, where there was no such objection below, nor exception taken to the order filing it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 1490; Dec. Dig. § 195.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§§ 917, 919*)—REVIEW—PRESUMPTIONS.

Where it does not appear from the record on appeal that the trial court ruled on a demurrer to an amended answer or a written motion to strike from the answer certain indicated parts thereof, or that an exception was taken to its failure to pass on them, it will be presumed that the motion and demurrer were waived by the filing of a reply.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3708-3709, 3713; Dec. Dig. §§ 917, 919.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§§ 549, 671*)—REVIEW—CONDITION OF RECORD.

Where on an appeal the record does not contain the evidence, and the instructions given, and refused, while copied in the record, were not made a part thereof by a proper bill of exceptions, the reviewing court can only determine whether the pleadings support the verdict.

4. ARREST (§ 63*)—POLICE OFFICER—NECESSITY OF WARRANT.

Under Ky. St. §§ 1309-1311, which forbidding the carrying of a pistol, require ministerial officers to apprehend all persons guilty of such offense, and providing for the fining of an officer who willfully refuses so to do, a police officer who, while officially investigating a charge of keeping a disorderly house, discovered that the person charged, with whom he was talking, had a pistol concealed on his person, was justified in immediately arresting such person, though he had previously requested him to accompany him to the police station and the person arrested consented.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Arrest, Cent. Dig. §§ 145-156; Dec. Dig. § 63.*]

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 916*)—PRESUMPTIONS—SUFFICIENCY OF PLEADING.

On appeal, in testing the sufficiency of an answer to support a verdict for the defendant, the facts alleged therein must be taken as true.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3699-3705; Dec. Dig. § 916.*]

6. ARREST (§ 63*)—CRIMINAL CHARGES—AUTHORITY TO ARREST WITHOUT WARRANT.

Ky. St. § 2885, confers upon police officers of a city of the first class authority to arrest all persons violating any law or ordinance for the suppression of crimes or offenses "with or without a warrant." Cr. Code Prac. § 36, provides that a peace officer may make an arrest either in obedience to a warrant, or without a warrant when a public offense is committed in his presence, or when he has reasonable ground for believing that the person arrested has committed a felony. Held, that a policeman cannot go beyond the restrictions of the Criminal Code, which is merely explanatory of the common law, and section 2885 cannot therefore be construed to authorize a policeman of a city of the class named to make an arrest for a crime committed out of his presence without a warrant.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jefferson County, Common Pleas Branch, Second Division.

Action by W. C. Madden against Pat Meehan and others. From a judgment for defendants and the overruling of a motion for new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

T. A. McDonald, of Louisville, for appellant. Joseph S. Lawton, of Louisville, for appellees.

SETTLE, J. This action was brought by the appellant against the appellee Pat Meehan, a policeman of the city of Louisville, and the sureties on his official bond, to recover damages for his alleged false arrest at the hands of the officer; it being averred in the petition that the arrest was maliciously made, without probable cause and without a warrant, for an alleged misdemeanor, to wit, keeping a disorderly house, which was not committed in the officer's presence and of which appellant was not guilty. On the trial the jury returned a verdict in favor of appellees, upon which judgment in their behalf was properly entered. In due course appellant filed motion and grounds for a new trial, but the motion was overruled, and he has appealed.

His first complaint is that the trial court erred to his prejudice in permitting the filing of appellee's amended answer. The original answer merely traversed the averments of the petition. The amendment denied that appellant was arrested for keeping a disorderly house, and alleged that the arrest was made because of his carrying concealed upon his person a deadly weapon, a pistol, which offense, as further alleged, was committed in the presence of the officer, and for that reason that the arrest was legally made by the latter without a warrant.

[1] As the record falls to show that appellant objected to the filing of the amended answer or that he excepted to the order filing it, the objection will not now be considered by us, as it cannot be raised for the first time on appeal.

[2] It is also insisted for appellant that the trial court should have sustained his demurrer to the answer as amended, and also his written motion to strike from the amended answer certain parts thereof indicated in the motion. As it does not appear from the record that the court ruled either on the demurrer or motion, that it was asked to do so, or that an exception was taken to its failure to pass on them, we cannot on this appeal say that its failure to sustain them was error, but will presume that both were waived by the filing of appellant's reply.

Appellant's most serious contention is that neither the answer as amended, nor the evidence introduced in appellee's behalf, presented a good defense to the action; in view of which it is claimed that the court, instead of instructing the jury as was done, should have submitted the case to them under instructions advising them that the arrest was illegal and defining the measure of damages recoverable.

[3] The record does not contain the evidence introduced on the trial, and, while the instructions that were given, as well as those offered by appellant and refused, are copied in the record, they have not by bill of exceptions filed or approved by the court below been identified or made a part of the record. This being true, it only remains for this court to determine whether the pleadings support the verdict. Martin v. Richardson, 94 Ky. 183, 21 S. W. 1039, 14 Ky. Law Rep. 847, 19 L. R. A. 692, 42 Am. St. Rep. 353; Bibb v. Miller, 11 Bush, 306.

[4] We think the facts alleged in the amended answer presented a good defense to the action. Stripped of certain redundant expressions and matters of evidence set out in the first paragraph, it, in substance, alleges that the appellee Meehan, accompanied by one Williams, went in his official capacity, as a policeman, to interview appellant with respect to a charge of his maintaining a disorderly house in the city of Louisville, made by Williams, which is an offense under an ordinance of that city; that, after finding appellant at or near his home, the officer entered into a conversation with him as to the offense charged, which conversation was prolonged until the parties arrived at a house in the neighborhood, to which they repaired at the officer's request, for the purpose of investigating a complaint made of appellant by the resident thereof; that while at this house the discovery was made by the officer that appellant had concealed upon his person a pistol, which caused his immediate arrest at the hands of the officer.

It is true that we find it stated in the first paragraph of the amended answer that the officer, before discovering appellant's possession of the pistol, had requested him to go to police headquarters with him, to which the latter consented; but it does not appear from any fact alleged that he had placed him under arrest before the discovery of the pistol. On the contrary, it is distinctly alleged that the officer had not done so, and that the discovery by him of the pistol concealed upon appellant's person was the sole cause of the arrest.

[5] As in testing the sufficiency of the amended answer the facts alleged therein should be taken as true, we must conclude that it presents a good defense. Carrying concealed a pistol upon or about one's person is an offense defined and punished by section 1309, Kentucky Statutes. Section 1310, Kentucky Statutes, makes it the duty of ministerial officers to apprehend all persons guilty of this offense, and section 1311 provides that any such officer who shall knowingly and willfully refuse to discharge any of the duties required of him by section 1310 shall, upon indictment and conviction, be fined not less than $100 nor more than $500. As appellant was discovered by Meehan in possession of the pistol concealed upon his person, the latter had the right to arrest him without a warrant or other process, as the offense was committed in his presence; and, in the absence from the record of a bill of exceptions containing the evidence, we must assume that it conduced to prove that this was the offense for which he was arrested, and that the arrest without a warrant was authorized because of its commission in the presence of the officer.

[6] The brief of appellee's counsel claims for the appellee Meehan a right not asserted by the amended answer, that of authority to make an arrest for a misdemeanor without a warrant, even if the offense be not committed in his presence; such power, it is insisted, being conferred upon police officers of a city of the first class, like that of Louisville, by section 2885, Kentucky Statutes, which, after generally defining their duties, clothes them with authority "to repress and restrain all unlawful or disorderly conduct or practices therein; enforce or prevent the violation of all laws and ordinances in force in said city; and for these purposes, with or without a warrant, to arrest all persons guilty of violating any law or ordinance for the suppression of crimes or offenses."

We are far from sustaining this contention. Waiving consideration of the question, whether such power as is claimed for the police officer would amount to a violation of the provisions of section 10, Bill of Rights, Constitution, or those of subsection 29 of section 59 or section 60 of that instrument, we are clearly of opinion that it is not conferred by the section of the statute, supra. The authority it gives to make an arrest, "with or without a warrant," is no greater than that which, from time immemorial, has been exercised by peace officers under the common law. The expression, "with or without a warrant," has no other meaning than that a policeman of the city of Louisville, like other peace officers, may, without a warrant, make an arrest for a misdemeanor if committed in his presence, or for a felony if he has reasonable grounds for believing that the person arrested has committed a felony. That there may be no doubt as to the duties and powers of peace officers, in the matter of making arrests, they are specifically set forth by section 36, Criminal Code, which provides: "A peace officer may make an arrest—(1) In obedience to a warrant of arrest delivered to him. (2) Without a warrant when a public offense is committed in his presence, or when he has reasonable grounds for believing that the person arrested has committed a felony." The powers here mentioned are cumulative and meant by the Code to be merely explanatory of the common law; and, as a policeman has no more power than any other peace officer, he cannot go beyond the restrictions they impose.

In Jamison v. Gaernett, 10 Bush, 221, we had under consideration a provision of the then charter of the city of Louisville, containing, with reference to the powers of its police officers in making arrests, the words "with or without a warrant" found in section 2885, Kentucky Statutes; but we therein held that they were not intended to give the police of that city any further power than that conferred upon other peace officers by the general law. In the opinion we said: "The provision of the charter referred to is as follows: 'Policemen may, with or without a warrant, arrest persons guilty of offenses against the laws or ordinances of the city.' We do not regard this enactment as necessarily conflicting with the general law which defines and limits the power of the arresting officer; but, if we did so construe it, we should hesitate to decide that it was not an infringement of the constitutional guaranty of security to the people, in their persons, houses, papers, and possessions against unreasonable seizures and searches."

In Weaver v. McGovern, 122 Ky. 1, 90 S. W. 984, 28 Ky. Law Rep. 883, the same question was again before us, and we again held that a police officer only had the right to make an arrest for a misdemeanor without a warrant where the offense was committed in his presence. The facts were that a policeman had been detailed at a polling place to preserve order, and there was a great noise and confusion in the room, such as to indicate that a fight was in progress, and some one cried out for help. On the state of case thus presented it was held that the arrest of one of the persons present by the police officer was justifiable, as there was a commission of a public offense, by the person arrested, in the presence of the officer. It will be found upon examination that the doctrine announced in Jamison v. Gaernett, and Weaver v. McGovern, supra, has been approved in the following cases: Mockabee v. Commonwealth, 78 Ky. 380; Fleetwood v. Commonwealth, 80 Ky. 2; Palmer v. Commonwealth, 6 Ky. Law Rep. 510; Wright v. Commonwealth, 85 Ky. 123, 2 S. W. 904, 8 Ky. Law Rep. 718; Wing v. Commonwealth, 7 Ky. Law Rep. 216; Dilger v. Commonwealth, 88 Ky. 550, 11 S. W. 651, 11 Ky. Law Rep. 67; Curran v. Taylor, 92 Ky. 537, 18 S. W. 232, 13 Ky. Law Rep. 750; Riggs v. Commonwealth, 33 S. W. 413, 17 Ky. Law Rep. 1015; Lynam v. Commonwealth, 55 S. W. 686; Hughes v. Commonwealth, 41 S. W. 294, 19 Ky. Law Rep. 497; Johnson v. Collins, 89 S. W. 253, 28 Ky. Law Rep. 375; Reed v. Commonwealth, 125 Ky. 126, 100 S. W. 856, 30 Ky. Law Rep. 1212; Myers v. Dunn, 126 Ky. 548, 104 S. W. 352, 31 Ky. Law Rep. 926, 13 L. R. A. (N. S.) 881; Commonwealth v. Robinson, 84 S. W. 319, 27 Ky. Law Rep. 14; Helm v. Commonwealth, 81 S. W. 270, 26 Ky. Law Rep. 165; Hendrickson v. Commonwealth, 81 S. W. 266, 26 Ky. Law Rep. 224; Commonwealth v. McCann, 123 Ky. 247, 94 S. W. 645, 29 Ky. Law Rep. 707; Stevens v. Commonwealth, 124 Ky. 32, 98 S. W. 284, 30 Ky. Law Rep. 290; Franks v. Smith, 142 Ky. 232, 134 S. W. 484.

The conclusion reached in Commonwealth v. Marcum, 135 Ky. 1, 122 S. W. 215, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1194, does not conflict with the doctrine announced in the cases supra. In that case we held that section 806, Kentucky Statutes, which authorizes the conductor of a railroad train either to arrest or put off the train persons who are disorderly and boisterous thereon, in his presence, or to deliver such disorderly person to a peace officer at the first station, to be placed under arrest by the latter without a warrant, does not violate the Constitution, section 10, Bill of Rights, providing that the people shall be secure from unreasonable searches and seizures. It appears from the facts of the case that a peace officer on the train, at the instigation of the conductor, attempted to arrest John Whittaker, a passenger, for drunkenness, boisterous conduct, and flourishing a pistol. Whittaker resisted the arrest and assaulted the officer, who, in self-defense, shot and killed him. Although the opinion might safely have justified the action of the officer upon the ground of his personal knowledge of the offense committed by Whittaker, it seems to go further and hold that the statute is a wholly reasonable and necessary enactment, because required for the safety of passengers on trains, and that trains cannot be held at stations until the conductor goes to a peace officer and swears out a warrant for the arrest of offenders. The opinion, however, distinguishes the case from that of Jamison v. Gaernett, supra, and expressly approves the doctrine therein announced; the opinion on that aspect of the case saying: "The question as to whether a search or seizure of the person of a citizen is reasonable under the Constitution is a relative one. It might not be reasonable to seize or search the person of a citizen for a misdemeanor, where he was at large in the city or country, and where the circumstances would generally be such that a warrant could be secured in advance of the arrest. But it would not be reasonable to require the officer to wait for a warrant if the offense was a felony, because here the gravity of the offense and the importance to the public of the prompt seizure of the criminal overrides the unreasonableness of the search or seizure without a warrant. And so, in the case at bar, the circumstances which require the arrest of an offender against the statute are such as to make it reasonable that a peace officer should be authorized upon the request of the conductor of the train to arrest the violator without a warrant and without the offense for which the arrest was to be made being done in the presence of the officer."

We approve the rule laid down in that case, but the case at bar rests upon a wholly different state of facts, as the arrest seems to have been made by the officer on the street for an offense committed in his presence, and the pleadings, fairly construed, support the verdict declaring that it was so done, and no reason is presented for reversing the judgment.

It is therefore affirmed.

SLUSHER v. WELLER.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Dec. 13, 1912.)

1. INFANTS (§ 47*)—CONTRACTS—VALIDITY.

An infant is not bound by contract made for him by another person purporting to act for him, unless such person has been appointed as guardian or next friend, or is in some manner authorized by law to act for him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Infants, Cent. Dig. §§ 99, 101-108, 110; Dec. Dig. § 47.*]

2. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 87*)—INFANTS (§ 50*)—CONTRACTS—NECESSARIES—PROFESSIONAL SERVICES OF ATTORNEY.

An infant is bound for necessities furnished him, including food and maintenance, medical attendance furnished when his health or physical condition requires it, an education suitable to his station in life, and the professional services of an attorney in enforcing or protecting his civil or property rights, or in defending him in a criminal prosecution; but where an administrator was appointed for decedent, leaving an infant wife and son and a claim against a railroad for wrongful death, which under Const. § 241, vested in the administrator, it was not necessary that the infants be advised as to a settlement.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 384-392; Dec. Dig. § 87; Infants*, Cent. Dig. §§ 114, 115, 117-127; Dec. Dig. § 50.*]

3. DEATH (§ 31*)—EMPLOYMENT OF ATTORNEY—PERSONS AUTHORIZED TO EMPLOY.

Under Const. § 241, vesting an action for wrongful death in the decedent's personal representative, the distributees have no authority to contract with an attorney in relation thereto.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Death, Cent. Dig. §§ 35-46; Dec. Dig. § 31.*]

4. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 485*)—COMPENSATION—ATTORNEY ACTING AS ADMINISTRATOR.

An attorney, after qualifying as administrator, cannot charge for services which he renders as attorney for himself.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 2068; Dec. Dig. § 485.*]

5. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 496*)—COMPENSATION—CONTRACTS—EFFECT OF INVALIDITY.

Where an attorney, upon request of an infant widow, qualified as administrator for her accommodation, and without the service of any other attorney and in a fair and proper way obtained $3,000 in settlement of her claim for the wrongful death of decedent, he was, in view of the statute limiting an administrator's commission to 5 per cent., entitled to 5 per cent., or $150, for services as administrator.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Bell County.

Action by Sally Slusher against N. J. Weller. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded for judgment.

E. N. Ingram and N. R. Patterson, both of Pineville, for appellant. N. J. Weller, of Pineville, for appellee.

HOBSON, C. J. In August, 1907, Robert Pearce, a brakeman on the Louisville & Nashville Railroad, was killed in a tunnel. He left surviving him his widow, Sally Pearce, who was then 20 years old, and an infant child. Some propositions were made by the railroad company to settle the claim for his death, and $2,000 was offered. In this condition of things, the widow, Sally Pearce, went with her uncle, Robert Goodin, to the office of N. J. Weller, an attorney at Pineville, to consult him. They proposed to have Robert Goodin qualify as administrator, and also consulted the attorney as to what amount they should take from the railroad company. He advised them that they ought not to settle under any circumstances for less than $3,000, and said he thought that much more might be recovered. When they saw the county judge, he refused to allow Goodin to qualify as administrator, but finally said that he would allow Weller to qualify. In this condition of things, it being important that some one should qualify at once, Weller finally agreed to qualify as administrator, telling Goodin and Mrs. Pearce that he would charge only $10 or $15 for making the bond. After he had qualified, he gave them a letter to show the railroad company authorizing them to make a settlement with the railroad company, the money to be paid him. They then made a settlement with the railroad company for $3,000. The money was paid to Weller as administrator. When he came to settle his account, he charged and was allowed by the county court a fee of $300 for his advice and services as attorney in the matter before he qualified as administrator. Sally Pearce, who is now Sally Slusher, brought this suit to surcharge the settlement, and on final hearing the circuit court dismissed her petition. She appeals.

[1, 2] It is true that both she and her child were infants, and that Robert Goodin was without authority to bind either of the infants, the rule being that an infant is not bound by a contract made for him by another person purporting to act for him, unless such person has been appointed his guardian or next friend, or is authorized in some manner by law to act for him. 22 Cyc. 584. An infant is bound for necessities furnished him. The rule as to what are necessities for an infant is thus stated in 22 Cyc. 593: "Necessaries for an infant include support and maintenance, food, lodging, and clothing, medicines, and medical attendance furnished him when his health or physical condition require them, and an education suitable to his station in life. The professional services of an attorney may be a necessity for which an infant is bound, whether such attorney be employed to enforce or protect the civil or property rights of the infant, or to defend him in a criminal action or prosecution." Many authorities are cited in the notes sustaining the text. It was necessary for the infants that an administrator be appointed for the decedent, but it was not necessary for them that they should be advised how to obtain a settlement with the railroad company, or what settlement they should make. The cause of action was in the administrator under the Constitution. In Hill v. Johnson, 15 Ky. Law Rep. 368, the husband and wife employed attorneys to sue the railroad company for the death of the wife's son, and agreed to pay them a fee equal to one-half of the recovery; the wife being the sole distributee. Afterward they had an administrator appointed who settled with the railroad company for $2,000. The attorneys then brought suit for their fee. It was held that neither the wife nor the husband nor the two together had any cause of action, as the right of action was in the personal representative by virtue of section 241 of the Constitution, and that there could be no recovery by the attorneys. We think the principle announced is sound.

[3] The right of action being vested by the Constitution in the personal representative, contracts should not be sustained made by the distributees; for to do this would beget confusion, and the personal representative would be unable to control matters as the Constitution contemplated he should.

[4] After Weller qualified, being the administrator, he could not charge for services which he rendered as attorney for himself. This we have held in a number of cases.

[5] But in view of all the evidence, we do not think he should be left without any compensation as administrator. The agreement that he would only charge $10 or $15 for making the bond evidently contemplated $10 or $15 more than he was otherwise to receive; that is, the agreement was that he was not to charge commissions as administrator in addition to a lawyer's fee. But, when he is allowed no fee as attorney, he should be allowed a reasonable commission as administrator. They could not have expected that he should serve them for nothing under the circumstances. He appears from the evidence to have treated them perfectly fairly and to have acted with entire propriety. He qualified as administrator for their accommodation and at their request. It is clear from all the evidence that they went to him and employed him in the usual manner as their attorney. He had had no communication with them before they came to his office, and had never seen Mrs. Pearce before. The proof in the record by a number of witnesses is to the effect that $300 is a reasonable charge for his services. The circuit court who knew the witnesses and the parties as well as the scale of fees obtaining in the locality held the charge reasonable. He made no charge for services as administrator. The only allowance made to him was $300 for his services as attorney before he qualified as administrator. The statute limits an administrator's commission to 5 per cent., and under all the evidence we conclude that he should be allowed 5 per cent. on $3,000, or $150 for his services as administrator. To the extent of $150 the settlement should be corrected.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for a judgment as above indicated.

BALDWIN'S EX'R v. BARBER'S EX'RS.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Dec. 11, 1912.)

1. WILLS (§ 114*)—REQUISITES—EXECUTION—ATTESTATION.

A writing of a decedent which is not holographic in character, and is not attested by witnesses, could not be probated as a part of her will.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 277-279; Dec. Dig. § 114.*]

2. GIFTS (§ 21*)—INTER VIVOS—NECESSITY OF DELIVERY—DELIVERY TO DONOR'S AGENT.

The delivery of a writing remitting future interest on a portion of a note to the agent of the person delivering, who had also been named as executor in her will, and who had never represented the obligor on the note, would not pass the writing from the control of its maker so as to render the act valid as a gift inter vivos.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Gifts, Cent. Dig. § 36; Dec. Dig. § 21.*]

3. WILLS (§ 405*)—CONTESTS—ATTORNEY'S FEES—PAYMENT FROM ESTATE.

Under Ky. St. § 489, which provides that, in actions for the settlement of estates, the court shall allow the legatees prosecuting the cause reasonable compensation for their trouble, and necessary expenses, the portion of the common fund due a legatee whose share as a distributee was increased by a judgment obtained in an action to have certain codicils set aside as fraudulent is chargeable with a pro rata portion of the burden of counsel fees and expenses, where the legatee did not employ his own counsel to look after his presumed interests.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 879-884; Dec. Dig. § 405.*]

4. WILLS (§ 402*)—APPEAL—RENDERING FINAL JUDGMENT—FIXING ATTORNEY'S FEES.

A court on appeal from a will contest will not fix counsel fees; that being a matter for the lower court upon evidence taken.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 875; Dec. Dig. § 402.*]

On petition for rehearing. Reversed and remanded.

For original opinion, see 148 Ky. 370, 146 S. W. 1124.

W. H. Fulton, Kelley & Cherry, and G. S. & J. A. Fulton, all of Bardstown, for appellants. Morgan Yewell and Nat W. Halstead, both of Bardstown, W. C. McChord, of Springfield, Edelen & Davis, of Frankfort, McCandless & Larimore, of Munfordville, and C. T. Atkinson, of Bardstown, for appellee.

MILLER, J. The history of this litigation may be found in the original appeal of Barber's Ex'r v. Baldwin, 138 Ky. 710, 128 S. W. 1092, and in the opinion upon this appeal of the settlement suit of Baldwin's Ex'r v. Barber's Ex'rs, 148 Ky. 370, 146 S. W. 1124. In the petition for a rehearing, our attention is called to the fact that in the opinion upon this appeal (148 Ky. 370, 146 S. W. 1124) we failed to pass upon the ruling of the circuit court which failed to charge interest on the note of Lena Barber. That question was raised by the fifth exception to the commissioner's report, but, on account of the many other questions discussed, it was inadvertently overlooked. We will now dispose of it.

By codicil C No. 3, Lena Barber was substituted as legatee in place of her husband, Philetus S. Barber. She owed Cecilla Barber $7,115.11, evidenced by a note. Cecilla Barber died on May 15, 1908. About four years previous to her death, however, Cecilla Barber wrote the following letter to W. C. McChord, who was her agent, and had been named as executor in her will, to wit: "Springfield, Ky., August 15th, 1904. Mr. W. C. McChord, Springfield, Ky.—Dear Sir: In view of the fact that my grandchildren are not paying interest on the advancements heretofore made by me, and as the advancements amount to about half as much as the advancement to P. S. Barber and the note which I hold against his wife, Lena Barber. You will therefore only collect from Lena Barber from this date interest on Four Thousand Dollars of her note, the residue of said interest from this date I now remit to her. Cecilla Barber." The executors paid Lena Barber her legacy of $5,000 on February 14, 1911, with interest to that date. In their settlement the executors charged her interest on $4,000 from August 15, 1904, to February 20, 1911, the date of the report, but did not charge or collect any interest on the balance of her note, amounting to $3,115.11, after August 15, 1904. They justified their failure to collect interest on the $3,115.11 under the letter above set forth. Amelia Baldwin's executor contends (1) that the letter of August 15, 1904, was ineffective to absolve Lena Barber from the payment of interest on said $3,115.11, for any period of time; and (2) that, in any event, the remission of interest thereon could not extend further than to the death of the payee, Cecilla Barber, on May 15, 1908. By the judgment of the lower court of December 5, 1909, which was afterwards affirmed by this court, the executors of Cecilla Barber were directed to pay the various legacies, with interest thereon from May 15, 1909, which was one year after the testatrix's death, as is provided by the statute; and in that judgment the $5,000 legacy to Lena Barber was set out. When the executors paid this legacy on February 14, 1911, it amounted, with interest, to $5,525. And the court having refused to charge her with interest on the $3,115.11, either before or after the death of the testatrix, it was insisted by appellants that the $3,115.11 should be applied in diminution of the legacy, as of the time the legacy, under the law, would begin to bear interest, to wit, May 15, 1909. If this had been done, only the excess of the legacy over the $3,115.11 or $1,884.89 would have continued to bear interest from May 15, 1909, until its payment on February 14, 1911. But the court not only refused to do this, and allowed Lena Barber interest upon her entire legacy from May 15, 1909, to February 14, 1911, the date of its payment, but also refused to charge her with interest on the $3,115.11 during that period. The difference between the interest on the $5,000 for 21 months, and interest on the $1,884.89, for the same period, is $305.09.

[1] Appellant's exception, however, goes farther than a mere setting off of the $3,115.11 against the legacy, and insists that the paper of August 15, 1904, was not effective to remit or abate the interest on any portion of said note for any time. This contention is based upon the idea that, in order for this paper to have any effect, it must be good either as a will, or as a gift inter vivos, and that it is not effective in either respect. The paper not being holographic, and not having been attested by witnesses, it could not have been probated as a part of Cecilia Barber's will, and no attempt was made to do so. It is not contended that it operated as a will.

[2] Did it operate as a gift inter vivos; or, to put it in another form, did it operate as a remission of interest from that date, which would be, in fact, a gift? The test as to the sufficiency of the writing to effect a gift is the determination of its irrevocability at the time the donor placed the paper with her agent and nominated executor, McChord. If, at that time, the gift was an irrevocable one, and completely separated Mrs. Barber from the ownership and control of the future interest on this sum, and was not merely ambulatory and subject to recall, then the gift of this interest to Lena Barber was complete; otherwise not, and the paper relied on by the executors was wholly ineffective for any purpose. It is conceded that McChord was acting for Cecilia Barber throughout the transaction. He in no sense represented Lena Barber, the debtor. It is clear, therefore, that Cecilia Barber could have withdrawn the paper, or its operation, at any time, with or without the consent of Lena Barber. If Cecilia Barber in her lifetime had brought suit upon the note, claiming interest according to its terms, and disregarding the paper of August 15, 1904, could Lena Barber, although she might have learned of the execution of the paper, and its delivery to McChord, have relied upon it to escape the payment of interest on this $3,115.11? We think it is clear that she could not have made such a defense; and, if she could not have made a defense against Cecilia Barber in her lifetime, we do not see how she could make that defense against Cecilia Barber's executors, since the effectiveness of the paper as a gift did not depend upon whether Cecilia Barber actually revoked it, but whether it was revocable.

In the leading case of Basket v. Hassell, 107 U. S. 602, 2 Sup. Ct. 415, 27 L. Ed. 500, the court, after reviewing at length the authorities bearing upon this question, said: "The point which is made clear by this review of the decisions on the subject, as to the nature and effect of a delivery of a chose in action, is, as we think, that the instrument or document must be the evidence of a subsisting obligation and be delivered to the donee, so as to vest him with an equitable title to the fund it represents, and to divest the donor of all present control and dominion over it, absolutely and irrevocably, in case of a gift inter vivos, but upon the recognized conditions subsequent, in case of a gift mortis causa, and that a delivery which does not confer upon the donee the present right to reduce the fund into possession by enforcing the obligation according to its terms will not suffice." In 20 Cyc. 1208, the rule as to gifts, in so far as it applies to the forgiveness of the donee's debt, is thus stated: "A debt due from the donor to the donee may be forgiven as a gift, and, when the transaction is complete, the debt is extinguished, and cannot be enforced afterward. A promise by an obligee or payee to forgive a debt, the promisor being under no legal obligation to do so, is but an executory gift, and so long as the transaction remains executory, and the promisor retains the evidences of indebtedness, the gift is not a perfected one, and no equity passes to the promisee thereby. The usual method of making a gift of a debt is for the donor to cancel and deliver to his obligor the evidences of his indebtedness, thereby indicating a forgiveness thereof, or a destruction thereof by the obligee with intent to release. However, a gift of a debt due by parol can be made only by the creditor's execution of a release in writing, or the performance of some act by which the debt is placed beyond his legal control." See, also, Knott v. Hogan, 4 Metc. 99, Brown v. Brown, 4 B. Mon. 535, and Rodemer v. Rettig, 114 Ky. 634, 71 S. W. 869, 24 Ky. Law Rep. 1474. The interest on the whole note from August 15, 1904, to February 20, 1911, is $2,782; while the interest on the $4,000 for the same period is $1,564, showing a difference of $1,218 which Lena Barber yet owes, if the rule above announced is to be applied. We do not see how the application of the rule under the facts of this case can be avoided. The paper applied only to future interest, and was revocable at any time. It never passed beyond the donor's control. It was never delivered to Lena Barber, or to any one for her. In our opinion the paper was not effective for any purpose, and the executors should have ignored it by collecting interest upon the note according to its terms.

[3] 2. In the opinion we approved the ruling of the chancellor that John R. Barber was not individually liable by way of contribution or otherwise for any portion of appellants' counsel fees or costs. 148 Ky. 378, 146 S. W. 1124. It is urgently insisted by the appellants in their petition for a rehearing that that ruling is inconsistent with the opinion of this court in Louisville Presbyterian Seminary v. Botto, 117 Ky. 962, 80 S. W. 177, 25 Ky. Law Rep. 2137, and that, if the court intends to adhere to the ruling made in this case, it should overrule the Botto Case. Under the rule of the Botto Case, it is insisted that appellants' attorneys' fee in the successful will contest, in the construction suit, and for the trial of the exceptions to the commissioner's report, should be assessed pro rata against John Barber, and paid out of the common or residuary fund of the estate. John Barber was a legatee under the original will to the extent of $9,000. He was not represented by counsel in any of the litigation instituted by the appellants, but stood indifferent as to the result. The effect, however, of that litigation was to increase his share of the estate to an amount claimed by appellants, approximating $25,000. Appellees insist that his gain was not that much, but the precise amount of his gain is not now material. It is further true that the interest of his children under the original will was lessened by the result of the will contest, and the father's gain was, to some extent, their loss.

The pioneer case upon this subject in this state is Thirlwell's Adm'r v. Campbell, Guardian, 11 Bush, 163. That was an action to sell land owned jointly, and involved the trial of exceptions to the report of settlement of a personal representative, being in the last-named respect similar to the case at bar. All the parties to the action desired a sale of the land, and three of the defendants employed counsel of their own, who represented them throughout the litigation, while four of the parties were not represented by counsel. As to the exceptions to the report of settlement, all of these parties were either indifferent or opposed to the exceptions. The court rested its decision requiring contribution from those not represented by counsel, upon the act of March 1, 1860 (Laws 1859-60, c. 1049), as amended in 1867 (Laws 1867-68, c. 579), which related to contribution between legatees, devisees, and distributees, where one had prosecuted an action for the benefit of others. The act of 1860 above referred to is substantially reproduced as section 489 of the Kentucky Statutes, which reads as follows: "In actions for the settlement of estates, or for the recovery of money or property held in joint tenancy, coparcenary, or as tenants in common, if it shall be made to appear that one or more of the legatees, devisees, distributees or parties in interest have prosecuted for the benefit of others interested with themselves, and have been at trouble and expense in conducting the same, it shall be the duty of the court to allow such person or persons reasonable compensation for such trouble, and for necessary expenses, in addition to the fees and costs; said allowance to be paid out of the funds recovered before distribution, the persons interested having notice of the application for such allowance." In the course of its opinion in the Thirlwell Case the court said: "Appellee insists that under these acts he has a right to have his counsel paid out of the general fund; yet his counsel in their argument concede that several of the distributees thus sought to be charged with fees were indifferent to the result, if indeed they were not opposed, as some of them certainly were, to the efforts made by plaintiff to surcharge the settlement which involved the principal amount of labor done by his counsel in the case. We construe these acts as applying only to such parties as are not represented in the case by attorneys selected and employed by themselves. * * * So far as those parties are concerned who were not represented by attorneys selected by themselves, we think the services rendered by the counsel for the appellee in procuring a sale of the real estate and in surcharging the settlement fall within the provisions of the statutes, supra, and for such services they should be paid out of the common fund." In construing section 489, in Taylor v. Minor, 90 Ky. 548, 14 S. W. 545, we said: "Where, however, one person has prosecuted an action at extra expense and trouble, and the recovery inures equally to the benefit of others, the chancellor may, in the exercise of his power to compel parties to do equity, require them, as a condition to sharing in it, to contribute their proper proportion of the expenses, and may order it paid out of the common fund." In other words, it was held that the recovery should bear its own expenses, and the attorney's fees of all persons who participated in the recovery, except those who specially employed counsel to represent them, should be paid out of the fund recovered.

It is insisted, however, that since John R. Barber, through his children, will lose more than he will himself gain in the will contest, he is not within the meaning of the statute, and should not be required to contribute. We can see no difference, however, in principle between the Botto Case and the case at bar. In the Botto Case, W. M. Botto, and his mother, Cloteal Botto, were the principal beneficiaries of certain codicils, which were finally invalidated, and were represented throughout the entire litigation by counsel of their selection; and they were beneficiaries, in a smaller way, under the will as it was finally established. It was contended there, as here, that the statute did not apply to them, and that they should not be required to contribute to the fees of counsel who, against their wish, had succeeded in setting aside the fraudulent codicils, and thereby increasing the general estate. As above stated, the Bottos were represented by counsel in their effort to sustain those codicils. In this respect their case was stronger than Barber's Case. Nevertheless, they were required to contribute to the payment of counsel fees for the contestants. After reviewing at some length the decisions of this court bearing upon section 489, and the question generally, the court there said: "These cases are not in conflict with Thirlwell's Adm'r, etc., v. Campbell's Guardian, etc., 74 Ky. [11 Bush] 163, as in that case all the parties to the litigation were represented by counsel who participated therein. The court in that case simply held that one jointly interested in a recovery could not be compelled to pay counsel employed by others, when he had himself employed counsel to represent what appeared to be his interest. It seems to us that there can be no doubt in this case that all the legatees in the original will of Mrs. Florence Irvine Botto equally shared in the benefits which accrued from the litigation instituted by the appellants for their common benefit. It is true that the contest of the codicils was inimical to the pecuniary interest of the two Bottos, W. M. and Colteal B., who were the principal beneficiaries in the fraudulent codicils, and who were represented in the entire litigation by counsel of their own selection. But we cannot shut our eyes to the fact that these defendants occupied a dual attitude. They were large legatees under the original will, as well as the chief beneficiaries of the alleged fraudulent codicils, to invalidate which all of the costs and expenses were incurred; and we are unable to see any reason why they should be exempted from the burden cast upon the legatees, especially as they were the chief, if not the only, upholders of these fraudulent codicils." 117 Ky. 972, 80 S. W. 180, 25 Ky. Law Rep. 2137.

Counsel for Barber, however, insist that the decision in the Botto Case was rested upon the fact that the Bottos were guilty of fraud, in that they were the chief, if not the only, beneficiaries and upholders of the fraudulent codicils, and therefore cast upon the contestants the burden of undoing their fraudulent acts. While there is some language used in the opinion giving color to that claim, a careful reading of the opinion will show that the decision really rests upon the broader ground that the recovered fund must pay its own attorney's fees, and, as the Bottos were participants in that recovery, the rule applied. This is easily apparent from the following quotation taken by the court from Weed's Estate, Appeal of McGinnis, 163 Pa. 595, 30 Atl. 272, to wit: "It is argued, however, that they were losers by the litigation, and therefore they are not within the rule recognized and enforced in Trustees v. Greenough, 105 U. S. 527, 23 L. Ed. 1157, and kindred cases. But in what sense were they losers? In the same that he is a loser who fails to acquire what he has no right to, or who, having unlawfully obtained possession of the property of another, is compelled to restore it to the owners. The equity which the wrongdoer has in consequence of such a loss is not easily discoverable. If the allowance in this case was for services in a suit to recover the trust property from a stranger who had unlawfully taken it into his possession, there could be no doubt that equity would require that it should be paid from the trust fund. The fact that the wrongdoers were creditors of the estate ought not to shift the burden from the trust fund to that portion of it which the creditors were entitled to receive on a pro rata distribution of it. In either case the services were for the benefit of the estate, and it should pay for them." We conclude, therefore, that the case at bar comes within the principle announced in the Botto Case, and that John R. Barber's share of the recovery should contribute to the payment of appellant's counsel fees for effecting the recovery. So much of the former opinion found on pages 378 and 379 of 148 Ky., on pages 1127 and 1128 of 148 S. W., as holds otherwise, is withdrawn, and that opinion is modified to the extent above indicated.

[4] It is suggested in the briefs that this court now fix the fees of appellant's counsel. That question, however, should be tried by the lower court upon preparation duly made. Counsel fees should be fixed upon evidence taken, as in other cases; and, as the fee in this case is to be measured by the recovery when considered in connection with the services rendered, the precise amount of the recovery should be ascertained. In the record before us counsel vary widely in their estimates as to the result of appellant's exertions.

So much of the judgment of the circuit court as declined to charge Lena Barber with interest upon any portion of her note after August 15, 1904, is reversed, so much of that judgment as declined to charge John R. Barber with any portion of appellant's counsel fees is reversed, and the cause is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

KENTUCKY COAL & TIMBER DEVELOPMENT CO. v. CARROLL HARDWOOD LUMBER CO.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Dec. 17, 1912.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 447*)—INJUNCTION PENDING APPEAL—CONTINUANCE—STATUTES.

Civ. Code Prac. § 747, authorizing an application to the Court of Appeals for the continuance of an injunction pending appeal, contemplates that the circuit court in the first instance shall decide whether the injunction shall be so continued together with the terms on which it may be continued, and then that either party dissatisfied with the ruling may have the action of the circuit court or judge reviewed by the Court of Appeals or a judge thereof in vacation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 2207; Dec. Dig. § 447.*]

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes 151 S.W.—44

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 597*)—INJUNCTION PENDING APPEAL—REVIEW.

On an application to the Court of Appeals to review an order continuing or refusing to continue an injunction pending appeal, the party applying for review must bring to the appellate court a transcript of all that part of the record appertaining to the injunction, so as to enable the court to intelligently exercise its discretion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2627-2638; Dec. Dig. § 597.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 456*)—INJUNCTION—CONTINUANCE PENDING APPEAL.

Where an appeal in a suit to enjoin the cutting of timber involved difficult questions of law, an injunction granted by the trial court, but dissolved as to a part of the land in controversy, would be continued pending appeal; it appearing that no substantial harm would result therefrom.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 2215; Dec. Dig. § 456.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Breathitt County.

Suit by the Kentucky Coal & Timber Development Company against the Carroll Hardwood Lumber Company. A judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff for part only of the relief demanded, and plaintiff applies for the continuance of an injunction pending appeal. Granted.

Hazelrigg & Hazelrigg, of Frankfort, and J. J. O. Bach and Grannis Bach, both of Jackson, for appellant. O'Rear & Williams and McQuown & Beckham, all of Frankfort, and Geo. Fleenor, O. H. Pollard, and Chester Gourley, all of Jackson, for appellee.

HOBSON, C. J. [1] Section 747 of the Code is as follows: "An appeal shall not stay proceedings on the judgment unless a supersedeas be issued. The provisions of the Civil Code concerning supersedeas on appeals shall not apply to judgments granting, modifying, perpetuating or dissolving injunctions. When an appeal shall be taken from any judgment granting, modifying, perpetuating or dissolving any injunction, the court which rendered the judgment may, in its discretion, if the ends of justice so require, at the time the appeal is taken, make an order suspending, modifying or continuing the injunction during the pendency of the appeal, upon such terms as to bond or otherwise as may be proper for the security of the rights of the opposite party. Either party, within twenty days after the entry of such order, may take a transcript of the record, or all parts thereof appertaining to the injunction, and upon reasonable notice in writing to the opposite party, move the Court of Appeals, or, if in vacation, any judge thereof, to revise the order of the lower court, and finally determine how far the injunction shall be suspended, modified or continued pending the appeal. Pending such application to the Court of Appeals or judge thereof, but not longer than for twenty days, the status existing immediately before the entry of the judgment appealed from shall be maintained, and the lower court shall so provide in the judgment upon the request of either party. If, at any time, upon reasonable notice to the party affected, it be made to appear that the sureties upon the bond required in the court below are insufficient, the Court of Appeals, or a judge thereof in vacation, may set aside the order suspending, modifying or continuing the injunction pending the appeal, unless sufficient surety be furnished by a day fixed by the court or judge."

The Kentucky Coal & Timber Development Company brought this suit against the Carroll Hardwood Lumber Company and others, enjoining them from cutting timber from certain lands alleged in their petition to be the property of the plaintiff. An answer was filed by the Carroll Hardwood Lumber Company denying the plaintiff's title to the land, and asserting title in it thereto. An injunction was taken out by the plaintiff. On the trial of the case before a jury there was a verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiff as to a part of the land and in favor of the defendant as to the remainder of it, and the court entered an order dissolving the injunction as to the lands which were adjudged to the defendant. The plaintiff excepted and prayed an appeal, and on its motion the injunction granted in the action was continued in force for a period of 40 days pending the appeal. A motion has been entered before us within 20 days to continue the injunction in force pending the appeal. When this motion was entered, only a transcript of the pleadings and the orders made in the case had been filed, and since then and within the 40 days the appellant has tendered and moved to file a copy of the transcript of the evidence heard on the trial.

The circuit court in the order which it entered did not follow the statute as we construe it. Under the statute, if the ends of justice so require, the court which makes the judgment dissolving an injunction may in its discretion make an order continuing the injunction in force during the pendency of the appeal upon such terms as to bond or otherwise as may be proper, and when the court has entered such an order, or has refused to so order, either party within 20 days after the entry of the order which the court makes may take a transcript of the record or all parts thereof appertaining to the injunction, and upon reasonable notice in writing to the opposite party move this court, or, in vacation, any judge thereof, to revise the order of the lower court, and finally determine how far the injunction shall be continued pending the appeal. In other words, the intention of the statute is that the circuit court shall decide in the first place whether the injunction shall be continued during the appeal, and on what terms it shall be continued; caught between them and thus became fastened, so that, instead of permitting the shaft to revolve beneath it, it was whirled around the shaft, making it dangerous to those near it.

[2] It is contended by counsel for defendant that, if these conditions of the machine and pulleys were defective, it was attributable to the negligence of the plaintiff rather than to that of the defendant. They urge that plaintiff was foreman at the factory, and as such foreman it was his duty to discover defects in the machinery, and to remedy such as were of an ordinary character, and to report those which were of a nature that he could not remedy; and that he failed to perform this duty. The plaintiff, however, testified that he was not a machinist; and it might be inferred from his testimony that it was not within the province of his duty to make these repairs, but that this was the duty of the manager. If therefore this duty was imposed upon the manager, and plaintiff was injured through the failure on the part of the manager to exercise ordinary care to perform that duty, such negligence of the manager would be the negligence of the defendant for which it would be liable for resultant injuries to plaintiff, regardless of the grade of his service as foreman. Bryant Lumber Co. v. Stastney, 87 Ark. 321, 112 S. W. 740; Oak Leaf Mill Co. v. Smith, 98 Ark. 34, 135 S. W. 333.

[3] But in the view which we have taken of this case, we do not find it necessary to pass upon the question as to whether or not the testimony was sufficient to warrant a finding that the injury was due to an act of negligence upon the part of the defendant. We are of the opinion that the testimony clearly shows that the injury which plaintiff received was due to one of the risks which he assumed by reason of his employment.

According to his own testimony, the plaintiff knew of any defect which there was in the cracker mill and in the platform on which it stood. With this knowledge he had worked at the machine while this condition existed for probably more than a year prior to the accident. While he called the attention of the manager to this defect, and the manager promised to repair it, still his testimony clearly shows that he continued to work at the mill without any reliance upon that promise, and without any complaint of the failure to repair it.

But we do not think that the defective condition of the cracker mill or the shaky condition of the platform were the proximate cause of the injury. The testimony shows that the machine had not been in operation for some days, and was not choked at the time of the injury, and that the belt was placed upon the pulleys. The proximate cause of the injury was the whirling of the belt. Counsel for plaintiff concede that this was the proximate cause of the injury, but they earnestly contend that it was due to the defendant's negligence in permitting the two pulleys on the shaft to be placed so close together, with the set screws protruding from one of them, thereby catching the belt between them and causing the upper end of it to become fixed, and thus to wrap around the shaft. The undisputed evidence shows, however, that the pulleys and set screws could be readily seen from the floor. They were plainly open to observation, and they could more certainly be seen when one was within a foot of them, as plaintiff had been upon a number of occasions, and was upon the occasion of this injury. The expert witness introduced by plaintiff testified that he could not conceive of any one going within 12 inches of this shaft and not being able to see the set screws and the position of the pulleys. He said he was bound to see them. The plaintiff had placed this belt upon the pulley at this place under the same conditions for at least six times prior to the accident. Under this testimony, therefore, we are compelled to say that the plaintiff must have seen the smaller pulley and set screws upon the shaft and the condition of the machinery. He had been warned of the danger of putting the belt upon this pulley while the machinery was in motion, and himself testified that he appreciated the dangers arising therefrom. In fact, he had been ordered not to place the belt upon the pulleys while the machinery was in motion. While he contends that this order was abrogated by its violation, nevertheless it shows that he fully appreciated the danger of performing this duty in this way. If the injury was due to these defects of which he now complains, the testimony shows that they were open and obvious, and that he fully appreciated the dangers arising therefrom. The risk of the danger arising from putting the belt upon the pulley under these conditions, while the machinery was in motion, was one which he necessarily assumed.

The injury which plaintiff received is a very severe one, but under his own testimony it is one for which under the law the defendant is not liable.

The judgment is, accordingly, affirmed.

JOHNSTON-REYNOLDS LAND CO. v. FUQUA.

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. Nov. 25, 1912.)

1. BROKERS (§ 83*)—COMMISSIONS—ACTIONS—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where, in an action by a broker for commissions for procuring a purchaser of real estate, the undisputed evidence showed that the original contract of employment fixing a commission of a sum per acre was modified by an agreement that the owner, if making a sale to a prospective purchaser, would pay the broker a specified commission, and the broker testified that he agreed to accept such commission, provided the sale was made in a day or two, and that he was notified of it, and the owner testified that the agreement did not embrace any such condition, and that the broker informed the owner that the contract expired on May 31st, while it did not expire until June 30th, and that the owner, relying on the statement, gave to a third person an option to take effect on June 1st, and that during June the third person elected to purchase, and the sale was consummated, instructions allowing the broker to recover the specified sum if he agreed to allow the owner to sell to the prospective purchaser, and the owner did not agree to make the sale in any specified time, and that the broker was entitled to the full amount of commissions on a sale made by himself, if the agreement to accept the specified sum was limited to a sale made by the owner within a day or two and immediately reported to him, sufficiently submitted the issues and the broker obtaining a verdict for the specified sum could not complain.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Brokers, Cent. Dig. §§ 121-130; Dec. Dig. § 83.*]

2. BROKERS (§ 44*)—COMMISSIONS—CONTRACT—MODIFICATIONS.

Where an owner gave to a broker the exclusive right to sell real estate for a commission, and thereafter the parties made a new agreement to the effect that the owner could sell and pay the broker a less commission, the original contract was modified, and the broker did not have the exclusive right to sell, and a sale subsequently made by the owner operated as a revocation of the broker's authority to sell, and the broker subsequently making a sale could not recover the commission.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Brokers, Cent. Dig. § 45; Dec. Dig. § 44.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1068*)—HARMLESS ERROR—ERRONEOUS INSTRUCTIONS.

The error in an instruction based entirely on a party's claim, and ignoring the contention of the adverse party, is not prejudicial to the adverse party obtaining a verdict in his favor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4225-4228, 4230; Dec. Dig. § 1068.*]

4. TRIAL (§ 260*)—REFUSAL OF INSTRUCTIONS COVERED BY THE CHARGE GIVEN.

It is not error to refuse requested instructions covered by instructions fairly submitting the issues.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Miller County; Jacob M. Carter, Judge.

Action by the Johnston-Reynolds Land Company against Joe Fuqua. From a judgment granting partial relief, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

James D. Head, of Texarkana, for appellant. William H. Arnold, of Texarkana, for appellee.

MCCULLOCH, C. J. Appellants instituted this action in the circuit court of Miller county against appellee to recover the amount of commissions alleged to have been earned in the sale of a tract of land in Miller county owned by appellee. The tract of land in question is composed of about 2,000 acres, a part of which is in cultivation, and on March 1, 1911, a written contract was entered into between the parties to this action, whereby appellee granted to appellants the exclusive right to sell said property during the period of four months thereafter, and that they should have as their commission all the purchase price over and above $7 per acre. Appellants assert that within the time specified they procured a purchaser for the land "ready, willing, and able" to purchase for the price of $8.50 per acre, that they thereby earned a profit or commission of $1.50 per acre, but that appellee had refused to consummate the sale and refused to pay the commission. The commission, according to the contention of appellants, amounted to the sum of $3,075.48, and this is the amount for which they prayed judgment. On the trial of the cause before a jury, a verdict was rendered in favor of the appellants for the sum of $500. They were not satisfied with the recovery of that amount, and have prosecuted an appeal to this court, and urge as grounds for reversal that the court erred in giving one of the instructions requested by appellee, and in refusing to give two of the instructions which they requested.

It is undisputed that about the middle of the month of April, 1911, the parties had an interview, in which appellee stated that he had a prospective purchaser for the land, and proposed to pay appellants a commission of $500 on the sale, if made, and that appellants agreed to accept that amount if the sale should be made by appellee himself. There is, however, a dispute in the testimony as to one point in this interview: Appellants insist that, when this proposal was made, they agreed to accept the commission of $500, provided the sale was made in a day or two and that they be notified of it; whereas, appellee testified that the agreement did not embrace any such condition as that. Appellee testified that on the same occasion he asked appellants to tell him when the contract expired; that he had lost his copy of the contract, and did not know the date of expiration; and that appellants informed him on that occasion that the contract expired on May 31, 1911. He further states that on the faith of that statement to him he gave to one Munn an option on the place to take effect on June 1st; that during the month of June Munn elected to purchase the place; and that he consummated the sale and conveyed the property to him. Appellants testified that on or about June 15th they negotiated a sale of the land to one Sanderson, and immediately requested appellee to furnish an abstract of title, which he promised to do, but failed to comply with his promise. On June 30th, which was the last day of the contract, they closed the trade with Sanderson, and entered into a written contract with him for the sale of the property. It is upon this sale that they seek to recover the commission. But the jury allowed them the sum of $500 as a commission on the sale made by appellee himself.

Numerous instructions were given at the request of both sides.

[1] The following instruction was one of those given at the request of appellants: "If you find that plaintiffs did in April, 1911, agree to allow defendant to sell the land to the party with whom he was negotiating and did agree to accept $500 for their commissions, and that Fuqua did not, at the time, agree to make the sale in any specified time, and that plaintiffs did not lead Fuqua to believe and act upon the belief that their contract on said lands expired June 1st, then you are instructed that plaintiffs, if the contract of sale was made by Fuqua on or prior to June 30, 1911, are entitled to recover in the sum of $500." Now, this is the instruction upon which the jury evidently based the verdict in appellants' favor for the sum of $500. In following this instruction it is manifest that the jury found that appellants agreed to accept the commission of $500 without condition as to the time the sale should be made, and that they did not mislead appellee by any statement as to the date of the expiration of the contract.

Appellants also requested the court to give, among others, instructions numbered 4 and 5, which read as follows:

"(4) If you find that in April, 1911, Fuqua did advise plaintiffs that he had a prospective purchaser, and asked plaintiffs what they would charge as a commission if he sold the property himself and they agreed to charge $500, yet if you further find that Fuqua represented at the time that, if he made the sale, it would be made in a day or two, and he would immediately report it, and failed to either make the sale within a day or two, or, having made it, failed to report it to plaintiffs within a reasonable time, then, in either event plaintiffs would not be estopped from claiming commissions, if thereafter, they, in good faith, sold said property in accordance with the terms of the written contract to a responsible party, and within the time named in the contract.

"(5) If you find that about April 15, 1911, plaintiffs did agree to accept in full payment from defendant the sum of $500 if defendant sold to the party with whom he was then negotiating, yet, if you further find from the proof that defendant did make the sale within the time contemplated and thereafter failed to promptly report such sale within the time stipulated (or, if no time was stipulated, then within a reasonable time thereafter), but withheld knowledge of such sale from plaintiffs, and requested or encouraged them or knowingly suffered them to continue their efforts to sell same, and as a result thereof plaintiffs did, within the time allowed by the contract, effect a sale, on the terms authorized by the contract, to a person who was able, ready and willing to take same on such terms, then plaintiffs are entitled to recover commissions as specified in the contract."

The court gave No. 4 as requested, but refused to give No. 5. The effect of instruction No. 4 was to tell the jury that appellants would be entitled to the full amount of commissions on the sale made by themselves if the agreement to accept $500 was limited to a sale made by appellee within a day or two and immediately reported to them. So the jury necessarily found in returning a verdict in favor of appellants for only $500 that there was no such limitation of time upon the sale made by appellee himself.

[2] But in refused instruction No. 5 appellants asked the court to go further, and tell the jury that, even if appellee made a sale of the land within the time limited by the oral agreement and pursuant thereto, yet, if he failed to inform them of such sale, and suffered them to continue their efforts to effect a sale on the terms authorized by the original contract, they would be entitled to the full commission on the sale which they thereafter negotiated. This instruction was incorrect, and the court properly refused to give it. If a new agreement was made, to the effect that appellee should have the right to sell the land himself and pay appellants a commission of $500, this operated as a modification of the original contract, and it thereafter remained no longer as a contract giving appellants the "exclusive" right to sell the property, and a sale made thereafter by appellee pursuant to the agreement would operate as a revocation of appellants' authority. The effect of the instruction was to tell the jury that, unless appellee notified appellants of the sale thus made by himself, they could continue in their efforts to find a purchaser, and would be entitled to a commission if they found one "ready, willing, and able" to purchase the property. As the sale made by appellee under the terms of the modified agreement operated as a revocation of appellants' authority to sell, they were not entitled to notice, and could not claim a commission on the sale thereafter made by themselves. Hill v. Jebb, 55 Ark. 574, 18 S. W. 1047.

[3] The next ground urged for reversal is that the court erred in giving instruction No. 1 on request of appellee, which reads as follows: "If you believe from the evidence that defendant had forgotten the date of the expiration of the contract with plaintiffs, and called upon the plaintiffs to inform him of the date, and that plaintiff Johnston informed him that the contract expired June 1, 1911, and that Fuqua relied upon said information, and, believing that to be true, sold the lands which had been listed with plaintiffs, after said date, then you will find for the defendant." It is contended that this instruction was incorrect and prejudicial to appellants, for the reason that it ignored their contention that appellee during the month of June encouraged them to continue in their efforts to make a sale. This instruction is based entirely upon appellee's contention that appellants misrepresented to him the date of the expiration of the contract, and thereby induced him to enter into another contract for the sale of the property. The jury, however, found against appellee on that issue, otherwise they could not have found in favor of appellants for the $500. Therefore the instruction was not prejudicial, even if it is open to the objection urged by appellants that it ignored one of their contentions in the case.

[4] As to the other refused instructions requested by appellants, we think that they were not prejudicial, as the other instructions in the case fairly submitted the issues.

We are of the opinion, upon the whole, that the case was properly submitted to the jury, and that the verdict should not be disturbed.

Judgment affirmed.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Sebastian County; Daniel Hon, Judge.

Action by Frederick J. Schleuter and another against Lewis Friedman and another. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Appellees brought this suit in the circuit court against appellants to recover damages for an alleged breach in a building contract with them. Appellees were contractors and house builders, and appellants were the owners of certain lots in the city of Ft. Smith upon which they desired to erect a three-story business house. Appellants advertised for bids for the erection of the house on the lots according to the plans and specifications furnished by them. The notice and advertisement for bids and the plans and specifications which accompanied them comprised 22 typewritten pages of legal size. Hence it is impracticable to set them out in full here. We deem it sufficient to say that the description of the lots upon which the house was to be built is contained in the notice and advertisement for bids. The plans and specifications were prepared by the architect of appellants, and were full and complete. They contained a definite and detailed statement of the kind and quality of material to be used, the dimensions of the building and the various rooms to be contained therein, and the exact manner in which every part of the work should be done. In short, they were as specific as could be, and were intended as a definite and specific guide in the erection of the building. They provided for a bond to be executed by the builder, and contained clauses relative to changes in the contract and disputes arising between the builder and owner. They provided that the work should be done by union labor, and that the contractor should be responsible for all damage suits arising out of and in connection with the work. Another clause provided that the details, drawings, and specifications are intended to describe the work, and shall not be deviated from without written instructions from the architect. The notice and advertisement reserved to the owner three days to determine the successful bidder, and provided that any and all bids might be rejected after the bids were opened. The bid of the appellees was as follows:

"Ft. Smith, Ark., Aug. 9-11.

"We propose to erect the building for Friedman-Mincer according to plans and specifications for the sum of $26,229.00 (twenty-six thousand two hundred and twenty-nine dollars). This bid is subject to the agreement of June 15, 1911, between architects and contractors, and subject to three days' acceptance."

The testimony on the part of appellees tended to show that the bids were opened on Thursday, and that appellants, after looking at the bids, said they would not need three days to determine who was the successful bidder, but that they would decide the question the next morning. Will Schleuter, one of the appellees, testified that he met Mr. Friedman, one of the appellants, the next morning after the bids had been opened, and in regard to the acceptance of the bid of appellees by appellant we quote from his testimony as follows: "A. I met Mr. Friedman, and asked him whether he had decided on who was to have the job. Q. That was Friday morning about what time? A. That was between 9 and 10 o'clock. Q. Where did you meet him? A. Right at Padgett's café. Q. In front of where their office had been? A. Yes, sir. Q. And he said, 'Yes,' they had decided that yesterday? A. Yes, sir; and that we got the job, and he was glad we got it, and that he had told Mr. Strong to make up the contract, and that he was working on it then. I told him I was glad of it, glad that we got the job, and went on. That same afternoon, Friday afternoon, I met Mr. Mincer on the car, and he told me the same thing; that we had the job, and they were fixing up the contract and bond then. So the next morning—that is, Saturday morning—there was to be another job let out of Mr. Strong's office, and I went up there to see him about it, and I went up and he said: 'Here is the bond. You take the bond and have it fixed up, and come back here at 10 o'clock, and I will have the contract ready for you.' So I took the bond, and was going to give it to Fred, my brother, and that is all I know about that. He took it off at that time." He testified, further, that appellees were the lowest bidders, and that the architect, who made the plans for appellants, and whose business it was to prepare the bond and contract, did prepare the bond and gave it to appellees, and also prepared a written contract. The testimony showed that appellees executed the bond, with sureties, and that the bond was submitted by them to appellants, who retained it. Later on the appellants refused to sign the contract, and notified appellees that they would not be permitted to construct the house. Fred Schleuter testified that appellants examined the bond executed by appellees and accepted it. He said they told him the bond was satisfactory, and then suggested that we had not agreed on the time limit and the forfeiture. After some discussion of the matter we agreed to complete the job in 100 working days, and agreed on $25 per day for damages for delay. He also stated that Mr. Mincer, one of the appellants, said they had not signed the contract that morning; that he wanted to see his attorney, and would be ready to sign the contract at 4 o'clock that afternoon; that he went to see Mr. Mincer about 4 o'clock, and after some discussion about the matter he declined to sign the contract. Appellees also adduced evidence tending to show the amount of damages suffered by them.

The evidence on the part of appellants tends to show that they did not accept the bid of appellees, by exercising their right under the notice and advertisement to reject it. They were questioned in regard to the conversation with Will Schleuter and Fred Schleuter, and denied that they had it, or that they told them that appellees' bid would be accepted. The architect admitted that he prepared the contract, but testified that he wrote it at the suggestion of one of the appellees, and that neither one of appellants requested him to prepare it.

The jury returned a verdict for appellees, and from the judgment rendered appellants have duly prosecuted an appeal to this court.

Read & McDonough, of Ft. Smith, for appellants. C. B. & H. P. Warner, of Ft. Smith, for appellees.

HART, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] Counsel for appellants asked the court to direct a verdict for them, and the refusal of the court to do so is the only ground upon which we are asked to reverse the judgment. They asked for a directed verdict on the ground that no agreement was ever made between appellants and appellees, and contend, further, that, if there was an agreement entered into, it was an oral agreement, and not binding on the parties, because it was the understanding and intention of the parties that any agreement entered into should be reduced to writing before it should become binding. The contract could be performed within a year, and contracts of this character are not prohibited by the statute of frauds in this state; hence a written contract was not necessary. 6 Cyc. 10; Salies et al. v. Sharlow et al., 5 Dak. 100, 37 N. W. 748.

[2] In the case of Emerson v. Stevens Grocer Co., 95 Ark. at page 426, 130 S. W. at page 543, the court said: "If the contract is actually entered into and made, whether by messages, correspondence, or by word of mouth, the agreement becomes at once effective, although it was expected that the terms would afterwards be embodied in a written instrument and signed. The mere reference to a future contract in writing would not negative a present contract, if the terms thereof were actually assented to by both parties. The written draft of the contract would only be a convenient record of the agreement and the evidence thereof; but it would only constitute evidence of the agreement, and its absence would not affect the binding force of the contract that was closed. Therefore, if an unconditional offer is made, and that offer accepted, this will constitute an obligatory contract, although the parties also understand that a written contract embodying the terms should be drawn and executed."

The principles of law applicable here are well stated in the case of Rosster v. Miller, 3 App. Cas. (Eng.) at page 1151, where Lord Blackburn said: "I quite agree with the Lords Justices (wholly independent of the statute of frauds) it is a necessary part of the plaintiff's case to show that the two parties had come to a final and complete agreement, for, if not, there was no contract. So long as they are only in negotiation, either party may retract; and though the parties may have agreed on all the cardinal points of the intended contract, yet, if some particulars essential to the agreement still remain to be settled afterwards, there is no contract. The parties, in such a case, are still only in negotiation. But the mere fact that the parties have expressly stipulated that there shall afterwards be a formal agreement prepared, embodying the terms, which shall be signed by the parties, does not, by itself, show that they continue merely in negotiation. It is a matter to be taken into account in construing the evidence and determining whether the parties have really come to a final agreement or not. But as soon as the fact is established of the final mutual assent of the parties, so that those who draw up the formal agreement have not the power to vary the terms already settled, I think the contract is completed." To the same effect, see Western Roofing Tile Co. v. Jones, 26 Okl. 209, 109 Pac. 225, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 127; 7 A. & E. Ency. of Law, 140; Page on Contracts, vol. 1, par. 54; Boysen v. Van Dorn Iron Works, 94 App. Div. 95, 87 N. Y. Supp. 995; Lowrey v. Danforth, 95 Mo. App. 441, 69 S. W. 39; Green v. Cole, 103 Mo. 70, 15 S. W. 317; International Harvester Co. v. Campbell, 43 Tex. Civ. App. 421, 96 S. W. 93; Lane v. Warren, 53 Tex. Civ. App. 122, 115 S. W. 903; Disken v. Herter, 73 App. Div. 453, 77 N. Y. Supp. 300.

In the application of the principles above announced to the facts in the case at bar, it cannot be said that the undisputed evidence shows that the agreement made was not the end of negotiations between appellants and appellees. Counsel for appellants insist that because the contract was to be reduced to writing and a bond tendered accompanying it, and because the notice and advertisement and the plans and specifications did not provide a time of payment to the builder and a time for the completion of the contract, that no contract could exist without such writing.

[3] The testimony of appellees shows that the bond provided for in the notice and advertisement was executed by appellees and accepted by appellants, that their bid was accepted by appellants, that they subsequently agreed that the time for the completion of the building should be 100 working days, and that the damages for delay in the completion of the building should be $25 per day. It appears, then, from their testimony, that all the terms of the contract were agreed upon, and its reduction to writing was intended merely for facility of proof as to its terms. In such cases the provision for a contract in writing is not inconsistent with the present contract, and this is especially true in a case where the things to be done are provided for in written plans and specifications, which are so definite and detailed as to present a perfect guide as to the rights and duties of the respective parties in the erection of the proposed building. According to the evidence for appellees, the minds of appellants and appellees were in accord as to all the provisions of the contract, and the writing was intended to exhibit and set forth just what they had agreed upon and understood. Appellants did more than telling appellees that they were the lowest bidders. According to the testimony of appellees, they told them that they had gotten the job, and that their architect was then working on the contract. As we have already seen, the terms of the contract were then as definite and certain as they could be, except as to the time of payment, the time of completion of the work, and the amount of damages for delay in the completion of the work. The time for completion of the work and the damages for delay were subsequently agreed upon.

[4] Moreover, where a contract fails to specify a time for completion it will be implied that a reasonable time for performance was intended. 6 Cyc. 66; Long v. Chas. T. Abeles & Co., 77 Ark. 150, 91 S. W. 29.

[5] In regard to the time of making payment, it may be said that, in the absence from the contract of any provisions on the point, the time of making payment is presumed to be on completion of the work. 6 Cyc. 76; Wright v. Maxwell, 9 Ind. 192; Shanks v. Griffen, 14 B. Mon. (Ky.) 153.

[6] The contract, then, could not be said to be too uncertain and indefinite for enforcement. Under the instructions of the court the jury in effect found that the contract was made or entered into, that its performance was to be immediately entered upon, that the preparation of the written form of the contract was matter to be subsequently attended to, and that the written contract was not intended to be a condition precedent to the taking effect of the contract. The verdict of the jury was supported by the evidence, and the court did not err in refusing to direct a verdict for appellants.

No other assignments of error are urged for the reversal of the judgment, and the judgment will be affirmed.

BLAGG et al. v. FRY et al.

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. Nov. 25, 1912.)

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 185*)—PRESENTATION BELOW—SUBSTITUTION OF JUDGES.

A party who went to trial when a special chancellor was substituted cannot first object on appeal that when the regular chancellor announced his disqualification, special chancellor was elected to try the case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1166-1176, 1375; Dec. Dig. § 185.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Yell County; Tom D. Patton, Special Judge.

Action by H. N. Fry and others against B. D. Blagg and another. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Jo Johnson, of Ft. Smith, for appellants. Priddy & Chambers, of Danville, for appellees.

HART, J. Appellees instituted this suit in the chancery court against appellants. The record shows that, when the case was reached on the regular call of the calendar, the Hon. J. G. Wallace, the regular chancellor, announced his disqualification to sit in the cause. Whereupon the clerk of the court proceeded to hold an election for a special chancellor to hear said cause, which resulted in the election of Hon. T. D. Patton, a member of the bar of the court, as such special chancellor. The regular chancellor then administered to him the oath required by law, and upon the regular chancellor vacating the bench the special chancellor assumed the bench, and proceeded to try the cause. A decree was rendered in favor of the appellees, the plaintiffs below, against appellants, the defendants below. The record recites that both the plaintiffs and defendants were present at the trial. The case is here on appeal.

It is now insisted by counsel for appellants that the regular chancellor had no right to withdraw and to cause the substitution of a special chancellor, and for this reason the decree should be reversed. In the case of Sweepster v. Gaines et al., 19 Ark. 96, the court held: "In order to present any question in the appellate court as to the right of a special judge to preside in the trial of the cause, his power and authority must be questioned in the court below, and the grounds of the objection stated in the record." Both appellees and appellants were present at the trial of the cause in the chancery court, and, so far as the record discloses, no objection was at any time or in any manner made to the special chancellor acting as judge in the case. This court will not now for the first time hear such an objection. As held in the case of Sweepster v. Gaines, supra, in order to be available here, the power and authority of a special chancellor must have been questioned in the chancery court. The record shows that the regular chancellor announced his disqualification, and that the special chancellor was elected and qualified in the manner provided by the Constitution. The parties went to trial before him without objection. The proceedings were had at a regular term of the court, and the usual presumption must be indulged in in favor of their regularity.

The decree will be affirmed.

ST. LOUIS, I. M. & S. R. CO. v. BROGAN.

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. Oct. 28, 1912.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 232*)—OBJECTION TO EVIDENCE.

Objections, in an action for injuries, to the testimony and conclusions arrived at "from an examination made by the witness of X-ray pictures, when the witness testified that he was no X-ray expert," reserved in the motion for new trial, did not assign error from the admission of testimony showing a controversy among the physicians as to the nature of plaintiff's injuries and his present and future condition as a result thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1851, 1868, 1426, 1430, 1431; Dec. Dig. § 232.*]

2. DAMAGES (§ 132*)—PERSONAL INJURIES—EXCESSIVE RECOVERY.

Where a locomotive fireman, 27 years of age, in good health, earning from $125 to $150 per month, with prospect of an early promotion to the position of engineer, paying $175 to $250, was injured, and one leg would have to be amputated, the bone of one shoulder was broken and would probably not unite, and he was permanently incapacitated for performing the duties of his vocation, and at the time of trial had endured intense suffering for over three months, and been at an expense of about $500 for surgical treatment, a verdict for $25,000 was not excessive.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. §§ 372-385, 396; Dec. Dig. § 132.*]

3. DAMAGES (§ 187*)—EVIDENCE OF LIFE EXPECTANCY.

Where there was evidence of plaintiff's age at the time of his injury, that he was then in good health, and of his occupation, the jury could estimate the probable duration of his life, though mortuary tables were not in evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. § 509; Dec. Dig. § 187.*]

4. TRIAL (§ 296*)—INSTRUCTIONS—ERRORS CURBED BY OTHER INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction, in a fireman's action for injuries from his engine colliding with a car standing on a side switch, to find for plaintiff if he was injured, in the performance of his duties, from his engine colliding with a car which defendant, in its failure to exercise reasonable care had negligently placed and left standing, and which caused the collision, was not erroneous, as assuming that defendant was negligent, when followed by other instructions clearly showing the court's intention to submit to the jury the question whether defendant was negligent in placing the car on the side switch.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 705-713, 715, 716, 718; Dec. Dig. § 296.*]

5. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 217*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—ASSUMPTION OF RISK.

Where a locomotive fireman is injured from a collision between his engine and a car on a side switch, and the collision results from the railroad company's failure to exercise reasonable care to permit safe passage for the engine, the fireman is not chargeable with having assumed, as an incident of his employment, the risk of being hurt, unless he actually knew of the dangerous position of the car, and realized the danger, and then voluntarily exposed himself to it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 574-600; Dec. Dig. § 217.*]

6. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 295*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—INSTRUCTION—MODIFICATION.

The court properly refused to modify instructions dealing only with the issue of assumed risk, so as to present also the issue of contributory negligence; these two defenses being separate and independent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 1168-1179; Dec. Dig. § 295.*]

7. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 203*)—"ASSUMED RISK"—"CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE."

The defenses of "assumed risk" and "contributory negligence" are separate and independent; the former arising out of contract relations, and the latter not.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 538-543; Dec. Dig. § 203.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 1, pp. 589-591; vol. 3, pp. 7584, 7585; vol. 2, pp. 1540-1547; vol. 8, p. 7617.

8. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1066*)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTION.

An instruction submitting the issue of contributory negligence, if erroneous, was harmless as to the defendant, where there was no evidence from which reasonable minds could have concluded plaintiff was negligent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4220; Dec. Dig. § 1066.*]

9. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 265*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

In a fireman's action for injuries from the collision of his engine with a car on a side switch, the burden was on defendant to prove plaintiff's contributory negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 877-908, 955; Dec. Dig. § 265.*]

10. TRIAL (§ 183*)—ARGUMENT OF COUNSEL—ACTION OF COURT.

Statements of plaintiff's counsel, in argument, that defendant had time before suit was filed to offer settlement, and none was offered, were not prejudicial, where they were immediately withdrawn, and the court admonished the jury not to consider them.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 316; Dec. Dig. § 183.*]

11. DAMAGES (§ 216*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

Where, in an action for injuries, there was evidence limiting definitely plaintiff's expense to a certain sum, an instruction that, in arriving at the amount of plaintiff's damages, the jury could consider "the expense to which he is subjected as a result of his injured condition," was not erroneous, as permitting the jury to speculate.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. §§ 548-555; Dec. Dig. § 216.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Hot Springs County; W. H. Evans, Judge.

Action by F. T. Brogan against the St. Louis, Iron Mountain & Southern Railway Company. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The instruction on the measure of damages was as follows:

Instruction No. 5: "You are instructed that if you find for the plaintiff you will assess his damages at such a sum of money as will be a fair and reasonable compensation to him for the injuries he has received as a result of the alleged accident; and in arriving at the amount of said sum of money you will take into consideration, as you find from the evidence, the nature and extent of his injuries, whether temporary or permanent in character, results reasonably certain to follow, any disfigurement of his person as a result of his injuries, the bodily pain and mental suffering he has endured, and that he is reasonably certain from the evidence to hereafter endure, as a result of his physical injuries, the loss of earnings from his labor since he received his injuries, and the loss of earnings in the future of his life by virtue of his decreased capacity to earn money because of his injured condition, his age and reasonable expectancy of years of life, his vocation and earning capacity prior to his injury, with his probable chance of being promoted to a position of increased remuneration of his services had he not been injured, his condition of physical strength and health prior to his injuries, and the expenses to which he is subjected as a result of his injured condition."

Appellee was in the employ of the appellant as a locomotive fireman. On October 17, 1911, he was engaged in firing on a locomotive engine in the Argenta yards while switching freight cars. He had never before worked in that yard as a switch engine fireman, nor had he ever worked as a switch engine fireman on any other road. He was not familiar with the tracks in the Argenta yards. He had been firing on the main line of the Iron Mountain until he was called on the night of October 17th to fire on the switch engine in the Argenta yards. He went on duty that night about 9 o'clock; had to keep firing right along all the time to keep steam and water in the engine. He had no time to look out; had put a fire in the engine, and got up in the seat, and his eyes were blinded from the fire and heat. Five cars were attached to the head of the engine. They were moving towards the north. He did not know what kind of cars were coupled in front of the engine, other than that there was a box car next to the engine. That car was as high as the top of the headlight on the engine. The distance between the end of the box car and the headlight on the engine was about two feet. The box car, appellee says, caused the headlight to reflect back in his eyes. He could not have seen the car standing out at the side and ahead of the engine because of the light reflecting in his eyes. The signals for working purposes were given on the engineer's side. As his engine was propelling, at a slow speed, the cars ahead of it along the lead track, the cab of the engine collided with a car standing on the side track leading out from the lead track on appellee's side of the engine. The cars ahead of the engine on the lead track had passed the car standing on the side track, but the cab of the engine cornered with it. When appellee heard the crash, he endeavored to get out through the front window; but his leg was caught, and he sustained serious injuries, which will be hereinafter described.

Appellee did not know that the box car with which the engine collided was so close to the lead track on which the engine was moving. This car had been dropped into the side track from the lead track, and left there by the engine on which the appellee was at work. After the box car had been dropped in on the side track from the lead track, the engine had pulled back onto the lead track with the remaining five cars of the string, and as these cars were pushed forward by the end of the side track the collision occurred by which the appellee was injured. The foreman of the switch crew directed the movement of the switch engine and the location of the cars. He had placed the car in the position where it was at the time it struck the engine. He states that the appellant company had rules covering the placing of cars in the clear on side tracks. The rule required that "conductors must see that brakes are set on cars they leave on sidings, and when the siding is on a grade they must, when practicable, couple all the cars together, and, in addition to setting the brakes, the wheels must be blocked and safety switches properly adjusted. When not in use, safety switches must be left open. In switching, trainmen must know that brakes are in good order before cutting off cars."

The rule refers to conductors, and in switchyards the yard foreman is the same as the conductor. There was a downgrade there to the east from the south end. The grade there was such as to cause the cars to go away from the lead, and the engine was headed east when they kicked the car in on the track where it stood when the collision occurred. The foreman stated that according to his judgment the rules of the company were complied with in placing the cars there that night. The downgrade would be to prevent the car coming out, if moving. The brake would not have to be set on that car. If the brakes were set on the cars below, they would hold that car. He went down and got on top of the rail, which was the custom and the rule, and stood on top of the rail and held his hand out, and ordinarily, if it cleared his fingers, holding his arm out straight, as he did that night, it would clear a car or an engine. He adopted the usual method that they had adopted and been using for 27 years to see if it would pass, and in his judgment he thought it would. The brakes were not set on the box car that collided with the engine, nor was any block placed under the wheel on the end of the car towards the lead on which the engine was moving. He stated that it was not necessary. He kicked the car in on the track, which consisted in giving a cut of cars a start, and then cutting the car loose from the rest, and it rolls into the track. On that occasion he kicked the car in, and walked up the lead, and stood on the rail, and held his hand out, taking the precaution above mentioned. The witness testified that the box car would "have no reflection on a person's eyes looking ahead. If you were looking directly at the light alone, it would; but, where you are looking at the reflection, it does not."

Appellee brought this suit on November 6, 1911, and in his complaint he alleged that "the cab in which he was working was struck by a car that had been negligently left standing on the side switch north of the one in which plaintiff's engine was turning, and the left side of the cab was crushed in upon the plaintiff and seriously injured him"; that "said accident and injury was caused by the negligence of the defendant and its servants in placing and leaving on the side track, so near the lead switch, the car which struck the locomotive on which plaintiff was at work, and in negligently directing the train on which plaintiff was working to move in to the side switch." The defendant answered, denying the material allegations of the complaint, and setting up that the plaintiff was injured by his own negligence in failing to keep a lookout, which it was his duty to do, and also setting up that plaintiff "was as well informed of the dangers from cars being left too close as any of defendant's other servants, and assumed the risk of such injury as might occur thereby."

The above are substantially the facts on the issues of negligence, contributory negligence, and assumed risk. The court granted and refused requests for instructions, to which appellant duly excepted, and which we will comment upon in the opinion. The jury returned a verdict for $25,000, judgment was entered for that sum in favor of the appellee, and this appeal has been duly prosecuted. Other facts are stated in opinion.

E. B. Kinsworthy, R. E. Wiley, and W. G. Riddick, all of Little Rock, and W. V. Tompkins, of Prescott, for appellant. Robertson & De Mers, of Little Rock, for appellee.

WOOD, J. (after stating the facts as above). The appellant contends that the verdict was excessive, caused "partially at least by the exploitation" in the testimony of a "disagreement amongst the doctors who treated appellee at the hospital and those treating him after he left the hospital as to whether his injuries were properly treated at the hospital, and as to the present and future results of his injuries as affected by that treatment." The testimony of physicians on behalf of appellee, one of whom had treated him for 12 days preceding the trial, tended to show that when they examined appellee his broken leg was unhealed; that, notwithstanding the efforts of the physicians at the hospital to save appellee's foot from amputation, same was now necessary, in order to save appellee's life; and that by reason of a failure to operate at first, and on account of the prolonged treatment in trying to save the limb, the bone had decayed, and the limb had become so infected that it would have to be amputated above the knee, whereas, in their opinion, if the limb had been amputated soon after the injury occurred, it would have been only necessary to amputate between the ankle and the knee. In describing appellee's injuries, the testimony of physicians in his behalf tended to show that he had a broken shoulder, the bones of which, on account of the long lapse of time since the injury, could not be knitted together, because of the decayed bone at the fractured ends. The testimony of the physicians and surgeons on behalf of the appellant, who treated appellee at the hospital where he was taken immediately after his injury occurred, tended to show that the methods adopted by them were the latest and most improved methods for the treatment of injuries such as appellee had received, and were adopted because of the hope they entertained of saving the appellee's limb. They gave appellee the same treatment that they gave other patients, under similar conditions, in order to save his leg; that the progress towards ultimate recovery had been satisfactory up to the time the patient was taken out of their charge; and that there had been no indication of death of the bone and no infection, and they still believed the bone could be saved.

[1] Appellant contends here that this dispute among the doctors, as shown by the testimony, prejudiced the minds of the jury, resulting in an excessive verdict. It is sufficient to say of this contention that appellant did not make any objection at the trial to the testimony of the physicians on behalf of appellee describing the nature of appellee's injuries. Appellant only objected to one of the physicians testifying as to the nature of these injuries, and giving the conclusions he arrived at as to the condition of the injury from an examination made by the witness of X-ray pictures, when the witness testified that he was no X-ray expert. This objection, reserved in the motion for a new trial, does not assign any error growing out of the ruling of the court in permitting testimony showing a controversy among the physicians as to the nature of appellee's injuries and his present and future mental and physical condition as a result thereof.

[2] Moreover, the verdict was not excessive. Appellee, at the time of his injury, was 27 years of age and in good health. His wages were from $125 to $150 per month, and he was in line of promotion, after three years' service, to the position of engineer, whose average monthly wage was $175 to $250. The jury were warranted in the conclusion that appellee would be permanently incapacitated for performing the duties of the vocation that he had selected and for which he was qualified. In fact, it was practically certain from the testimony that appellee, by reason of his injuries, had lost his earning power. His left leg was so badly crushed as to necessitate amputation of same above the knee, and the bone of the left shoulder, that helps to support and gives motion to the arm, was broken; and one of the physicians testified that it had been broken so long that "it would be very difficult to get down in there and wire it together." It was a question, says he, "whether the bone could ever be brought up together and kept in place." "The effect of the failure of the broken bone to reunite would cause the shoulder to drop down and the bone to come up. As a consequence he could not use the left arm without a good deal of pain, as the fragments would be rubbing together all the time, and it would be impossible for him to get around on a crutch at all." There was a severe injury to the back, that would give appellee "trouble with his spinal column and spinal cord for a good many years, and cause him to suffer with a nervous condition." Appellee at the time of the trial had endured intense suffering for a little over three months. He described his suffering as follows: "I suffered pain, and didn't sleep much of the time. I was awake most of the time at night. I couldn't sleep. My back hurt me. My leg and my heel hurt me so bad that they had to take the wrapping off of the bottom part of my foot, and my heel hurt so bad I couldn't stand it, and it worked independent of the front part. Every time I would move, I could feel the bone. It hurt me every time I moved, and every time I moved my back hurt. My shoulder hurt all the way up in the back of my neck. I suffered all kinds of pain and everything."

The testimony showed that for surgical treatment appellee would be at an expense of $500. Appellee at the time of his injury was receiving an average of $1,650 per annum for his work. It would require nearly $22,000 to purchase an annuity amounting to $1,650 for one during appellee's expectancy of life. If at the end of 3 years he had been promoted to the position of engineer, then his yearly income for his work would have been $2,550, and it would have required over $30,000 to have purchased an annuity for appellee with his expectancy of life at the age of 30 years. In Railway Co. v. Sweet, 60 Ark. 550, 31 S. W. 571, this court, having under consideration the damages resulting to the family of Sweet from his death, said: "He was 84 years of age, in good health, a robust man. He had an expectancy, as shown by the Carlisle Life Tables, of 25 years. The jury doubtless weighed all the probabilities of loss from sickness and other various contingencies, likely to arise in the course of a man's life, and balanced these against the probabilities, also, of an increase of efficiency in money-making power. They might have found from the evidence that Sweet's life was worth at least $800 per annum to his wife and children; * * * and, according to the Carlisle Tables (which were in evidence), estimating money at the legal rate, it would require over $10,000 to purchase an annuity of $800 for one of Sweet's age."

[3] So we say here that the jury, weighing all the probabilities of loss from various contingencies, and also the probabilities of an increase in money-making power, might have well reached the conclusion that appellee would have earned for the term of his expectancy in life at least the sum of $1,650 per annum, and that he lost the power to produce this by reason of the injury, and that it was a total loss to him. It would have taken about $22,600 to have compensated him for this loss alone. When to this is added the expense of his surgical and medical treatment and damages for the mental anguish which he has endured on account of his personal disfigurement and the pain and suffering which he has undergone and must continue to undergo by reason of his bodily injuries and infirmities, we cannot say that the verdict is excessive. While mortuary tables were not in evidence, it was shown that appellee at the time of his injury was in good health, and the jury could judge from the character of the work in which he was engaged as to his power of physical endurance. In St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Glossup, 88 Ark. 225, 114 S. W. 247, we said: "Introduction of mortuary tables is not the only method of proving life expectancy. The question may be submitted to the jury upon testimony showing the age, health, habits, physical condition, etc., of the individual, so that the jury may estimate the probable duration of life."

[4] II. Appellant objected to an instruction, given at the instance of appellee, wherein the court told the jury: "If you find that, while he was engaged in the performance of his duties as fireman, the cab of the engine on which he was working collided with a car which defendant, in its failure to exercise reasonable care and precaution for the safe passage of plaintiff's engine over its tracks, had negligently placed and left standing on a side switch so close to the lead switch, on which plaintiff's engine was running at the time of the accident, as to obstruct its free passage, and caused the collision, and as a result thereof plaintiff was injured, then the defendant is liable," etc. Appellant contends that the above instruction assumed that there was negligence on the part of the appellant. In Brinkley Car Works & Mfg. Co. v. Cooper, 75 Ark. 325, 87 S. W. 645, the court had under consideration an instruction reading as follows: "If the jury find from the evidence that the Brinkley Car Works had notice that children did frequent the place of this pool, or were from the nature of the surroundings likely to do so, and that it carelessly left a pool of hot water there concealed in such a way that one would reasonably expect it to occasion injury to such children, the company would be liable for damages to the plaintiff, who, by reason of its concealed nature, walked into the pool of hot water and was burned." The court said: "Counsel for appellant insist that the instruction is erroneous, in that it assumes the existence of facts which were disputed, viz., that the plaintiff walked into the pool of hot water on account of its being concealed, and that he was not aware of the presence of the water, or that it was hot. The instruction, standing alone, might be open to that construction, and would be objectionable; but not so when read with the other instructions, given at appellant's request, submitting to the jury the question as to whether the plaintiff knew at the time that the water was hot and that it was concealed."

In other instructions, following the one under consideration here, the court made it clear that it did not intend to assume as an established fact that appellant was negligent in placing the box car on the switch track, but submitted that question to the jury. For instance, in an instruction given at the request of the appellant the court told the jury as follows: "It devolves upon the plaintiff to show, by the greater weight of the evidence, that the defendant was negligent in the manner alleged. If the proof shows that the defendant's servants exercised ordinary care in the use of the precautions taken to prevent the cab and cars coming in contact," etc. And in an instruction on behalf of the appellee the court told the jury: "If you find that the alleged collision between plaintiff's engine and the car on the side switch was the result of the failure of the defendant railway company to exercise reasonable care and precaution to place said car on said side switch," etc. If the instruction, standing alone, is susceptible of the construction for which appellant contends, it could not be so construed when taken in connection with the instructions following it, under the doctrine of the above case; and, when all are considered together, it is manifest that the court did not assume negligence on the part of appellant, but submitted that issue to be determined by the jury. There is no conflict in the instructions.

[5] The appellant objects to the following instructions:

"(2) You are instructed that if you find that the alleged collision between plaintiff's engine and the car on the side switch was the result of the failure of the defendant railway company to exercise reasonable care and precaution to place said car on said side switch and to maintain it in such position as to provide a safe passageway for plaintiff's engine, then plaintiff cannot be charged with having assumed the risk of being hurt by said collision as one of the ordinary risks incident to his employment.

"(3) You are instructed that plaintiff had the right to presume that the defendant railway company had discharged its duty towards him by the exercise of reasonable care and precaution for his safety, by so placing the car upon the side switch and so maintaining it in a position that would provide a safe passageway for his engine, and that he cannot be charged with having assumed the risk of being hurt by the collision with said car, unless you find that prior to the time of the alleged collision he actually knew of the dangerous position of the car on the side track, and realized the danger of being hurt by a collision between said car and his engine, and that with such knowledge and appreciation of danger he voluntarily exposed himself to it."

The appellant contends that these instructions, as well as that part of instruction No. 1 already quoted, absolved the appellee from any duty to exercise ordinary care for his own protection. In instructions Nos. 2 and 3, and that part of instruction No. 1 set out above, the court was declaring the rule under the statute in regard to the assumption of risk. The court announced that doctrine correctly according to many decisions of this court since the passage of the act of March 8, 1907 (Laws 1907, p. 162), making railway companies and other companies and corporations liable in damages caused by the negligence of a fellow servant. St. L. S. W. R. Co. v. Burdg, 93 Ark. 88, 124 S. W. 239; St. L. I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Ledford, 90 Ark. 543, 119 S. W. 1123; Aluminum Co. of North America v. Ramsey, 89 Ark. 522, 117 S. W. 568; Ozan Lumber Co. v. Biddle, 87 Ark. 587, 113 S. W. 796. The doctrine of the above cases is that a servant has the right to assume that a fellow servant will exercise due care in the performance of the duties imposed upon him, and if a servant is injured, while exercising ordinary care for his own safety, through the negligence of a fellow servant, the master will be liable for the damages resulting from such negligence. While the servant does not assume any risk or danger arising from the negligence of the master or of a fellow servant of which he has no knowledge and does not appreciate, he is not, under the act of March 8, 1907, supra, relieved of the duty of exercising ordinary care for his own protection. See cases supra.

[6, 7] The instructions criticised correctly declared the law under the statute on the issue of assumed risk, and they were directed solely to that issue. The court, in other instructions, given at the instance both of the appellant and the appellee, presented the issue of contributory negligence. The instructions set out above are not obnoxious to criticism because they do not embrace the defense of contributory negligence. The defenses of assumed risk and contributory negligence are separate and independent. The former arises out of contract relations, while the latter does not. St. L. I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Corman, 92 Ark. 102, 122 S. W. 116; St. L. I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Holman, 90 Ark. 555, 120 S. W. 146; Johnson v. Mammoth Vein Coal Co., 88 Ark. 243, 114 S. W. 722, 123 S. W. 1180, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 646; Southern Cotton Oil Co. v. Spotts, 77 Ark. 458, 92 S. W. 249; C. O. & G. R. Co. v. Jones, 77 Ark. 367, 92 S. W. 244, 4 L. R. A. (N. S.) 837, 7 Ann. Cas. 430. The court did not err, on the specific objection of appellant, in refusing to modify these instructions, so as to embody therein the issue of contributory negligence.
